PRICE TWENTY CENTS

Rivals in Beauty

Why not? There are too few years between youth and babyhood to work noticeable changes in a young girl's skin. And a fresh, smooth complexion should keep its beauty long after girlhood's days have passed.

Give your skin the same care that you lavish on your baby's and the charm of alluring youthful freshness will be yours when she grows up.

You wouldn't dream of letting a day pass without thorough cleansing with mild, pure soap. (Most mothers use Palmolive.)

Treat your complexion the same careful way and the roughness, the little blemishes and the coarseness of texture which so many women try to cover up with powder will soon be transformed into becoming freshness.

What every complexion needs

Once every day your skin must be gently but thoroughly cleansed from all accumulations of dirt, perspiration and excess oil secretions.

Powder and rouge must be removed, traces of cold cream washed away. Every tiny pore must be freed from clogging accumulations so that the network of minute glands can do their necessary work.

Neglect this daily cleansing, or depend upon cold cream alone, and dirt, oil, perspiration, powder, rouge and the cream itself combine in an impervious coat which smothers your natural complexion.

The result is sluggishness which soon results in a lifeless, sallow skin. Blackheads develop, dirt infections produce pimples, the filled-up pores enlarge into unattractive coarseness.

Such a skin is a disfigurement which cosmetics can't conceal. Simple cleansing once a day will quickly cure it.

You must use soap and water

There is no other safe, quick, satisfactory cleanser. Your baby's skin proves this.

Mild soap, of course, balmy and soothing, which means Palmolive Soap. Its profuse creamy lather is the scientific blend of palm and olive oils, the mild gentle cleansers Cleopatra used.

If your skin is oily apply this cosmetic lather without preparation, massaging it thoroughly into every tiny skin cell until not a trace of foreign matter remains.

If your skin is inclined to dryness apply a little cold cream before you start cleansing. This keeps the most sensitive skin delightfully soft and smooth.

Enormous volume reduces price

If we made Palmolive in small quantities the price would be high. Palm and olive oils are costly ingredients—they come from overseas. We import them in such vast quantity that the price is much reduced.

The Palmolive factories work day and night to supply the enormous and ever-growing demand. This reduces manufacturing cost.

Result, the finest facial soap modern science, employing an ancient beauty secret, can produce, at the price of ordinary soap.

Editorial Chat

WITH the beginning of the year, all of us have a kind of mental, as well as material stock-taking. In these upside-down years, it is not as easy as it used to be, to estimate our resources and calculate what the demands will be on them. Canadian journalism, like the course of true love, "never did run smooth," but we believe that a new day has dawned for the publication which aims to be "mainly Canadian."

The Canadian Book Week which was held in November, 1921, revealed how wide is the field of Canadian achievement and how few of our own countrymen and countrywomen have aroused to contemplate what has been and is being done by Canadian writers. Someone may ask at this point: "Would you buy a book because it is written by a Canadian? Are not the writers of the United States and Great Britain more worthy of consideration?"

It is neither wise nor kind to praise a book or a work of art, merely because a Canadian has produced it; but it is unpatriotic and narrow-minded to neglect what is written or wrought by our citizens. However, Canadians are not alone in their lack of esteem for what is home-made. Centuries ago, we were told that a prophet is not without honor save among his own people.

IN next month's issue we shall publish the prize article on "A Model Kitchen." We have received a variety of communications on this subject, but the best-written and most happily illustrated of them all comes from the West. One enterprising contributor wrote saying that "there is no such kitchen" and offering to write us an article on the ideal kitchen, for which, of course, she could send us no photographs—since the best and cleverest of cameras has not been equal, as yet, to capturing a mere idea. A dream kitchen is all very well—and most of us have a dream kitchen somewhere in memory or fancy. My own idea of a kitchen is the old-time kind with a wood fire showing a line of cheerful blaze below the damper, a blue-and-white oilcloth on the floor, a kettle singing a song of home, a red geranium on the window sill—and dozens of homemade buns in the oven. It would not spoil this kitchen, at all, if there were a snow-storm outside and if sleet were dashing against the window-pane. However that is a winter kitchen, I admit, and in summertime we yearn for the electric stove, the fireless cooker and the sunproof ice-box.

CORRESPONDENTS continue to ask if we accept short stories and do we pay for them? These inquirers can hardly be readers of the Canadian Home Journal, for it is evident that there are three or four short stories in each issue. Of course these stories are paid for —and sometimes a writer, quite unknown, sends something so good that we are glad to accept and publish it. So, please do not write letters, asking whether we use short stories and what kind of story we like. If you have written a short story which you consider readable and interesting, send it to us, accompanied by stamped and addressed envelope for its return, in case of "unavailability." Do not be discouraged or resentful if your manuscript comes back. Nearly every editor himself has known what it means to have a returned manuscript wend its way homeward. A writer who is now considered highly successful tells of a story which made twenty-four journeys before it finally won its way to publication.

Do not send more than one story or article at a time. Poets are confirmed offenders in the matter of sending five or six productions at once. If a story or a poem has been accepted, it is not advisable to bombard the editor with a series of contributions. Let a month or two elapse before you send another production. Remember that there are only twelve issues of this magazine in the year and, therefore, we cannot use more than thirty-six or forty-eight stories during the twelve months. Wherefore, a returned manuscript does not imply, as the usual phrase has it, a lack of literary merit—and the very next editor may need the article which the Journal did not require.

We are always glad to welcome another writer to our pages and those who have been reading the sketches by Nina Moore Jamieson in the "Mail and Empire" and who are acquainted with her book, "The Hickory Stick," will be interested in the announcement that a delightful valentine story by this writer, whose home is in Millgrove, Ontario, will appear in February.

A CHARMING STUDY

"Reverie" by Jean Munro, a Canadian artist now in Paris, was one of the most admired pictures shown at the annual exhibition of the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, held recently in Toronto. It represents a comely young woman in early Victorian attire,—hair parted in the middle, chignon, full skirt of flowered green silk, loose white peignoir and a riband of coral pink, who sits dreaming in her dressing-room seemingly oblivious of her surroundings.

Which counts most — color of soap or color of clothes?

Judge soap by what it will do. Color has little to do with either its purity or its cleansing value. There are good soaps variously yellow, green, white and brown. Some pure tar soaps are black! Yet who ever made her head black by shampooing with tar soap?

Regardless of color, you want a laundry soap that will make clothes clean—and do it the safest, the quickest, the easiest way.

Fels-Naptha is golden because that is the natural color of all its good materials mixed together. They help to hold the naptha till the last bit of the bar is used up, thus making it different from all other soaps.

Fels-Naptha is golden, yet it makes the whitest, cleanest clothes that ever came out of suds.

Real naptha is so skillfully combined with splendid soap by the Fels-Naptha exclusive process that it mixes readily with the wash-water. Thus it gets through every fibre of the fabric, and soaks the dirt loose without the effort of hard rubbing or without boiling. Fels-Naptha makes a wash thoroughly sweet and hygienically clean, because it gives clothes a soap-and-water cleansing and a naptha cleansing at the same time.

The only way you can get the benefit of this double cleansing-value in soap is to be sure you get Fels-Naptha—the original and genuine naptha soap—of your grocer. The clean naptha odor and the red-and-green wrapper are your guides.

in Fels-Naptha

Improves every washing-machine

Fels-Naptha soap makes the washing-machine do even better work. The real naptha in Fels-Naptha loosens the dirt before the washing-machine starts its work. Then the Fels-Naptha soapy water churns through and through the clothes, quickly flushing away all the dirt.

Comment and Correspondence

A WESTERN reader has sent us a rather curious letter, protesting against the fashion some public women have of retaining what our correspondent calls "baby names." The protesting lady mentions that in the town in which she dwells there is a woman lawyer who calls herself "Katie" and a few miles away there is a woman doctor who is known as "Nellie." The correspondent quotes other instances of "Susies," "Minnies" and "Sadies," all in business or professional life and asks if these names are in keeping with the dignity of public or business life.

We are inclined to agree with the protesting lady that when a woman enters the arena of politics, law or business that it is more becoming to use a name which does not belong to the list of "pet" names. "Mary" is infinitely more dignified and musical than any diminutive or nick-name could be, while "Helen" is much more to be desired than "Nellie" and even "Sarah" is to be preferred to the form it takes in "Sadie." There are certain familiarities of family and friendly circles which are charming and amusing when kept for privacy, but which become slightly foolish and undignified if extended beyond the intimate associates.

It may be noted that men are not known as "Dr. Johnnie" or "Freddie" on their professional signs, and we believe that the world of business women will learn to be more fastidious in the matter of names. By the way, it seems a pity that many of our Canadian women are forsaking the British tradition which led a widow to retain her husband's name on her visiting card and are following the dictates of some United States authorities which say that the widow should be known as "Mrs. Mary Jones" instead of "Mrs. John Jones." For social purposes, she is still "Mrs. John," although in business life, of course, she uses her "Mary Jones" on cheques and such documents.

The matter of names is not so idle as some suppose, and these reflections, by the Editor of "Youth's Companion" are worthy of note:

IN an age when everything is regulated by law it seems strange that no one has yet thought of appointing a commission to superintend the naming of children. Names seem to be a mere matter of whim and casual fancy. Yet just think that you are attaching to a soul a stamp that is to cling to it in its whole progress through the world, that may never be got rid of, that with time becomes really an integral part of the man or woman, and in a sense the most important part, since it is what comes first to the ears of strangers and carries with it a vague significance that can never quite be shaken off!

"Great imaginative writers have often been impressed with the singular influence and almost fatality of names. In the strange, wandering, fascinating novel of Sterne the hero is intended to receive the name of Trismegistus which, little as it appeals to us, is supposed to be peculiarly fortunate. Instead, he is called Tristram, an appellation of dire infelicity and one that brings a long succession of semihumorous woes.

"We all know that there is a slight yet pervasive and enduring suggestiveness in names. Some flow with ease and grace and aptness, so that we like to speak them and hear them and dwell upon them. Others are so accented, so fraught with sharp consonants and heavy vowels, that the very sound of them is oppressive. Of course association affects and overcomes all those things, but they do count, and a little steady pressure tells in a long life.

"If you have a child to christen, do not pick the first fantastic name that strikes you, nor yet fasten upon a harmless infant some ugly Biblical curiosity because it happened to belong to your grandfather, but stop and think whether the name you choose is one you yourself would like to carry for seventy-five years."

SOME people think there should be a law to compel loggers to plant a tree for every tree cut down. As it is necessary to start five or six seedling trees to secure one full grown forest tree, straight, tall, and without limbs, such a law would not work. Besides, by the application of silvicultural methods, the forest engineer endeavours in many cases to coax Nature to reforest cut-over tracts herself, and to plant only as a last resort. In view of these facts what the laws of some European countries do demand in regard to certain non-agricultural lands is: "Start an acre of young forest for every acre cut down."

THE function of the Forest Products Laboratories of Canada is to examine all Canadian woods and other forest products, with a view of definitely appraising all their qualities of strength, toughness, hardness, etc. The work has shown that some Canadian woods are stronger than woods imported at greater cost than that of the native product. Recently Mr. L. L. Brown, the lumber commissioner for British Columbia in Eastern Canada, discovered that a certain manufacturing company was using large quantities of imported red oak. He inquired why this wood was being used, when Douglas fir, a stronger wood, could be laid down for less money. The superintendent of the works was disinclined to credit this and both gentlemen visited the Forest Products Laboratories, where a series of tests proved conclusively that the Canadian wood was the stronger.

Commercially the Canadian tree can hold its own:—and in song what more beautiful than these lines by Bliss Carman on "Trees"?

In the Garden of Eden, planted by God

There were goodly trees in the spring-time sod—

Trees of beauty and height and grace
To stand in splendor before His face.
Apple and hickory, ash and pear,
Oak and beech and the tulip rare.
The trembling aspen, the noble pine,
The sweeping elm by the river line;
Trees for the birds to build in and sing,

And the lilac tree for a joy in spring.
Trees to turn at the frosty call
And carpet the ground for their Lord's footfall:

Wood for the bow, the spear and the flail.

The keel and the mast and the daring sail:

He made them of every grain and girth

For the use of man in the Garden of Earth

Then, lest the soul should not lift her eyes

From the gift to the Giver of Paradise

On the crown of a hill, for all to see,
God planted a scarlet maple tree.

AFTERNOON SUN

Tender poetic feeling and a wonderful sense of color are manifested in the exquisite "Afternoon Sun" by W. E. Atkinson which attracted much notice among the pictures shown in the Royal Canadian Academy Exhibition in Toronto. (It might be called a study in blue and grey. It is such a Winter scene as can be seen by anyone who has eyes to see.) There are low-growing bushes and tall, bare trees,—on which still linger a few dead leaves,—outlined against an azure sky, a bit of upland covered with snow that has blue and grey shadows on it, and a pool that repeats the blue of the sky in deeper tones. More than anything the picture reveals the high, spiritual exaltation that such a beautiful scene inspires in the gazer.

The Books the People of Canada Are Reading

THE MYSTERIOUS RIDER

By Zane Grey

Another great story of the West by the master writer—the story that tells about real—very real—men and women with decent ideals and the physical courage to fight for them. Old Bill Bellhounds, the rich rancher, had one great desire: to make his profligate son Jack into a decent man, fit to marry Columbine. He had rescued her when she was a baby from an immigrant train that had been almost wiped out by the Indians. For nineteen years he had cherished her, educated her, and watched over her. Nevertheless, he was worried. Columbine seemed to be attracted by Wilson Moore, a splendid type of cowboy. Then the Mysterious Rider appears.

THE EMPTY SACK

By Basil King

Here's a powerful dramatic story that will start people talking. A gripping tale told by a master pen. When Bradley Collingham, president of a large banking house, discharged Josiah Follett because he was too old, he had no idea how far-reaching the consequences. Had he been able to look into the future he would have seen the large Follett family in financial difficulties; Jennie Follett compelled to go out and help support the family; furthermore he would have seen his only son Robert married to Jennie. And, worse still, he would have seen young Teddy Follett, who worked in the bank, turn thief all because he, Bradley Collingham, believed that sentiment should not interfere with business.

THE GAUNTLET OF ALCESTE

By Hopkins Moorhouse

A mystery story with a question you CAN'T solve, a humor that will captivate you, and a real romance. Addison Kent was a weaver of strange tales; his almost uncanny insight into the human heart, the motive behind the act, had brought him finally into contact with New York's secret police. Then while he dreams in a whimsical way of some day writing a great "literary masterpiece," the spirit of mystery literally hurls itself at him in the guise of a murder very near his own life, and jealously crowds out all thought of other things—even his dream. Addison devotes himself body and soul to the unravelling of the maze of hidden evidence. Kent crosses swords with one of the underworld's master criminals, until step by step the logical solution is reached.

THE LOBSTICK TRAIL

By Douglas Durkin

An unusual drama of Northern Canada replete with action and stirring conflict, with its background of lonely trails, yapping dog teams, fearless men and splendid women. A man's story—the kind a woman loves to read. This is the story of Kirk Brander, a he'er-do-well who left the East because he wanted to prove to his old uncle and guardian that he could make a man of himself. At the end of five years he is satisfied with the experiment and sets his face Eastward never to return. But, unfortunately for his resolution, he reaches The Pas on the eve of the big north-country sporting event, the Hudson Bay Dog Derby. Before he realizes it he is forced to run in the race, and then into a fight to gain control of a new copper mine. How he fought makes a story of the Canadian north that is true to the life being lived there to-day.

PENNY PLAIN

By O. Douglas

A happy story of happy people in the quaint and charming atmosphere of a Scottish town. "Do you wish to read a new novel which will make you happy all the time of your first acquaintance with it, and happy for a long time after, and happy whenever you may chance to think of it? Such a novel is 'Penny Plain.' Miss Douglas comes into our midst when we have wearied ourselves with rumors of strikes and the other contents of the daily paper, making us feel that life is worth living, and holds a great deal of happiness in it for those who will take it."—The British Weekly.

BECAUSE it is the room to which visitors have first and sometimes sole access to, the hall has an architectural and decorative importance that many home-makers—even those who evince unbounded interest in the artistic attributes of their other rooms—frequently appear to entirely under-estimate. And yet, do we not all, in this age of keen competition, appreciate, both in our business and social intercourse, the far-reaching influence of first impressions? In dress and department, in speech and sentiment, we strive to create a favorable impression upon all with whom we come in contact for the first time: hoping thereby to lay eloquently reflect the owner's mental attitude towards chance callers.

The Welcoming Hall

By Collier Stevenson

Before attempting to indicate how a hall may be clothed to play its dual role, let us consider certain of the architectural necessities and possibilities of this first room of the house: as only by a careful consideration of fundamentals can we hope to cope or, perchance, by expansion, as a substitute for that room?

The merging of the hall with the living-room is frequently both practicable and advantageous: as, for instance, in city houses, wherein floor space and natural light are usually at a premium. Weighing against the advantages conferred by the increase in area and illumination, there is, nevertheless, one distinct disadvantage: without a separate hall to serve as a buffer from the outside world, an urban living room, by its greater susceptibility to numerous intrusions through serving both as thoroughfare and family centre, loses somewhat in homeliness, though not necessarily in livableness. For a country house of informal character or for a summer home in mountain or shore resort, the combined living-room and hall is, however, entirely appropriate: because, as a rule, such a room is subject to use only when inclement weather places a ban upon out-of-door activity.

When of fairly generous proportions and yet not sufficiently large for use as a living-room, the entrance-hall can, by the addition of well-chosen furniture, become very useful as a reception-room for the business callers, who inevitably find their way occasionally to any home. A hall treated as a reception-room is likewise a good asset when formal callers arrive while the living-room is in use, as it prevents an intrusion upon the latter room—the "inner sanctuary" of the home. Of course, when the house plans include a separate reception-room, the hall may appropriately be of more modest dimensions, as the general custom is to place the reception-room as near as possible to the main entrance.

The hall that is to function neither as reception-room nor living-room may, with perfect propriety, expand, if part of a large house, into an apartment of generous proportions. In a small house, however, the hall dimensions should be so scaled, that there will be no usurpation of floor space which might, if otherwise employed, perform greater service. Of available architectural types for such a hall, none is more endowed with charm, none more susceptible to embellishment, than the central hall, running the full depth of the house and glass-doored at each end, which we owe to Colonial tradition: unless it be, possibly, the long hall lying parallel with the length of a house and lighted by groups of casement windows, as in its English prototype.

In either of the foregoing types of hall, the most important architectural feature is the staircase: but unfortunately, that very feature is often the most disappointing, because the details of its design are not in harmony with the general treatment of the room. Indeed, in many a modern hall, otherwise eye-satisfying, the diagonally-rising line of the staircase, emphasized by a dark handrail and occasionally by a trivial wainscoting, is only a disturbing element. Better far, then, when there are not funds available to encompass a creditable feature, that the staircase be placed in a hall entirely separate from the entrance-hall—better on the score of

THE LONG HALL

The long hall, lighted by casement windows as in its English prototype, is always full of charm. Here, as a foil to the dark-stained woodwork, the walls of sandfloat plaster are tinted a yellowish-gray. Apart from the bas-relief plaster cast that hangs above the antique chest, the walls are devoid of applied decoration but colorful variation is imparted by the dark-hued Oriental rugs and the gold gauze casement-curtains.

a sure foundation for pleasant future relationships. Upon the first room of the home, it is, therefore, but fitting that meticulous attention should be bestowed, in order that all who enter may be agreeably impressed.

Of course, it must be admitted that the correct habilitation of a hall is not the easiest thing in the world to achieve: for, in the appropriate treatment of the room, there must be a fusion of two apparently radically unrelated qualities—restraint and welcome. Welcome is essential, that the hall may be expressive of the owner's personal feeling toward intimate friends: yet restraint is no less necessary, that the room may just as with this, or any other, home problem.

In the planning of the average home, economy of arrangement, comfort and convenience are the underlying factors—or, at least, they are assumed to be—in the apportioning of space to the various rooms. The function of each room and the relation of one room to the others must, therefore be exhaustively studied at the very outset. How, then, shall the hall be planned? That question can be answered Socratically by another: how is the room to be utilized? Is it to be used as a reception room, an adjunct to the living-room,

A HALL OF ARTISTIC CHARM

Above the paneled wainscoting of ivory-painted wood, the walls of this hall are hung with an interesting paper of quaint block pattern in faint gray and ivory. In the Oriental rugs, as in the printed linen window-hangings, dull old reds, blues and yellows are beautifully blended; and the same rich colorings are combined in the nose-gays applied by decalcomania to the tall, ladder-back, mahogany chairs which flank the drop-leaf table. With the mahogany furniture, the mahogany handrail and treads of the ivory-painted staircase are especially appropriate.

WITH a sigh of exasperation Professor Fawcett closed his notebook, put away his fountain pen, and leaned back in his chair. He did not know whether it was the effect of the wonderful air, or the scenery, or merely mental laziness, but the fact remained that he was not getting on with his book. The book was about the early migrations of the Scandinavian races, and the professor hoped that it would bring him fame and perhaps money; he owned frankly that he was more interested in the latter. Absent-mindedly he lit a cigarette. In the denominational college where he taught mediaeval history the use of tobacco in any form was frowned upon, so these vacation cigarettes had an especial charm.

It was Mrs. Mahala Craig, with pail and scrubbing-brush, who drove him from his happy contemplation of sea and coastline. There was never a day, Mrs. Craig often boasted, that the most fussy man might not have eaten his dinner off the floor of any room in her house. Guests ousted from comfortable positions by their landlady's passion for the mop and the scrubbing-brush sometimes thought that a little dirt and disorder would be preferable. Once an elderly bachelor had ventured to put this feeling into words.

"And if it's dirt you're wanting, why not go across the bay to Lige Card's place?" Mrs. Craig demanded. "There's aplenty of it there, from all accounts. But while I have my health and strength, every floor in this house gets washed twice a week."

The professor fled. He decided to stroll down to the shore and see how Blake's painting was coming on. It was too early in the day for social calls, but if Miss Hilda should happen to be working in the orchard when he passed the Swanson place, there would be no harm in offering to help her. But luck was against him this morning, for a stout, flannel-clad man, somewhat precariously perched on a ladder, was dropping handfuls of cherries into the basket which a girl held for them. So engrossed were they in their work, or in each other, that they did not observe the professor. He was feeling decidedly at odds with the world as he scrambled down a steep path leading to the beach.

In a sheltered spot, Peter Blake had set up his easel, and was doing his best to transfer to canvas the likeness of Stern Point which, across the bay lifted its grey bulk from the Atlantic.

"I'll say you have some picture this time, Peter," the professor remarked, after a scrutiny of his friend's work. In vacation time his vocabulary sometimes relaxed from its usual stiff primness.

The artist gave a shrug of dissatisfaction. "Not bad for a sentimental fair weather view. I would like to paint it in late autumn, with a black sky overhead, breakers hurling spray high into the air, and a close-reefed schooner scudding for shelter."

"I've been thinking we might go over and explore the cape," the professor remarked. "Although this is the first time I've ever been here, the Point seems vaguely familiar. I should like to see it at closer range."

"Be a good place for a day's outing, I should think," Blake rejoined. "There's a big cave, which would be a romantic place to eat our lunch."

"A cave?" exclaimed the professor. "Why, now I remember—that is, I remember hearing Mrs. Craig say there was a cave. The entrance is covered at high water."

"Never heard that. We might go over to-morrow, if it is fine. I have an idea I might find material for several pictures on that side of the bay. We will ask Miss Swanson and her mother, of course. Suppose you go along now and propose the picnic to them. I must finish this picture to-day, and I can't paint with you mooning about. Go help Miss Hilda to pick cherries."

"When I passed just now, she seemed to have all the assistance necessary," said the professor stiffly.

"I suppose you mean that Homer Mason was there. That fellow is likely to break his neck if he doesn't watch out. He is much too old and stout to climb cherry trees."

"Mason isn't one to take chances," replied the professor. "He was perched on a safety ladder—warranted neither to break, collapse, nor tip sideways—one of his presents to Miss Swanson."

"Well, run along and spoil his game," Blake advised. "I guess you can still climb a tree without the help of a safety ladder. Clear out and give me a chance to work. And look here—you needn't invite Mason to our picnic. I'm about fed up with his patronising way of promising to praise my work to some of his millionaire friends, and his unsolicited advice to paint pictures of a more popular type. I suppose his idea of a fine picture is a chromo-lithograph of a chorus girl."

"I have no intention whatever of asking Mr. Mason to join our little party," said the professor stiffly.

Blake shook his head as he watched his friend stride up the steep path from the beach. How did they get like that, he wondered? Why fret and worry over one particular girl, in a world full of girls, all much alike? Hilda Swanson was pretty and well educated, though Blake did not care for that ash-blond type; but Fawcett, he knew, could not afford to marry on his small salary, and it might be years before he got a full professorship. With another shake of the head Blake went back to his work. If this picture, and others which he meant to paint that summer, sold to advantage, it would mean a year's study in Paris, which meant more to him than any girl in the world.

The professor found Mrs. Swanson, whom he did not like, on her verandah. Her conversation bored him, being chiefly of the days when "the captain,"—by this term her little world understood that she meant her deceased husband—had been master and owner of a large barque, taking his wife and daughter with him on most of his voyages.

"I never had to lift my hand to anything," she would remark, with a sigh. "We always had a stewardess, of course, as well as a nursemaid for Hilda when she was little. Later the captain hired an English governess for her, so I never was tied, like some mothers. In port I used to get just tucked out, what with shopping and theatres and visiting the captain's ladies on other ships, but land's sake, once we got to sea again I had nothing to do but rest up."

Mrs. Swanson greeted the professor warmly; far more warmly than she would have done had she known of his interest in her daughter. Homer Mason being reputedly wealthy, was her favorite candidate for a son-in-law. Moreover, Mrs. Swanson always welcomed gladly anybody who would listen to her patiently. The professor asked if Miss Hilda was at home.

"Hilda? She's in the orchard. She promised to let Mrs. Craig have a lot of cherries, seems like, so she's picking them now. I'm glad the captain didn't live to see the day when we would have to sell fruit. When we were in the West Indies, or any of those South American ports, we always had a bunch of bananas hanging aft, besides a big basket of mixed fruits—pineapples and such like—fresh every morning. In those days I wouldn't have looked at a cherry, and little dreamed that sometime I would have to peddle them." Taking out her handkerchief, she prepared to weep.

"I think I will go out and help Miss Hilda," said the professor hastily.

"Well, now, that's real kind of you. Mr. Mason was helping for awhile but he had to write some letters to go out on this mail. If you're a good picker, she can get through in time to go for a sail this afternoon; Mr. Mason asked her to go but she was afraid she couldn't manage it."

Rather grimly the professor took the basket Mrs. Swanson found, and made his way to the orchard.

"Your mother sent me to help so that you might have time to go sailing with Homer Mason," he told Hilda. "I came because I love—picking cherries," he added, as he took off his coat and swung himself into a tree.

"And I love to go sailing," Hilda smiled. "But I do not think I shall go to-day. Those clouds seem to promise a thunder-storm, and Mr. Mason does not know much about managing a boat."

"Can you swim?"

"Like a fish. But I should not care for the responsibility of rescuing Mr. Mason," Hilda laughed. "He looks like a man who would lose his head in an emergency."

"I learned to sail a boat before I was in my teens," the professor said. "We lived in Newfoundland then. My mother was a Norwegian; perhaps that is why I love the sea so much, though now I can only be near it in vacation time."

"Mr. Blake says you are writing a book," Hilda remarked.

"Yes, I hope to finish it this summer, but there seem to be so many distractions—such as Mrs. Craig's passion for cleaning the house inside and out," the professor said. Just now his book seemed unimportant.

IN response to Hilda's questions, he outlined the scope of his book. "I need not tell you that the Scandinavians were the first white people to reach this coast," he said.

"Oh, are you not mistaken? All this coast was originally settled by the French, but most of them moved away when the English-speaking settlers began to come in and take up land. We are still a fairly mixed community, though. My grandfather was shipwrecked on this coast when a young man. He married and settled down on a farm, but his only son, my father, went back to sea."

"I was thinking of the voyages made by Lief Ericson and others," the professor explained. "Two years ago, when making some researches in Christiana, I came across an account of an adventure of a certain Harold Einarsen and his companions. Harold was a ship-master who had been engaged by one Nils Svensen to convey him and his bride to Norway. Nils had married, against her uncle's wishes, a rich Saxon heiress, and the lady carried with her a treasure of jewels and gold, the only part of her fortune which she had been able to secure. Taking the route around Ireland, to avoid the perils of the narrow seas, Harold was blown out of his course by a storm which lasted over a week; he finally managed to bring his ship into a harbor which one of his men remembered having visited some years before, when with Lief Ericson. The place was well wooded, and the first thought of the adventurers was to build temporary shelters, where they could live while making the necessary repairs to their ship. But being attacked by natives, whom they called Skrellings, they took refuge in a cave, which ran back from the base of a high cape. After many discouragements they did succeed in mending their ship and again setting sail, but meantime the Saxon lady, unused to such hardships, had died. The superstitious sailors, who looked upon this lady as the cause of all their misfortunes, forced Harold to leave behind the gold and jewels which she had brought with her. He buried them at the back of the cave, and there, the quaint narrative ends, 'do they remain even unto this day.' This story, which may have been intended merely as a romance, interested me because my grandfather's name was Harold Einarsen."

"But my grandfather was called Nils Svensen," Hilda exclaimed. "He anglicised his name when he married. And the cave—what if it should be the one at the foot of Stern Point? But even if a treasure had once been buried there, over a thousand years ago, it would not be likely to be there now. Probably Harold or Nils later came back for this one."

"But the queer thing is that for the past few nights I've been dreaming that I was Harold Einarsen," the professor went on. "The dream is always the same, and breaks off just as we have decided to bury the treasure. I suppose it is the effect of thinking too much about my book. Hello, it is going to rain."

They had not noticed the approach of a thunder storm. Now, seizing their baskets, they raced for the house, which they reached just as the storm broke. Mrs. Swanson insisted upon having all the doors and windows closed.

"Hilda always argues that nobody around here was ever killed by lightning, but there has to be a first time," she said. "Take that rocker, professor; it has a feather pillow, and they say that feathers don't draw lightning. I always set on this sofa in the corner when there is a thunder storm, because lightning once tore away all this corner of the house, and folks say it never strikes twice in the same place."

The professor said that he must be getting back; Mrs. Craig disliked her boarders to be late for meals, and he had work to do that afternoon.

"Mr. Blake was thinking that if it is fine to-morrow we might sail across to Stern Point for an outing," he added. "We will take our lunch, and picnic in a cave which I understand is there. We hope that you and Miss Hilda will join us."

"Why, I'd just love to," Mrs. Swanson exclaimed. "Seems like I never get to go anywhere these days. After travelling all over the world with the captain, it is pretty dull to be tied down here. But seems to me that a cave will be a damp sort of place to picnic. Not but what some caves are all right inside; I remember once we had a picnic in the Caves of Elephanta, at Bombay, and a better fixed-up place you wouldn't want to see, though I believe not originally made for that purpose."

The professor said that though the local cave could hardly rival in interest those of Elephanta, it would be interesting to explore it; and if it proved damp they could eat their lunch on the beach. So finally he made his escape, clad in an oil-coat and sou' wester of the deceased captain's which Mrs. Swanson had insisted upon his wearing.

"They've been hanging up in the woodshed so long that they're pretty well cracked, but even if they do let in the water here and there, they'll keep off the lightning," she said. "Folks say rubber is as good as feathers to keep it off, and that you couldn't get struck even if you went out in a thunderstorm with no more than a pair of rubbers on."

As the professor hastened homeward he felt himself wondering if it were possible that Hilda would ever become as foolishly loquacious as her mother, but he put the disloyal thought from him. He decided that Hilda had inherited her mental traits from her father, who had been, according to Mrs. Craig, a very able man.

"Not that he didn't make a fool of himself when he married that talkative Milly Davidson, but when it comes to marriage most people are fools," his landlady had ended caustically. She was perhaps thinking of her own case, for the late Craig had been what the neighbors called "a poor provider."

The late captain's raincoat leaked like a sieve, and the professor got thoroughly wet. He had just time to change before the bell rang for lunch. He had the table to himself, neither Blake nor Mason, the only other boarders, being in.

"Mr. Mason got one of them yellow tellygrafts, saying for him to come right back to the city," Mrs. Craig explained. "Seems like he didn't want to go, as he got Jake Card to drive him over to Caxton, so as he could tellygraft to the city himself and find out what all the fuss was about. And Mr. Blake—sometimes

I think that man is just plumb crazy. In he ran, that picture of his under his arm, but in half a wink I seen him tearing down to the shore again. Forgot something, most like; but boarders needn't expect me to keep meals waiting to all hours. I've got my afternoon work to do up."

Blake, dripping wet, ran up the steps in time to hear the last words.

"You beat the little busy bee," he laughed, "for it improves only the shining hours, while you keep at it during the rainy ones too."

"And little wonder, with gentlemen who ought to know better tracking up my clean floors with their muddy shoes," replied the landlady severely. "Next you'll be having pneumonia, and nobody hates sickness in a house more than me."

Blake ran laughing upstairs, saying he would change in a jiffy, and that he hoped Mrs. Craig had kept some mackerel warm for him.

"And so I did, like a fool," she confessed, "though well he knows that it's a rule of this house that them as is late eats cold grub."

long past persists, and last night I had a vivid and rather unpleasant dream about the cave."

"Result of too much lobster for supper," said Peter unfeelingly.

The tide necessitated an early start next morning, and at six o'clock Peter set out to escort Hilda and her mother to the shore, where the professor would have the boat ready. When they arrived, the lunch baskets, camera, and other picnic necessities had been stored away, and the professor was ready to push off. It was not until they were half across the bay that Peter stumbled over the pick-axe and spade, hidden under a spare sail.

"For goodness sake, professor, why didn't you clear the boat out?" he cried. "What does old Wills want with a pick-axe? New way to dig clams, maybe."

"It was I who included those tools in our impedimenta," said the professor stiffly.

"What a thing it is to have an education," exclaimed Blake with mock admiration. "What's the great idea?"

Peter stared. "You would eat that lobster again last night, though you know what it does to you," he said. "May I ask, Miss Hilda, if you also had lobster for supper?"

Before Hilda could speak her mother said, "No, we had macaroni and cheese. But there Hilda is like her father's folks. They all had queer dreams. I've known the captain to wake up yelling like an Indian, because he had dreamed that a kraaken had grabbed his boat, though what a kraaken was he never seemed rightly to know. I'm no hand at dreaming, I'm glad to say. From the time my head touches the pillow I know no more until the alarm clock goes off."

There was a worried frown on Peter's face, as he regarded the professor and Hilda, talking together in low tones in the stern of the boat. If they began to have identical dreams, he feared his friend's fate was sealed.

THERE was but a light breeze, and it took them two hours to cross the bay. When they had landed the

"For the land's sakes! What you got there?"

When Blake had dulled the first edge of his hunger he began to rave about the sketches of Stern Point which he had made during the storm. "There was the sky black as ink overhead, and the sea, suddenly turned black too, sulking at its foot. I sat under a big spruce and sketched away. The spruce was so thick that I hardly knew that it was raining; didn't get really wet until I started for home."

"You are old enough to know better than to sit under trees in a thunder storm," his friend rejoined.

"Piffle! You talk like Mrs. Swanson. By the way, now about that picnic? I met old Peter Mills on the way up, and he said we could have his boat if you sailed her. He has to go to town himself and doesn't seem to have much confidence in my seamanship."

The professor said that Mrs. Swanson had accepted his invitation, and that he would speak to Mrs. Craig about making some sandwiches. "I must confess that I am anxious to get a close view of the cape. That feeling of having seen it at some time

The professor flushed and hesitated. Hilda asked softly if he had dreamed again about the cave. He nodded silently.

"I dreamed about it too," she said. "Such a dreadful dream. It seems confused now, but there was fighting—a few big men fighting a host of squat savages. One tall man had a gold bracelet on his left arm which was too big for him. In the fight the bracelet fell off, and as the man stooped to recover it one of the savages hit him on the head and I woke up with a scream."

"That was Harold Einarsen," said the professor. "My dream was much the same as yours, except that it went further. The Norsemen drove the Skrellings out of the cave, and the incoming tide cut off their retreat around the cape, so that all who were not killed in the fight were drowned. Then the Norsemen buried the treasure, and put to sea hastily, before other Skrellings should come to avenge their friends."

His right hand strayed mechanically to his left arm, with a motion as if pushing something back into its place.

professor proposed that Peter and the others should walk along the beach to see if they could find a spring of fresh water, while he explored the cave.

"There might be snakes there, or even a bear," he explained.

"You mean that you want to dig for something you dreamed about, and don't want us around to laugh at you," Peter said bluntly.

"Of course we shall all help Professor Fawcett to look for the Norsemen's treasure," declared Hilda.

"Land's sakes, Hilda, are you crazy?" demanded her mother, peering into the cave. "What would anybody want to bury things in there for? And that place is damp, just like I said it would be. You young folks can do as you like, but I'm going to make a fire out on the beach here with some driftwood and make me a good cup of tea."

Peter gallantly volunteered to make the fire, but when it was blazing, and a kettle suspended over it, he slipped back to the others. The cave, he noted, sloped sharply up-

THE Linvilles' dining room certainly looked cosy in the morning light. A fire crackled sociably in the grate, trying to outshine the gay little sunbeams that came boldly in and stationed themselves on the soft browns and blues of the rug, whose Oriental pattern was such a delight to Haidee. Dainty china displayed in the cabinet, the new sideboard aglitter with silver, and the round table at which two people were breakfasting, all the fresh appointments, tattled: "Bride and groom."

The clock on the mantel struck eight. Garf Linville, wholesomely handsome, cleared his throat.

"The new cook's a failure, Haidee. Better discharge her at once. Try for one who knows enough to put salt in the porridge and boil the eggs instead of the tea." He looked ruefully at the nearly raw mixture oozing from the shell in his egg cup.

"I told Mamie to coddle the eggs, Garf. It's a more hygienic way than to boil them," apologized his wife, "but I suppose I failed to make the method clear to her."

"Don't exert yourself to explain." His tone was crusty.

Happening to see the expression of her husband's face exaggerated in the shining brass water kettle, Haidee could not help laughing. Though she showed delicious dimples when she smiled and Garf adored dimples, just then they didn't appeal to him. He felt he'd like to say something to punish her. Abruptly pushing back his chair he got up and flung out a taunt:

"Though I love company, and we never have any, it is a fortunate thing to-day that this rule obtains in the house. Had I brought Jennings with me last night as I was tempted to do when he missed the local to Hartwell, I should have felt disgraced to have a meal like this served to him. You might at least see that the greenhorns you employ understand your orders. I won't come to lunch. I'll make sure that I get one digestible meal to-day." Then he strode out of the room and his wife heard the front door bang.

Her dimples were not visible now. For a minute she sat very still. Then the hurt look on her face changed. "If 'the worm will turn,' I'll follow its example," vowed she.

Running across the hall into the living room, she opened a drawer in her writing table and took out a small notebook. She made an entry, then counted aloud here and there as she turned the pages. Silently she consoled with herself:

"We have been married three months and Garf has made that hateful 'I-love-company-but-we-never-have-any' speech exactly fifteen times. That means he's been angry with me just that often for he always says it when he loses his temper. He has said it this morning for the last time. He forgets about the days he has brought men unexpectedly to lunch. Yes, and there's the surprise dinner I had for him on his birthday, I invited four of his particular friends on that occasion. And what about the two weeks his mother spent with us and the week-end visits of his sisters? Garf seems entirely unconscious of his exaggeration habit," she sighed.

After a little, all lugubriousness left her. Quick to think and act, she declared war and at once planned her military operations. The first step was to make an alphabetical list of all their friends. Something made her laugh several times while doing it. This done, she went out to the kitchen where the maid was scrubbing the floor.

"Mamie," she began, "I have decided that you are too young and inexperienced to suit me. I need a cook who knows how to go ahead with her work. I'm sorry I can't keep you until you get in somewhere else, but I'll give you two weeks' extra pay instead of the usual notice. As I want to put some one in your place to-day you may go up to your room now and pack."

The girl did not appear affronted but answered politely:

"I feel myself, ma'am, that I don't know enough to get on well in a place like this, but I wish I did, for you're a real lady—you always speak so kind to me. No notice don't make no difference. It's not as if I had no home to go to." She dried her hands leisurely, put coal on the fire, adjusted the draughts and disappeared up the backstairs.

Mrs. Linville consulted the Telephone Directory and was soon in communication with a Domestic Service Bureau.

While eating his solitary lunch at the Whip Cafe Garf's thoughts turned homeward.

"Poor little girl! I was a thing to speak to her as I did. Why in thunder didn't she cry? She always did before. Perhaps there'll be a shower to-night. I'll make it up to her, by jove! I'll take one of the new books home with me and read it aloud after dinner. She's a darling. She never says nasty things that she has to eat afterwards."

With a smile of approval at his meritorious intentions he visited a bookstore when the going-home hour arrived, and on reaching his own door half an hour later, let himself in with his latchkey. He listened a minute. Surely that was Atherton's voice that he heard. What was the duffer saying to amuse his wife? He never noticed before how prettily she laughed. Evidently she hadn't spent the day in tears. He felt slightly aggrieved. As he hung his hat on the hat-tree and threw off his coat, Austin's bass roar reached him, followed by a feminine squeal:

"Horrible! Perfectly horrible!" How the r's rolled.

"Miss Adderley, confound it!" ran his thoughts. Mentally he saw her large beaked nose, dimmish blue eyes, and bobbing artificial curls.

"What's going on? What's Haidee up to now?" he muttered.

The young husband's suspense was brief. As he entered their "homish" drawing-room his wife came forward, charming in the gown he liked best.

"So you have come, Garf! See what a surprise I have for you. I've persuaded these good-natured people to dine with us."

"The deuce!" was his answering thought, and he was astonished to find how disappointed he felt. It was quite clear that there would be no cosy read with Haidee that evening. He had told her at breakfast that he loved company. Well, here was company—why was he feeling so blue about it?

"Oh, Mr. Linville, what a paradise of a home you have!" gushed Miss Adderley, as they sat down to dinner. "Really now, you and Mrs. Linville are a modern Adam and Eve, only much more humane than the ancient ones. How tiresome it was of them to bring such misery into this lovely world all through so trifling a thing as an apple. Horrible! Perfectly horrible! was it not?" Again the r's rolled.

"Oh—ah—yes. Quite so, quite so. You are right, as usual, Miss Adderley," responded the host, but his thoughts were: "The silly thing! I detest an old maid who doesn't know she is one."

The non-mind-reader looked coyly at him. "Oh, Mr. Linville, you are so complimentary!" she simpered.

Although the dinner was a gem, and there was company to help eat it, if Linville was enjoying himself he wasn't conscious of the fact.

When the evening had worn away, he scarcely waited till their guests were on the other side of the front door before ejaculating:

"Haidee, what possessed you to invite such a ill-assorted trio to dinner and—where did you get the new cook?"

Haidee's eyes danced as she replied: "Well, you see, dear, their names begin with A and—"

"Eh?"

"And," continued she, provokingly ignoring his curiosity, "the Domestic Service Bureau sent me Suzette as soon as I telephoned them this morning. She was waiting to step into the first attractive place that offered—situation, she termed it, and arranged with me for a salary, not wages."

Garf reflected. "I think I understand," he observed.

"You'll credit me now with having company once, won't you, you inappreciative man?" teased Haidee.

"The less said the better," sagely remarked her husband. "But if you encourage Miss Adderley to come here, she'll be harder to shake off than a dog's hairs from a coat." He knew how vigorously he had to brush his own clothes to remove Togo's hairy souvenirs from them.

"I brought something to read to you this evening," he went on, "but we'll reserve it for to-morrow night." He yawned as though utterly tired out. Thinking he detected a sparkle of mischief in Haidee's pretty eyes, he watched her reflection in the mirror as she stood braiding the wavy masses of her red-brown hair.

"I rather enjoyed our little dinner party. I think Miss Adderley would be in a book if Dickens—" Haidee's thoughts became indefinite as she settled into the sleep of one who has made the enemy wince.

THE next night Garf actually ran up the front steps, slammed the door after him and called out boyishly:

"I say, Haidee, let's hurry through dinner and get at our book."

His wife peeped out of the dining room and held up a warning finger. "Sh-h-h, some folks are in there," indicating the drawing-room.

He kissed her without sound. "To dinner?" he whispered.

"Yes," she whispered back. "I asked Mr. Bell and Mr. Ball to come in sociably."

Garf looked blank. "Thun—that is, how jolly! Awfully thoughtful of you, little girl," and he slowly went to do his duty.

Mr. Bell, pudgy and red, and Mr. Ball, gawky and pale—both in the late fifties—caused no disquietude when apart, but when brought together they were suggestive of a chemical fuse.

Unthinkingly Linville started he table conversation on politics.

"I tell you," thundered Mr. Bell, giving the table a blow that sent his spoon ringing against his glass, "that every man of them in office should be taken out and shot!"

"The government's all right!" pounded Mr. Bell in return. "Everybody knows that when your party was in power the graft was beyond the telling. Only a bullheaded ignoramus would attempt to deny it!"

Mr. Bell's face purpled. That's an insult, sir, a clear insult! No man shall call me a bullheaded ignoramus! We'll settle—"

A merciful choking ended the controversy, but during the remainder of their stay there were ominous threats of a renewal which made Linville squirm on his chair. He envied Haidee, she did not appear at all nervous.

"I think company is very diverting," commented she demurely when the bellicose gentlemen had left.

"Certainly," agreed Garf; "but I'm curious to know how you happened to hit on that combination."

"Why, they're B's," she informed him.

His perplexed expression made her so merry that he turned sulky and went off to bed.

A sound night's sleep brought back the lover Garf. He was ready to approve of anything his wife might do. On arriving home at dinner time he fancied he was glad to find Mr. and Mrs. Chester and two little Chesters the guests for that evening.

But he was still a man. When the tornado-like children tore through the house leaving mischief behind them and their parents talked on, unmoved, Linville wanted to shake the small torments till their bones rattled. "Haidee's some hostess, all right," he silently complimented, after glancing at her unclouded face.

At length a statuette fell with a crash and lay headless on the hardwood floor. The children clapped their hands.

"Serves the naughty lady right. She should 'a had her clothes on," said the girl. "Mamma won't let me go in the parlor without my dress."

Mr. and Mrs. Chester laughed at this speech—they thought it so cute—even while expressing regret to their hostess.

"No more of that, Haidee!" exploded Garf when they were alone again.

"Why, Garf," reminded his wife slyly, "I asked the Chesters for your sake."

Entangling threatening, Garf's tone suddenly became bland. "Of course I like company. I intended to say 'don't invite any more youngsters,'" he answered.

"Oh!" said Haidee.

Garf looked at her sharply, but her face was expressionless.

CONSCIENTIOUSLY Haidee carried on her campaign. The D's, the E's and the F's were in turn asked to dine, and after they gave out she varied the warfare by having a few tables of G's and H's in for cards.

Linville began to wish six p.m. would not come so soon. He never knew what new torture he would have to undergo on reaching home. It had come to that now. He truly detested the word company and the sight of visitors in his house. He suffered the more because he tried to conceal this fact from his wife. He called himself all kinds of names for having made the speeches that had brought this avalanche of guests upon him. Besides, financing the thing was reducing his bank account alarmingly. The cook's wages (salary be hanged!) were abominably high. It became really fatiguing to dissemble, but he goaded himself on. He wondered despondently how long Haidee could keep the show moving. The worst of it was she seemed to have gradually gained a liking for this sort of life.

One night on opening the front door he sniffed deliverance.

"Aromatic spirits of ammonia, by Jingol!" he exclaimed.

A guilty hope animated him. His wife always used this remedy when suffering with a sick headache. If she had one now there would be no company that evening. He would shut himself up in the living room with his pipe and newspaper and enjoy himself. It was time he brushed up a little on current events. He was sorry for Haidee to be in pain—but really he—

"Garf," came faintly from upstairs.

"Yes, darling, coming," he called, hope rising with each step he climbed. Smilingly he entered her room.

"Garf, I'm so sorry I can't entertain this evening. I'm feeling awfully sick, but—"

"I'm glad of it!" he interrupted. "I mean I'm glad there won't be company—"

But he suddenly remembered that he loved company. "That is, dear, I'll try to be happy without it tonight, since—"

Haidee broke in:

"Oh, but, Garf, you shan't be disappointed! Suzette telephoned mother and she is in the house now getting things ready for Mr. Jennings. You are so fond of him I'm glad he happened to be a J."

"Is Haidee's mind wandering?" thought her husband, and he looked at her closely to see if she appeared feverish. There was no color in her cheeks. As he could think of nothing to say he gave her hand some sympathetic pats.

Then the door bell sounded.

"There he is," said Haidee, putting up her lips for a farewell kiss.

Linville went disconsolately out of the room. It was true he and Jennings had always been chums, but he wished him at the North Pole just then.

Haidee was as active as ever the next day, and when Garf came home she asked, after kissing him, "Do you mind if we are quite alone this evening, Garf?"

Did he mind!

"Sweetheart, if you knew how I long to be a—"

He forgot for a minute.

"I mean to say, how I long for you to stop wearing yourself out in my behalf. It must be very tiring to entertain as you've been doing."

"It doesn't tire me at all, I like having company. I often wonder how I lived with so little of it when we were first married. It is not surprising that you rebelled at our quiet life."

Away down deep inside of himself Garf said something.

Haidee continued naively: "I was going to tell you that I've set my heart on giving a Dickens Party—did you speak, dear?—on the fourteenth, and I want you to personate Mr. Mantalini. You can study the character a little every night so you'll be able to do your part perfectly."

She looked so adorable that Linville felt he would promise her anything. Consequently he victimized himself and spent the intervening time making Mr. Mantalini's acquaintance.

WHEN the Dickens night arrived all the remaining people on the alphabetical list flocked to the Linville's house that twinkled invitingly.

Unfortunately some of the K's had quarrelled with the L's and M's, and quite a few of the N's, O's and P's looked down on the Q's, R's and S's, regarding themselves as too aristocratic to associate with the latter, whom they considered plebeians. Happily, those who finished out the list were sensible, peace-loving souls.

Linville had been made to read the entire volume in which Mr. Mantalini lives, and had found some parts dry

At the first opportunity the minister drew his wife aside and confided:

"Really, my dear, I'm forced to conclude that there must be a decided inclination to profanity in our host! Personating Mantalini can not justify the—the—excessive warmth with which he utters those very objectionable words which you know without my quoting them."

"Oh, my dear Hector, who would have thought it! How very sad!" exclaimed the lady, who considered her husband's opinions infallible. "I pity his little wife."

Withdrawing from contaminating contact with their antagonists, while disposing of their ices, a group of guests took possession of the hall cosy corner.

"Where did you get the cook?"

reading. But as he moved about among the guests he felt "demmit" and said "demmit" with great relish. It was some compensation for all he had suffered during the past weeks. This compensation was augmented when he observed the pompous Mr. Bumble, the beadle, alias Mr. Yale, pastor of the church he and Haidee attended. He recalled the long sermons he had sat through while politely suppressing yawns that were painfully insistent. He was sure too that some unwelcome truths had been armed covertly at him. Here was a chance to even things a little.

Cornering the unsuspecting divine, he let fly "demd-demnition-demmit" missiles that stunned the Dickens-like beadle. Noting with keen satisfaction the effect of his rendition, Linville turned away to exercise his elocutionary gifts on others.

"What an uncomfortable affair this has been!" complained a peevish K.

"Couldn't be worse," supplemented a supercilious M.

"To think of jumbling us up with Rosses and Salters," sneered a suddenly-rich N.

"It shows how little Mrs. Linville knows about successful entertaining."

The others looked admiringly at the aristocratic O who had made this declaration.

These remarks overheard by Linville set him thinking. "It is singular that Haidee left out the Andersons, Dudleys and Barretts—they are charming people—and invited a set I don't care a hang for. Good," he said under his breath, "they're moving!" Then he went to help Haidee.

A portly V lingered a minute. "What a very unusual function, my dear Mrs. Linville," he remarked with an oily smile. "A great success, I assure you," and he bowed low.

"Not a bad sort," thought Linville, as the Pecksniffian figure passed out.

"What did you think of the party, Mr. Mantalini?" asked Haidee sweetly when the buzz of the evening had ceased.

"Demmit! Demmit!" answered Garf.

They both laughed.

"I've used up all the letters, and will have to begin with A again," she said, a meditative wrinkle showing in her forehead.

"Eh?" queried he.

"You dear old stupid, don't you see you've been subjected to an alphabetical cure?" demanded Haidee, moving nearer to him.

Garf looked dazed for a minute, then an understanding of the whole scheme came to him, and he laughed till his cheeks were wet.

"Well," said he, wiping the tears from his face, "I'm cured, darling, entirely cured. I simply loathe company. Let the letters stay where they belong, for I won't live if you go through the thing again!"

"You poor boy!" sympathized triumphant Haidee. "What a pity, for your sake, that the cure has had quite the opposite effect on me."

"I'd throw myself across my knee if I could and give myself the thrashing I deserve," responded Garf gloomily. "Haidee," wistfully, "you used to say I was the only company you wanted."

"Yes, once I felt that way," she acknowledged, "but at one time I didn't like olives and now I can't get enough of them."

"You mean," pursued her husband, "that in your affections olives and company are synonymous words?"

She nodded assent.

"Then," exclaimed he, "'the demd total' is that I've been a goat!"

Haidee looked at him with shining eyes. "Are you really sorry for all those 'I-love-company-but-we-never-have-any' speeches, Garf?" she asked softly.

"I am more than sorry. I hate myself for all the tears I made you shed over them." His mournful expression satisfied her.

"Then, dear, we'll call a cessation of hospitality, for," here she hid her face on his shoulder, "I was only teasing you. I don't like an overdose of company either, and it has been an awful punishment to me as well as to you to entertain all those letters of the alphabet."

"Truelove, I robbed the stage when I made you Mrs. Linville," declared Garf, hiding Haidee in his strong arms.

Robbing Peter

FRANCES Wakefield had not been in charge of the Library more than a few months when she first noticed Paul. He was standing, hands deep in the pockets of his shabby little trousers, legs wide apart, gazing at the sign which read.

"DON'T BREAK THE COVERS OF BOOKS;

DON'T TURN DOWN THE CORNERS OF THE LEAVES;

DON'T SCRIBBLE ON THEM;

FOR BOOKS ARE YOUR BEST FRIENDS;

TREAT THEM AS YOU WOULD SOMEBODY YOU LOVE."

"Gee!" Paul exclaimed at length, "I never thought of that!"

Frances had left her desk and crossed the big room till she stood just behind him.

"Do you like to read?" she asked, watching his intense face.

Paul glanced up and smiled in a half-shy way. "I guess I do—when I can get books to read."

"Is this the first time you've been here?"

"No. Once—oh, a long time ago—I sneaked in one day on my way to school. I wanted to see what was inside."

"Didn't you like it after you found out?"

Paul shifted his feet uneasily. "Y—yes. I wanted to come and stay forever and ever. But Ma—"

He paused, and in a flash Frances understood, and finished for him.

"She thought you had enough reading at school, didn't she?"

"Yes"—Paul looked surprised—"how did you know?"

Frances laughed sympathetically. "Oh, I know. I had a mother once, and when I was a little girl I wanted to read all the time, when I should have been helping her."

"And wouldn't she let you?" Paul was becoming interested.

"Just a little bit every day. So you see I always had something to look forward to while I was doing things I didn't much want to."

There was a pause, and then Paul pointed to the sign, which hung with a number of others, on the wall in front of him.

"Ma would laugh at that," he remarked. "She says there's no sense in books, anyway, except to learn out of."

"Well," said Frances, slowly, "even school-books feel hurt when you throw them on the floor, or tear their pages. Did you ever think of that?"

"No—not till now. I—I put a big blot on my grammar yesterday. And—and I drew some pictures of Mr. Hardy to-day in my 'rithmetic book. I'll remember not to do it ever again."

Frances did not reply; she felt he was indeed a pitiful little being. He followed her into the children's section. There were little low tables with small sturdy chairs around them, and on every side rows and rows of books up to the ceiling. It was very late in the afternoon, and the room was deserted. Paul ran his hand along the backs of the books on the nearest shelf.

"Oh!" he gasped, and his face was alight with joy, "here's 'Robinson Crusoe' and 'Around the World in Eighty Days.' I've read them. I got them for Christmas once."

It was as if he had found two boon companions in a strange country. Frances reached high above his head and pulled out "Thirty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea."

"How would you like to read another book by the man who wrote 'Around the World in Eighty Days?'" she asked.

"Gee! I guess I would!" Then he looked slowly around the room, standing on tiptoe in an effort to read the titles on the top shelves.

"I wasn't in here before," he announced, finally. "Can I read every single book in this room?"

Frances laughed, and her laughter was akin to tears. "Every single, solitary one. You can begin at the door and work around. See, there's a ladder for you to push around and climb up on for the high ones."

Paul held out his hand for "Thirty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea".

"I think I'll begin now. Ma's away for a little while."

Frances smiled a little smile, all to herself, and put him into one of the small sturdy chairs at a little low table with the afternoon light streaming in through a big window behind him. Then she left him, and she sat in the next room where she could see him through the open door. He was a handsome little fellow, well-built, with a face tanned to that bronze colour one sees among the dwellers in the North country. He had a shock of black hair, and Indian ancestry manifested itself in his high cheek-bones, thin nose, and the keen look which often came into his black eyes. Frances watched him, as he devoured page after page, and wondered—

After a long while she went back and spoke to Paul. He was thirty thousand leagues under the sea, and, for the time being, the world of human beings and supper-time and hum-drum things did not exist for him.

"Do you know what time it is?" Frances asked. There was no answer, so she repeated the question. Paul stirred and looked up. In his eyes was the far-away look of dwellers in wide spaces; the Indian blood in him was very strong.

"Is it late?"

"It's your supper-time, and mine, too."

"Paul glanced longingly at the book. 'I'd rather not have any supper,' he objected.

"But you see I have to close this place now, while I'm at my supper. See, we'll arrange it so that you shall take the book away with you and bring it back as soon as you've read it—"

"No, no," Paul interrupted, hurriedly, "Ma'll be back 'most any time, and I'd never get a chance to finish it if I took it home. She—she'd be awful mad if she found it lying 'round. She'd find it even if it was hid. 'N' she'd give me more chores to do, 'cause she'd say I didn't have enough to keep me busy."

"I see," said Frances. "Never mind. You run home and get your supper now. I'll keep the book here safely for you, and we'll see what we can do."

That was the beginning of the friendship between Frances Wakefield and Paul, the little, eager half-breed of the North country.

THERE is a great, golden river that flows across the continent, from the wide yellow wheat-fields of the West. In the North country it meets the steel-blue waters of the greatest of those five inland seas. Frances Wakefield and Paul, and a few thousand other people lived at this point. And this is how Peter comes in.

Peter's daily bread, which was quite well-buttered, was made out of wheat in more senses than one. He was interested in the flowing of that great golden river. It has to continue smoothly year after year; otherwise there is hardship. A bumper crop always filled Peter with boundless enthusiasm and, it kept him very busy.

Peter had been to town any number of times before it occurred to him to go to the Library. He might not have gone even then, if he had not happened to want some information about wheat in a dry-as-dust book. As it happened, Paul chose to go to the Library for his daily treat at exactly the same time, and they ascended the wide stone steps and went in side by side. It was half-past twelve, and the girl at the desk told Peter that Miss Wakefield would know about the wheat-book he wanted, and she wasn't back from lunch. So Peter declared his intention of waiting. The girl went back to the book she was reading, and Peter looked around him.

It was very quiet, and the mid-day sun peeped in between the delicate green leaves of English ivy which grew in pots and was trained over the windows and along wires strung high up across the room. It was refreshingly cool, and Peter wandered about contentedly. Eventually he reached the children's section, and found Paul, sitting in his accustomed spot, with his elbows on the table. His black eyes skimming down the pages of the book in front of him. There were three or four other children scattered around the room, deeply absorbed, but Peter noticed only the one little person. He stood watching Paul for a few moments, and then exclaimed,

"Jove! But you do read fast!"

All the little heads looked up in surprise, and Paul, with his finger to his lips, got up and came to the door. Once outside, he explained solemnly.

"You ain't allowed to talk in there. It's against the rules. I s'pose you didn't see that sign, there, that tells you not to."

"No," Peter admitted, "I missed it. It was very careless of me."

Paul walked past him and pointed to the wall near the entrance. "Did you ever think about that?" he inquired, with such a solemn face that Peter could scarcely repress a smile.

"Don't break the covers of books—" Peter read the five lines aloud. "Yes—that's true enough."

"Miss Wakefield thought of that," Paul informed him.

"Who is Miss Wakefield?"

Paul gazed at him a moment—astounded at such ignorance.

"She—why, she runs this place. She knows what's in every book. And there are thousands and thousands She—"

"That's so. I know now. I'm waiting for her."

Paul made his mouth round in a silent "Oh" and went back to his reading without more ado. In a few minutes Frances Wakefield arrived, disappeared for a moment, and came back with her hat off, smiling in a friendly way at Peter.

"I am told," Peter began, "by a young man who seems to be quite at home here, that you know what is in every one of these books."

Frances laughed. "That's Paul. He has a very high opinion of this Library."

She was very pretty. Her hair was soft and reddish-gold; and her eyes seemed to change colour as she moved in light and shadow—sometimes grey, from that to hazel, and at other times a deep blue. She was small and slim, and when she smiled Peter almost forgot about wheat and the dry-as-dust book. He stood for several moments saying nothing at all. His manners for the moment were really atrocious. Finally he realized that he was being asked a question.

"Oh, what I wanted. Oh, yes. It was Billings' 'Wheat Trade in the West'. You have it?"

Frances disappeared behind some towering bookcases and came back in a minute with Billings.

"You will be quiet over on that side," she remarked, "if you want to make notes."

Peter thanked her, and sought a secluded corner. As he was taking the book back to the desk Paul departed, saying something to Frances as he went out.

"He looks a bright fellow," was Peter's comment.

Frances's face was at once alive with interest. "Paul is going to have a wonderful future, I think. He is my own particular charge. I've grown very fond of him."

"It's quite mutual," Peter said, smiling.

"Perhaps. But it's so pitiful. He was just starving for books—real boy books of adventure—pirates and Red Indians and hairbreadth escapes. You know the kind."

Peter nodded, and waited for her to continue.

"His mother is a hard-worked woman with a big family to look after. I found that out when I went to beg her to let Paul spend an hour here at noon every day—reading. She nearly died at first—at the mere idea. Really, if I hadn't been so in earnest, I know I'd have laughed at the horrified way she objected."

She paused and glanced at Peter as if she were afraid he was bored.

"Please go on," he urged, but it must be admitted that his interest did not lie wholly in the misfortunes of Paul.

"Well, I succeeded, finally, with the help of Paul's father. He is a big, good-looking Indian down from the North-West. I think he is secretly proud of the way Paul gets on at school, and he said that an hour off at noon wouldn't hurt, if he helped at home other times."

"So that settled it?"

"Yes. In the winter he eats his dinner in no time—I hope it won't ruin his digestion—and he manages to have nearly an hour before it's time for school in the afternoon. If he spends more than an hour in the summer, he forfeits the next day's treat. Poor little fellow!" She broke off suddenly, and Peter said,

"By Jove! And I made him lose several precious minutes to-day. I committed the sin of speaking in the children's reading room, and he had to instruct me in the way I should go."

Frances smiled. "This is a dreadfully strict place."

"Sometimes there are compensations for restriction," Peter replied, gazing impersonally at a row of big ferns and flowering plants on the top of one of the bookcases. Then he took himself off quickly, lest he should entirely lose sight of the fact that his real business in the North Country was wheat, and not watching reddish-gold hair, and eyes that were never twice the same colour.

BEFORE the end of the summer it became evident that Paul had a rival, who ran him a close second in attendance at the Library. Officially, their objects were the same. Peter, by September, had looked at every book remotely touching on the subject of wheat which the Library possessed. He could not have told you, however, what was in any of them. Paul, on the other hand, took a keen interest in hunting for treasures in the South Sea Islands, and he pursued big game in Africa, sailed the high seas, and followed many thrilling adventures as the weeks went by.

One day in September, when the fields were full of golden-rod and the first tang of Autumn was in the air, Peter stopped at Frances' desk, as usual, for a few minutes.

"Did you find what you wanted?" she asked pleasantly.

"Er—no, not exactly. I was looking for something about Number One Hard."

She sighed. "You seem to have to be very careful not to get different kinds of wheat mixed up. It would look all alike to me."

"Oh, so you haven't always lived near the wheat country?"

"No," her voice was a little wistful. "I lived down by the sea until a while ago. Now I am by myself, and I am learning to like the North-country. Paul has taught me to like it. We go on hikes, and he teaches me the ways of the Indians. He is a wonderful child."

Then Peter had an inspiration.

"Have you been in one of the big grain elevators?" he asked.

She shook her head.

"To-morrow is Saturday. So I'll arrange to take you into the big Holton-Breen one in the afternoon. Will you go?"

That is how, on the following afternoon, Frances Wakefield happened to go down to the busy, crowded waterfront, and up to the top of one of the great concrete buildings that look, at a distance, for all the world like Greek temples with massive pillars. The air inside was filled with the fine white dust from the wheat, and everything was coated an inch thick with it. They reached the top in a little cage, and Peter felt that now he was on his own ground. He showed her the great round bins, and one that was being emptied, in which you looked down and down into black space. Afterwards, they opened one of the dusty little windows and looked out. Beneath them lay the panorama of the shipping, with the thin encircling arms of the breakwater enclosing it. A big passenger steamer was coming in the entrance to the harbour, leaving a trail of black smoke far behind her. It was a glorious bright day, and the distant outer water was blue as a flashing sapphire, with saucy little whitecaps dancing upon it.

"It's beautiful, isn't it?" The sunlight was reflected in Frances' eyes. "Look at the way those gulls over there flash in the sun."

"Yes," Peter replied, but he was not looking at the gulls.

They leaned farther out and saw, directly below them, a big freighter being loaded with wheat. Her hatches were wide open, and two "legs" from the elevator were pouring golden streams of the grain into her hold, raising a cloud of white dust, which drifted slowly away.

"Now that," explained Peter, "is Number One Hard. See how red it is. Mighty fine grain, that!"

The crew of the freighter, gathered in little groups on the deck, were smoking and joking, amusing themselves while the elevator hands regulated the flow of the grain into the yawning hatches. Snatches of their good-natured banter floated up, even through the steady noise of the pouring grain.

"A lot goes into a loaf of bread, doesn't it?" Frances looked at Peter and smiled. "It's a wonderfully interesting life you have—this business of wheat."

Peter drew his head in, and said, very quietly,

"I want you to share it—because I love you and love you and love you—and, somehow—it doesn't seem worth while without you. Will you marry me, Frances?"

She was very still, and he could see that her lower lip was trembling ever so little. He waited, and his heart sounded far louder to him than the swishing of the grain outside. Then he noticed that she was watching something below.

"I—I can't," she said at last—it was almost a whisper—"I—couldn't go away from here—just now—Mr.—"

"I thought you knew my name was Peter," he broke in.

She smiled a little, trembly smile. "I'll show you the reason—Peter." She pointed below, and Peter put his head out and looked down.

On the concrete wharf, with his hands in his pockets, intently watching the falling grain, stood Paul.

DURING the winter, Paul graduated from stories of wild Indians and treasure trove, and began to take a great interest in reading about the engineering feats of the world. He had a retentive memory, and he used to ask Frances, at odd times, if she knew that the Forth Bridge in Scotland was over five thousand feet long, or that this and that marvellous thing existed. He was filled with the wonder of the world that lay beyond the horizon that he knew. Frances noticed a dawning restlessness in him, and she wondered—

She used to write long letters to Peter about Paul. She was a very foolish little person, and she did not realize that Paul was the last person Peter wanted to hear about. She did not know that he groaned aloud when her letters reached him, many hundreds of miles away, and that he gave thanks for the small mercy of hearing from, though not about her.

So they went, and Peter ordered the most expensive lunch the town could give them, and, since they were both in a foolish frame of mind, they pretended they were in the Ritz-Carlton instead of the Superior Restaurant, and enjoyed themselves immensely. Afterwards they went for a little walk, and Peter asked suddenly,

"Do you know why I came up this time?"

"No. Unless it was to remind the town that it's time to tidy up and look pretty, because Spring's on the way, and the wheat 'll be coming through here by and by."

"Please don't joke. I came to see if you'd changed your mind. It means—it means a good deal to me."

She went back and spoke to Paul. He was thirty thousand leagues under the sea.

Then one day, when the ice was breaking up in the harbour, and the snow was almost gone on the surrounding hills, Peter came into the Library. Frances would probably not have admitted that there was a happy feeling all of a sudden around her heart—but there was, nevertheless.

Peter held out his hand, and looked around to make sure that they were alone. "How is Our Lady of the Snows?"

"Preparing to thaw out and blossom with the flowers in a little while."

Peter mumbled something about the blossom being everlasting.

"You didn't mention in your last letter that you were coming up."

"No," smiled Peter, "I just came. How's Paul?" It took a deal of effort to bring out that question, but Frances was delighted to answer it.

"Oh, he's simply eating up every book I can find for him on bridges and tunnels and steam engines and so on. Maybe he'll turn out to be a great engineer."

"Perhaps he will," agreed Peter. "It's time for lunch. I'd suggest that you dig up that assistant of yours and leave her here in her glory, while you come and have lunch with me."

The laughter died out of her eyes, and she dared not look at him.

"I—I don't know," she stumbled over her words, "there's Paul, still."

Peter stood still, and exclaimed, "Damn Paul! At least—I—I beg your pardon. Jove! I didn't mean to hurt you—dear heart."

Frances had gasped suddenly and then bit her lip, and her face was very white.

"I know you didn't," she said, when they walked on, "but I don't think you realize what Paul means to me. What he has meant to me in this—this sort-of-lonely place."

"And I mean nothing to you." Peter's mouth was very grim.

"I—I like you very, very much—"

"But you like Paul better. Well, he's a lucky little devil; I like him, too, but I must admit I'd be fonder of him if he were in Timbuctoo."

There was a long, strained silence. When the assistant at the Library looked up from the short-story magazine she was buried in, it was to see a very serious Frances Wakefield come in, with a tired look about her eyes and a sad little droop to her mouth. And the assistant, who had not been taken in by Peter's endless demand for books on wheat the previous summer, and who had not missed the look in his eyes as he and Frances had gone off together that very day, drew her own conclusions.

"She must have turned him down. Lordy, what fools some people are! Wasting her affections on the little Indian youngster like that!"

The boats began to go to and from the North-country once again; the grass grew green and juicy; and from the top of every budding tree birds sang joyfully to each other. But, as far as Frances was concerned, there was something lacking. She looked forward, more than she cared to own, to Peter's letters. There was something very dear about Peter, she thought. But there was Paul—

Paul was becoming inordinately interested in shipping. He began to spend a great deal of time down on the waterfront. Sometimes he did not appear at the Library for four or five days at a time. Then he would rush in, full of enthusiasm over all he had seen, and tell Frances about it.

"I saw a great big new boat today—bigger than any of the others that come up here. And she's going down to the sea in two pieces. And she'll be put together there and go across to England. Gee! I'd like to be on her. I'm going to own lots of boats when I'm bigger."

"How old are you now, Paul?"

"I'm fourteen, 'n' I'll soon be fifteen."

Frances uttered a little sigh. "Let's see. You were twelve when you first began coming here, weren't you?"

"Yes. I was just little then."

"Don't you like reading any more, Paul?"

"You bet. Only there's lots of other things to do too." The far-away look came into his eyes, and Frances knew, with a little jealous pang, that this restlessness would take him for ever out of her sight before he had grown much taller.

"Does your mother like you to spend so much time down by the harbour?" she asked.

"Not much. But Pa says it'll soon be time for me to start out for myself, and that it won't hurt."

Suddenly, Frances felt very lonely. Unconsciously, she had imagined that Paul would always be the little boy in the shabby short trousers, eager to read about the great world that lay a this door. She had not thought about the days that would follow, when Paul would obey the instinct of his ancestors and go out into the world to see things for himself and to blaze his own trail. But Paul was happy; his life was becoming very full, and he was anxious to see more and yet more. So Frances hid her own little hurt, and rejoiced with Paul and tried not to think of Peter very much. As to the latter she found it the harder of the two—

Spring wore into Summer, and the great wheat-fields of the West grew and grew until the golden river began to flow—and Peter became very busy. His letters came less frequently, and there was no sign of him at the Library. One day, Frances was walking down the main street past the Grain Exchange Building. Two men were standing in the entrance talking, and as she passed, one said, "McIntosh's scheme is no good. I tell you it's robbing Peter to pay Paul."

That was all she heard—but it stayed in her mind. "Robbing Peter to pay Paul—Poor Peter—It never occurred to me—like that." She was almost in tears by the time she got home. Then she gave herself a mental shake, and sat down to think things over. She might have realized it in the beginning—and saved all this heartache—Unhappiness for Peter, too—And Paul—She might have known that Paul would not always be her charge, would not always be on hand to keep her from being lonely in the big North-country—Peter was hers—just as she was

Home By The Panama

By Ursula Welsh

TO live in anticipation of an event is said to double either its terrors or its delights.

If this be so, there is no better preparation for seeing the Panama Canal than the idle, dreamy days of the three weeks' voyage in wide South Pacific latitudes on one of the home-ward-bound liners making Balboa its first port of call. After many days at sea even the most commonplace shore objects become of absorbing interest and dominant conversation. The enthusiasm may then be imagined which greets the faint blue line of the Cordilleras rising far away in the North and East, the first landmarks of that romantic Isthmus, that traditional "narrow place between two seas" which Columbus and Magellan mis-interpreting as a hidden channel leading Westwards to Asia, sought for vainly over four hundred years ago.

By a whimsical trick of destiny, the Gulf of San Miguel, so long beloved by buccaneers as a happy hunting ground of piratical enterprise and the scene of many daring raids upon richly laden frigates beating cautiously up the coast from Peru, is now the thoroughfare to the gate exacting legitimate toll from vessels passing "on their lawful occasions" only. Shipping from the four corners of the earth congregates in Balboa harbour at the cross-roads of the world's traffic. There are social grades among ships as among men and there are ocean going snobs too, for ships have personality—but nowhere, except perhaps along the Epsom Road on Derby Day, could a more varied, democratic crowd be seen jostling one another towards the same objective. A salt-encrusted tramp smelling of Singapore and Hong Kong, who since leaving Liverpool has already taken the Suez short cut and is waiting her turn here, lies drowsily at anchor like a tired-out man in oily overalls resting momentarily on a bench. Dowdy, squat tugs puff in wearily with their burdens from outlying points up the coast for trans-shipment.

Numerous harbour launches, the bustling, local busybodies, dart feverishly about on official errands. Cheek by jowl with a grimy collier from the Argentine, a graceful dazzlingly spick and span liner, that most aristocratic of all deep-water workers, waits haughtily for her Clearance papers while a flotilla of native cayucos, each manned by a grinning, ebony-faced boatman in fluttering blue cotton garments and a big flat straw hat, peddles bananas up and down the lines at six cents a dozen.

The present port of Balboa, entirely the outgrowth of the Canal, might be any up-to-date American settlement with its wide boulevards and paved streets and is a convincing example of what modern science has accomplished in the way of turning the foremost pest hole of the earth almost into a health resort. The palatial Tivoli Hotel, overlooking the water, and, according to the guide-book, the most magnificently equipped on the American continent (but what Hotel is not thus represented?), whose elegant crowds could vie with those of Monte Carlo, seems to insist almost defiantly upon the potentialities of the Isthmus as a health resort. Yet, over on Ancon Hill, the white buildings of the immense tropical Hospital taken over from the French and completed by the Americans are an ever-present reminder of the spectre that stalks by night. Between the hotel and the hospital, as if with due appreciation of the merits in each, is the white settlement for Canal officials and their families. Their houses have been designed specially for the Canal Zone. Each consists of a comparatively small wooden centre part or house proper surrounded by wide verandahs which are completely screened in with wire netting giving the house a fantastic bird-cage appearance. From the road one got glimpses through the netting of people dining; another side of the verandah had beds in it. These dark green bird-cage dwellings set among bright green lawns, waving coconut palms and gay tropical flower beds make the whole settlement look employees Only." The "gold" are the American employees in the Canal service, mostly clerical workers and skilled artisans, who are paid in United States or "gold" currency. The "silver" employees, unskilled labourers drawn from Central and South America and negroes from the British West Indies, are paid in "silver" or Panamanian money. The silver dollar is just half the value of the American dollar and

The negro employees live in tenements in a special quarter allotted to them. No screened windows here: the mosquito does not attack black skins. Through open doorways one got enchanting vistas of dusky mothers in bright print dresses and turbans asleep in rocking-chairs cuddling little black pot bellied babies. Outside everyone was munching water-melons or singing to accordions or punctuating some story with gusts of laughter like a pack of overgrown, good-natured school-children.

A STREET-CAR takes one out to the city of Panama the capital of the Republic. Geographically within the five mile limit of the Canal Zone, it retains nominal political independence excepting as regards its sanitation and water supply. Relying under its own Urban Council solely upon huge flocks of buzzards circling overhead as scavengers. Panama under American control has become the best-paved, best-watered and best-sewered city in Central America. The few miles in the street car seem to transport one as many centuries in point of time, for in the Spanish-Moorish architecture of its churches, in the barred windows along its high-walled crooked streets and in its flowered piazzas are traces of the ancient Spanish dominion over the Isthmus. The ruins of the grey stone wall, part of the old fortifications sixty feet thick, seemed to remind mutely that the administrators of that vanished Empire were confronted more or less with our own Imperial problems and recalled the legend that in the heyday of Panama's prosperity Charles V. of Spain was seen shading his eyes with his hand and gazing intently from his palace windows at Madrid. "I am looking for the walls of Panama" he is reported to have said, presumably to ingratiate himself with the Delegates of an Anti-Waste Campaign, "for they have cost enough to be seen even from here."

From Panama one can take a seven mile drive between towering palms and vivid luxuriant vegetation to the site of Old Panama. Quick growing banana trees and creeping vines are fast covering all that is left of this once famous old city, for so long the clearing-house between the rich mines of Peru and the King's Treasury in Spain. A roughly paved track through pestilential jungle and morass, the "Gold Road" across the Isthmus to Puerto Bello, is still used by pack ponies. What strings of mule-caravans laden with bullion passed out of here in the days of Drake and Cortez and Morgan! Are any of the great ports ranking today among the foremost cities of the world similarly doomed centuries hence to ruin and oblivion? Not altogether an impossibility when one considers how the establishment of a great aerial commercial centre in, say the heart of the Sahara might dislocate the trade routes of the world.

The Panama Canal is more than a mere canal. It is an Epic in which the figures and deeds of living men compare worthily with those of shadowy heroes and demi-gods. No voracious monster of mythological fame devoured more men than the dreaded fever-monster of Panama slain by Colonel Gorgas of the U. S. Army Medical Corps: from the brain of Colonel Goethals, Chief Engineer, sprang, Minerva-like, the disciplined organized body of men who warred upon and subdued the forces of Nature from coast to coast.

like a gigantic aviary. Thanks to these vigilant precautions yellow fever has been unknown for years although formerly more men were lying dead of it in the cemeteries than live men were walking the Isthmus.

Notices were posted up outside different entrances to offices and stores—"Gold Employees Only" or "Silver Employees Only." The "gold" are the American employees in the Canal service, mostly clerical workers and skilled artisans, who are paid in United States or "gold" currency. The "silver" employees, unskilled labourers drawn from Central and South America and negroes from the British West Indies, are paid in "silver" or Panamanian money. The silver dollar is just half the value of the American dollar and

An Old Portrait

By Marjorie Pickthall

(Illustrated by E. J. Dinsmore)

*She was earth before earth gave Me a heart to miss her;
Stars and summers were her grave,
Any rains might kiss her;
Wild sweet ways love would not cross
Curbed in sorrels and green moss.*

*She's been dust a hundred springs.
Still her face comes glancing
Out of glimmering water-rings
When the gnats are dancing.
Loosed is she in lilac flowers,
Lost in bird-songs and still hours.*

*If I'd lived when kings were great,— Greater I than any,—
I'd have sold my olden state
For a silver penny,
Just to find her, just to keep,
Just to kiss her eyes asleep.*

IT was at exactly half-past three in the afternoon of a hot June day that Mrs. Theodore Banks became smitten with the idea. Mrs. Banks often said afterwards she did not know how she came to be thinking about the Convention of the Arts and Crafts at all, although she is the Secretary. The idea was so compelling that Mrs. Banks rushed down town to tell Mr. Banks—she felt she could not depend on the telephone.

"Ted," she cried, when she opened the door of the office, "I have an idea!"

Theodore raised his eyelids. Mrs. Banks was flushed and excited and looked well. Mrs. Banks was a handsome woman any time, and today her vivacity was quite genuine.

"You know the Convention of the Arts and Crafts, which begins on the twentieth?"

"I've heard of it, somewhere."

"Well, it just came to me, Teddy, what a perfectly heavenly thing it would be to invite that little Mrs. Dawson, who writes reviews for one of the papers here. You remember I told you about her. She is awfully clever and artistic and good looking, and lives away off from every place, and her husband is not her equal at all, perfectly illiterate, I heard—uncultured, anyway. What a perfect joy it would be to her to have her come, and meet with people who are her equals. She's an Ottawa girl originally, I believe, and she does write the most perfectly sweet and darling things—you remember, I've read them to you. Of course, she is probably very shabby and out of date in her clothes by this time, but it doesn't really matter what one wears, if one has heaps of brains. It is only dull women, really, who have to be so terribly careful about what they wear, and spend so much money that way!"

"Dull women!" Theodore murmured. "Oh! is that why? I never really knew."

She laughed at his look of enlightened surprise. When Mrs. Banks laughed there were three dimples plainly showing, which did not entirely discourage her merriment.

"And you know, Teddy, there is such a mystery about her marriage, she will really be quite an acquisition, and we'll have her on the programme."

"What mystery?" Mr. Banks asked. "Oh, well, not mystery maybe, but we all suppose she's not happy—how could she be with so few of the real pleasures of life, and still she stays with it, and actually goes places with her husband, and seems to be keeping it up, and you know, Ted, she has either three or four children!"

"Is it as bad as that?" he asked solemnly.

"O Ted! you know well enough what I mean, don't be such an owl! Just think of how tied down and horrible it must be for her out there in that desolate Alberta, with no neighbors at all for miles, and then only impossible people. I should think it would drive her mad. I must try to get her on the programme, too. She will at least be interesting, on account of her personality. Most of our speakers are horribly prosy—at least to me, but of course I never listen. I just look to see what they've on and then go straight back to my own thinking. I just thought I'd ask your advice, Teddy dear, before I asked the committee and so now I'll go to see Mrs. Trenton, the President. So glad you approve, dear. And really, there will be a touch of romance in it, Ted, for Bruce Edwards knew her when she lived in Ottawa—it was he who told me so much about her. He simply raved about her to me. It seems he was quite mad about her once, and probably it was a lovers quarrel or something that drove her away to the West to forget, and now think of her meeting Bruce again! Isn't that a thriller?"

"If I thought Bruce Edwards had brains enough to care for any woman, I'd say it was not right to bring her here," said Mr. Banks; "but he hasn't!"

"Oh, of course," Mrs. Banks agreed, "he is quite over it now, no doubt. Things like that never last; but he'll be awfully nice to her, and give her a good time, and take her around. You know what Bruce is like—he's so romantic and cynical and such a perfect darling in his manners, always ready to open doors or pick up handkerchiefs!"

"I'm sure he would, if he needed the handkerchiefs," Theodore put in quietly.

"O, Ted! you're a funny bunny. You've never liked Bruce—and I know why—and it's perfectly horrid of you, just because he has always been particularly nice to me. He really can't help being dreamy and devoted to any woman he is with, if she's not a positive fright."

MRS. Trenton, the President of the Arts and Crafts, received Mrs. Banks' suggestion cautiously. Mrs. Trenton always asked, "Is it right?" "Is it wise?" "Is it expedient?" It was Mrs. Trenton's extreme cautiousness that had brought her the proud distinction of being the first President of the Arts and Crafts; where it was considered necessary to temper the impetuosity of the younger members, and besides, Mrs. Trenton never carried her doubts and fears too far. She raised all possible objections, mentioned all possible contingencies, but in the end allowed the younger members to carry the day, which they did, with a clear and shriven conscience, feeling that they had been very discreet and careful and deliberate.

Mrs. Banks introduced her subject by telling Mrs. Trenton that she had come to ask her advice, whereupon Mrs. Trenton laid aside the work she was doing, and signified her gracious willingness to be asked for counsel. When Mrs. Banks had carefully laid the matter before Mrs. Trenton, dwelling on the utter loneliness of the prairie woman's life, Mrs. Trenton called the Vice-President, Miss Hastings, who was an oil painter by profession, and a lady of large experience in matters of the heart. Mrs. Trenton asked Mrs. Banks to outline her plan again.

When she had finished, Mrs. Trenton asked, "Is it wise—is it kind? She has chosen her life, why bring her back? It will only fill her heart with vain repinings. This man, illiterate though he may be, is her lawful husband. She owes him a duty. Are we just to him?"

"Maybe she is perfectly happy," Miss Hastings said. "There is no accounting for love, and its vagaries. Perhaps to her, he is clothed in the rosy glow of romance, and all the inconveniences of her life are forgotten. I have read of it," she added in explanation when she noticed Mrs. Trenton's look of incredulity.

Mrs. Trenton sighed, a long sigh that undulated the black lace on her capacious bosom.

"It has been written—it will continue to be written, but today marriage needs to be aided, by modern—" She hesitated, and looked at Mrs. Banks for the word.

"Methods," Mrs. Banks supplied promptly. "Housemaids, cooks, autos, theatres, jewelry, and chocolates."

"You put it so aptly, my dear," Mrs. Trenton smiled, as she patted her pearl bracelet, Mr. Trenton's last offering on the hymeneal altar. "It requires—" She paused again. Mrs. Trenton's pauses were a very important asset in her conversation. "It requires—"

"Collateral," said Mrs. Banks.

Miss Hastings shook her head.

"I believe in marriage, all the same," she said heroically.

"Now how shall we do it?" Mrs. Banks was anxious to get the preliminaries over. "You have decided to invite her, of course?"

Mrs. Trenton nodded. "I feel we have no choice in the matter," she said slowly. "She is certainly a woman of artistic temperament; she must be, or she would succumb to the dreary prairie level. I have followed her career with interest, and predict great things for her. Have I not, Miss Hastings? We should not blame her, if in a moment of girlish romance she turned her back on the life which now is. We, as officers of the Arts and Crafts, must extend our fellowship to all who are worthy. This joining of our ranks may show her what she has lost by her girlish folly, but it is better for her to know life, and even feel regrets, than never to know."

"Better have a scarlet thread run through the dull gray pattern of life, even if it makes the gray all the duller," said Miss Hastings, who worked in oils.

And so it came about that an invitation was sent to Mrs. James Dawson, Auburn, Alberta, and in due time an acceptance was received.

From the time she alighted from the Pacific Express, a slight young woman in a very smart linen suit, she was a constant surprise to the Arts and Crafts. The principal cause of their surprise was that she seemed perfectly happy. There was not a shadow of regret in her clear gray eyes, nor any trace of drooping melancholy in her quick, business-like walk.

Naturally, the Arts and Crafts had made quite a feature of the Alberta author and poet who would attend the Convention. Several of the enthusiastic members, anxious to advertise effectively, had interviewed the newspaper reporters on the subject, with the result that long articles were published in the woman's section of the city dailies, dealing principally with the loneliness of the life on an Alberta ranch. Kate Dawson was credited with a heroic spirit, that would have made her blush had she seen the flattering allusions. Robinson Crusoe on his lonely isle, before the advent of Friday, was not more isolated than she on her lonely Alberta ranch, according to the advance notices. Luckily, she had not seen any of these, nor ever dreamed she was the centre of so much attention, and so it was a very self-possessed and unconscious young woman in a simple white gown who came before the Arts and Crafts.

It was the first open night of the Convention, and the auditorium was crowded. The air was heavy with the perfume of many flowers, and pulsed with dreamy music. Mrs. Trenton, in billows of black lace, and glinting jet, presided with her usual graciousness. She introduced Mrs. Dawson, briefly.

Whatever the attitude of the audience was at first, they soon followed her with eager interest, as she told them, in her easy way, simple stories of the people she knew so well, and so lovingly understood. There was no art in the telling, only a sweet naturalness, and an apparent honesty—the honesty of purpose that comes to people in lonely places. Her stories were all of that class that magazine editors call "homely, heart-interest stuff," not deep or clever, or problematical, the commonplace doings of common people, but it found an entrance into the hearts of men and women. They found themselves looking with her at broad sunlit spaces, where struggling hearts work out noble destinies, without any thought of heroism. They saw the moonlight, and its drifting shadows on the wheat, and smelled again the ripening grain at dawn. They heard the whirr of prairie chickens' wings, among the golden stubble, on the hillside, and the glamor of some old forgotten afternoon stole over them. Men and women, country-born, who had forgotten the voices of their youth, heard them calling now across the years, and heard them, too, with opened hearts and sudden tears. There was one pathetic story. She told them of the lonely prairie woman—the woman who wished she was back, the woman to whom the broad outlook and far horizon were terrible and full of fear. She told them how, at night, this lonely woman drew down the blinds and pinned them close to keep out the great white outside that stared at her through every chink with wide, pitiless eyes; the mocking voices that she heard behind her everywhere, day and night, whispering, mocking, plotting; and the awful shadows, black and terrible, that crouched behind her, just out of sight—never coming out in the open.

It was a weird and gloomy picture, but she did not leave it so. She told of the new neighbor who came to live near the lonely woman; the human companionship which drove the mocking voices away forever; the coming of the spring, when the world awoke from its white sleep, and the thousand joyous living things that came into being at the touch of the good old sun!

At the reception after the programme many crowded around her, expressing their sincere appreciation of her work. Bruce Edwards fully enjoyed the distinction which his former acquaintance with her gave him, and it was with quite an air of proprietorship that he introduced to her his friends.

Mrs. Trenton, Mrs. Banks, and other members of the Arts and Crafts, at a distance discussed her with pride. She had made their open night a wonderful success—the papers would be full of it to-morrow.

"You can see how fitted she is for a life of culture," said Miss Hastings, the oil painter. "Her shapely white hands were made for silver spoons, and not for handling butter ladies. What a perfect joy it must be for her to associate with people who are her equals!"

"I wonder," said Mrs. Banks, "what her rancher would say if he saw his handsome wife now. So much admiration from an old lover is not good for the peace of mind of even a serious minded author, and such a fascinating man as Bruce. Look how well they look together! I wonder if she is mentally comparing her big sunburned cattle man with Bruce, and thinking of what a different life she would have led if she had married him!"

"Do you suppose," said Mrs. Trenton, "that that was her own story that she told us? I think she must have felt it herself to be able to tell it so."

Just at that moment, Bruce Edwards was asking her the same question.

Whenever soap comes in contact with the skin—use Ivory.

Hygiene and good taste lay down these requirements for soap:

- Abundant Lather*for quick thorough cleansing.
- Easy Rinsing*for freedom from soap as well as from dirt.
- Mildness*to avoid even the slightest feeling of irritation.
- Purity*so that no matter how often it is used daily, the soap will do no harm.
- Whiteness*for immediate evidence of high grade ingredients.
- Fragrance*to make it pleasant to use, yet free from obtrusive perfume.
- "It Floats"*for convenience and economy.

You will find all these seven essential qualities in Ivory Soap. This is why it is unsurpassed for so many uses: daily bath, toilet, shampoo, nursery, fine laundry,—and in all housework where soap comes in contact with the skin.

Ivory Soap comes in a convenient size for every purpose

New Ways of Cooking Winter Vegetables

By Mary M. Neil

The variety of ways of serving vegetables offer a large scope to the cook with an initiative, but in the ordinary household the vegetables appear time after time on the table, served in exactly the same way with a monotony which does not encourage a desire to eat them. Now vegetables are really a very great factor in the question of health, and it would repay the housewife to cook them in various different ways so that they will be appreciated when sent to the table.

It is worth remembering that the more water used in boiling cabbages, greens, etc., the less objectionable will be the smell given out by them during the cooking, while a piece of bread tied up in a muslin bag, and boiled with the cabbage is also held to mitigate the smell. This crust should, however, be removed after fifteen minutes boiling and burnt.

To have vegetables in perfection they should be cooked very soon after they are taken from the ground, also they should be served as soon as possible after the cooking is completed, as many of them spoil if they have to be kept warm.

Baked Tomatoes. Choose large tomatoes of equal size. Wipe them and remove the stalks, then cut them in halves and lay skin side down on a buttered dish. Put a piece of butter on the top of each tomato, sprinkle with salt, pepper and paprika and bake in a moderate oven for twenty minutes. Then lift out six pieces of tomato very carefully on to a hot dish and keep them warm. Bruise down the remainder in the baking tin and stir in one tablespoonful of flour, add one cupful of milk, stir and cook for five minutes, and strain over tomatoes. Garnish with small pieces of toast and serve hot as a luncheon or supper dish.

Onions Stuffed With Nuts. Take good sized onions and cook for one hour in boiling salted water, drain, cool and cut out a piece about two inches across the root end leaving a shell of onion. Chop two thirds of cupful of nut meats, add one cupful of nut meats, add one cupful of the cooked onion, two thirds cupful of bread crumbs, four tablespoonfuls of melted butter, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one saltspoonful each of pepper and paprika, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley and one beaten egg. Lightly sprinkle the onion space with salt and then fill with the mixture, rounding over the top of each. Set the prepared onions in fireproof dishes, pour in each dish one-half cupful of water mixed with one tablespoonful of melted drippings and cook in a moderate oven for thirty minutes, basting very often. Serve in the dishes they were cooked in and pass round a good cream sauce.

Parsnip Cutlets. Scrape and boil until tender parsnips, then slice lengthwise, rub with pepper, salt and paprika and fry for one minute in hot fat, then dip in the following batter, beat up one egg, add one-half cupful of milk, one cupful of flour, a pinch of salt and one tablespoonful of salad oil, then mix until smooth and glossy. Allow to stand in a cool place for one hour, and add one tablespoonful of baking powder. Fry until brown in plenty of smoking hot fat, drain on paper and serve hot. These cutlets go well with any kind of roast meat, especially roast pork, and are a good way to vary the usual cooking of parsnips.

Stuffed Peppers. Cut the tops from four red or green peppers, remove the seeds, cover with boiling water and allow to stand for eight minutes. Then drain, cut into halves and fill with the following rice stuffing, cook one-half cupful of rice in boiling salted water until tender, drain, add one chopped onion, two tablespoonfuls of chopped red or green pepper, one tablespoonful of melted butter, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, salt, pepper and paprika to taste and moisten with a little hot water.

Carrot Fritters. Beat to a pulp three carrots which have been scraped and boiled until tender. Add three beaten eggs, one tablespoonful of flour, sugar to slightly sweeten, and one tablespoonful of milk or cream. Mix well, then fry by spoonfuls in smoking hot fat, and when done either serve plain, or squeeze a little lemon juice over and sprinkle with powdered sugar. These fritters are excellent with roast mutton.

Fried Beets. There is one vegetable which deserves more recognition than it gets, and that is the beet. Select medium sized beets, wash and Stewed Mushrooms. This is a splendid breakfast dish, and easily prepared. Take the smaller mushrooms, discarding the stems and any broken caps. After washing these leave them for forty minutes in cold water flavored with vinegar or lemon juice. For each four cupfuls of mushrooms put two tablespoonfuls of butter into a saucepan and allow it to melt on the stove, then add the mushrooms and salt and pepper to taste. Shake the pan to prevent sticking and keep shaking the pan until the mushrooms are browned, which will probably be in eight minutes. Then pour over sufficient cream to come one-half inch below the surface, then cook again for fifteen minutes and serve hot. Do not thicken the cream.

as for stewing, then rub it through a sieve, add the beaten yolks of eggs, cream and seasonings, then add the stiffly beaten whites of eggs. Divide the mixture into buttered fireproof dishes, sprinkle over a few browned bread crumbs on top of each, dot with butter and bake in a moderate oven for twenty minutes. Serve hot.

Vegetable Gateau. It is sometimes valuable to know how to use up odd pieces of cold cooked vegetables, but though I mention four kinds in this recipe, do not fancy that it is of no use to you because you have no variety on hand. A delicious mixture can be made with any two varieties mentioned, or even with quite a different selection. One cupful of cooked carrots, one cupful of cooked cabbage, two cupfuls of cooked potatoes, one large cooked onion, salt, pepper and four tablespoonfuls of drippings. Chop the carrots, cabbage and onion and mash the potatoes. Mix all together and season with salt and pepper. Heat the drippings in a frying pan, put in the vegetables, spread them evenly over the pan and fry the cake for eight minutes, or until browned underneath, then turn it. Fry the second side, adding a little more drippings. Cut it across in four, and arrange the pieces on a hot serving dish.

Corn Pudding. To two cupfuls of canned corn, add one and one-half cupfuls of cracker or bread crumbs, four beaten eggs, one tablespoonful of sugar, one-half teaspoonful of salt, a pinch of paprika, and one cupful of milk. Mix together, and bake in a buttered baking dish in a hot oven until nicely browned. Serve hot.

Creamed Celery. Three heads of celery two onions, one bunch of parsley, milk, two tablespoonfuls of cream, a little lemon juice, salt, pepper and paprika, one tablespoonful of flour to one cupful of milk. Take the best parts of the celery, trim and wash very carefully. Put the celery in a saucepan of cold water, bring it to boiling point and boil for eight minutes, then throw away the water and add instead enough milk to cover the celery. Put in the sliced onions and the parsley, and allow to simmer until the celery is tender, if necessary adding more milk as it reduces. Lift out the celery, cut them into thin strips, and roll each up in a neat roll. Have ready rounds of fried bread and place a roll of celery on each. Mix the flour smoothly with a little cold milk and add it to the milk in the pan, adding more milk if there is not sufficient in it. Stir until it boils, add the seasoning, lemon juice and cream, and stir and cook for five minutes, then pour over the celery, sprinkle with chopped parsley and serve hot. Many people will enjoy celery cooked in this way who cannot eat it raw.

Potato Croquettes. Mash two pounds of cooked potatoes add one tablespoonful of butter, one-half teaspoonful of salt a little pepper, a dash of red pepper, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, and one beaten egg and mix thoroughly. Flour the fingers and a baking board, form the potatoes into neat croquettes, brush over with beaten egg, toss in fine bread crumbs and fry in smoking hot fat. Drain on soft paper and serve at once.

Egg Plant Croustades. Cut a large egg plant in one inch thick slices, press between two plates for one and one-half hours, remove the centres with a cookie cutter. Melt one tablespoonful of butter in a saucepan, add one chopped onion, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, the remaining egg plant chopped fine, salt, pepper and paprika to season, and fill the croustades. Cover the tops with bread crumbs, dot with butter and bake for thirty minutes. Serve hot with hot tomato sauce.

Onions stuffed with nuts

boil until tender in boiling salted water, drain, peel, slice and fry a golden brown in hot drippings. Season with salt, pepper and paprika and serve hot. These are delicious.

Cabbage With Cheese. Boil one firm cabbage in the usual way, drain well, press out all the water, and chop it up. Make a sauce with two tablespoonfuls of butter, four tablespoonfuls of flour, and one cupful of milk, seasoning it with salt, pepper and a dust of red pepper. Have ready a buttered fireproof dish, spread a layer of the cabbage at the bottom of the dish, cover it with some of the sauce, sprinkle rather thickly with grated cheese, and make a second layer in the same way, cover with bread crumbs, dot small pieces of butter over the surface, and place in the oven until nicely browned, then serve hot in the dish it was cooked in.

Beans, Spanish Style. Put one-half pound of soaked beans on to boil in water containing one-fourth teaspoonful of baking soda and boil for ten minutes, then drain off the water and cover with fresh cold water, to which add one teaspoonful of dry mustard, then cook until tender. At this point add four small onions peeled and sliced and cook until the onions are tender. Add one tablespoonful of flour, one and one-half tablespoonfuls of butter or cooked bacon, two pimientos cut in slices, and seasoning of salt, pepper and paprika. Serve hot.

Spinach Souffle. This is a very dainty method of serving spinach as an ordinary vegetable. One pound of stewed spinach, three eggs, two tablespoonfuls of milk or cream, a dust of salt and pepper, a few browned bread crumbs, and one tablespoonful of butter. Prepare the spinach

Pompeian Night Cream

The Cold Cream for Beauty

Beauty's Reward

His eyes rest tenderly upon her lovely, glowing beauty. Upon her dainty finger he slips the crowning jewel of her happiness—the sparkling solitaire that proclaims his love. Such is the reward of beauty. And she holds the secret of lasting youth and girlish loveliness.

For every night before retiring she uses Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty). It brings while she sleeps the beauty of a soft, youthful skin.

Just try this simple treatment every night before retiring: First, coat your face thickly with Pompeian NIGHT Cream, patting it gently into the pores. Then, with a soft cloth remove the surplus cream, which will bring with it all the day's dust and grit.

Next, wring out a cloth or towel in warm water and lay it on the face. Pat it gently—do not rub. Now, rinse the face in cool—not cold—water. Dry without rubbing.

Then again apply Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty), and leave it on the skin to "youthify" you through the night. It brings beauty while you sleep.

Pompeian NIGHT Cream is for sale at all druggists at 50c and $1.00 a jar.

The Ontario Convention

THE Twentieth Annual Convention of the Women's Institutes of Ontario was held in Foresters' Hall, Toronto, on November 15th., 16th., and 17th., 1921. The convention was held under the joint auspices of the Institute Branch of the Department of Agriculture, and the Federated Women's Institutes of Ontario.

In the morning on Tuesday there was held a meeting of the Board of Directors of Provincial Federation. After the work of registration in the afternoon of this opening day, there was an inspiring interchange of messages of welcome and replies to the local authorities who were glad to recognize in the Women's Institutes an organization which was and is working for "Home and Country." Lady Falconer gave the address of welcome in which she emphasized the importance of preserving the old ideals of home life and service, in a day when so much that is of merely passing interest or pleasure is absorbing the attention of the young. There must be the spirit of joy in work and strength which comes from self-discipline, if our civilization is to keep a high standard. To judge from the standard of the finest and not to be blinded by merely material claims should be the aim of the Canadian woman.

Mrs. William Todd of Orillia, retiring president of the Federation, is one of the most efficient workers in the Institutes and was chosen last June as president of the Federated Women's Institutes of the Dominion. In an address of earnest and effective character, Mrs. Todd pointed out the great work that is being accomplished for child welfare by the Women's Institutes throughout the country;—and dwelt also upon the importance of the immigration question and colonization—or Canadianization. Mrs. Todd regretted retiring from the presidency, but urged the necessity for all Institutes members to carry the ideals of the organization into every part of the country.

There were reports from Eastern, Western and Northern Ontario which showed how varied and strenuous are the activities of the Institute. Mrs. Edwards spoke of the work in the West, Mrs. Willet and Mrs. Allan for the North, and Mrs. Yates for the East. Mrs. Allan of Fort William emphasized the need of a detention home in that community, where the feeble-minded, the aged and the insane had to be housed in a jail—the only available refuge—while waiting for accommodation in the East. Mrs. Charles Macoun dealt with the Dominion Federation Convention at Edmonton last June, reporting the general desire for affiliation with the British Women's Institutes. There had been a strong approval of the establishment of a women's division in the Department of Agriculture. Other matters which had been approved of by the Dominion Convention were the provision for uniform good roads throughout the country, the securing of competent teachers, the encouragement of music and art in the schools, school gardens, enterprise by the woman in various industries, such as poultry-raising and fruit-growing and the establishment of market centres. The soldiers were assured that their interests were safe in an appeal to the members of Women's Institutes.

Mr. George A. Putnam, superintendent for the Province, gave a most comprehensive address on the origin, activities and future opportunities of the work of the Institute. The importance of working together without participation, as an organization, in any merely political activities was duly impressed upon the members. The extent of this organization was realized when the statement was made that there are nine-hundred-and-thirty branches of the Institute in Ontario;—and more than six thousand girls are being reached by its operations.

Mr. W. J. Dunlop, Director of the Extension on Service of the University of Toronto, explained in a delightfully lucid and inspiring fashion the plans which are being made for the extension work throughout the Province of Ontario. The response shown in attendance and enthusiasm in the course already provided opened the way for a development of educational resources in the cities, the Junior Women's Institutes and the Junior Farmers' Institutes.

A most enjoyable talk was given by Miss Lillian Smith, head of the Children's Department, Toronto Public Library. Children, said Miss Smith, need direction in reading, just as in other things. No normal boy could be expected to put aside pie and candy and piously ask for whole wheat. In the case of books, too, it was necessary that there be guidance, in order that a taste for good reading be developed.

Miss Smith quoted an authority as stating: "The books a boy or girl reads for pleasure before the age of sixteen do more to form his or her ideals and mould character than all the text-books in the schools."

Miss Vida Coatsworth of the Toronto Conservatory of Music gave a highly interesting address on "Music for Country Homes and Communities," and pointed out the many fine facilities which now existed to develop the study and practice of music. Community singing teachers could be secured, and, through the use of the their way in a new country. Just write to the Department at the Capital and say that you want them. Dr. MacMurchy, as every good Canadian knows, is at the head of the Child Welfare Bureau in the Department of Health and is, not only an excellent official, but a most effective speaker. Hence her utterances on the subject of public health bear all the weight of authority. Dr. MacMurchy is essentially an optimist, but she does not minimize the gravity of some situations with which the community must deal, if public health is to be preserved and improved.

A case of leprosy had been found in Canada, many victims of drugs had been discovered, patent medicines containing narcotics had been banned for children, an analysis of foods was being made, attention was being given to proper housing conditions also to prevention of venereal diseases and especial attention was ever directed to all questions affecting Child Welfare. The Home Series of books published made their appeal to the men, as well as to the women. In 1920 there had been 247,219 births registered in Canada, and a card was sent to each mother at the time of registration, telling her of the welfare books for the home.

From one of the Indian reserves came an interesting report given by Mrs. Hill, showing the development of home nursing, first aid and medical inspection. There were twenty-nine members in the Institute and three hundred returned Indians in the reserve. The Institute intended to assist in building a memorial hall for the veterans.

Mrs. Walker gave a graphic story of the Stoney Creek Institute, the first of them all, which was organized in 1897. Next June it is intended to hold a great picnic to celebrate the silver jubilee of this historic Institute. Evidently this organization had the best of aims from the commencement of its activities, as the members at the first meeting decided to promote hygiene, sanitation, care of children and public health and to open each session by repeating the Lord's Prayer.

Mrs. Stocking of East Simcoe gave an account of the extension work. Mrs. Moffat told of the Sunday School which was supported by the Women's Institute in North Grey. Mrs. Lindsay of Shelburne spoke of the rest room which had been opened with the co-operation of the council. The rest room in Brantford was the theme of Mrs. A. B. Rose and Mrs. Mainprize told of the library work. Mrs. Gardiner, Grey County, also told of the rest room for the women who had to spend a few days in town.

Miss Yates in her address on rural beautifications and improvements, admitted a difficulty in introducing the glory of color into home surroundings in the country and suggested that in the garden this could best be done by the use of bulbs against a background of trees and shrubs. It would be wise to ask the Government to organize supplies of vegetables, annual and perennial flower seeds.

The names of the new directors were announced:

Mrs. C. A. Bleecker, Marmora; Mrs. E. W. Jennings, Lindsay; Mrs. S. B.

A NEW DEPARTMENT

Mrs. Alfred Watt, M.B.E., so well-known in Canada for her constructive work in connection with the Women's Institutes and also in work overseas, is to write for us each month a department on Women's Institute Methods, which, we are sure, will prove of great value to all members. Mrs. Watt will conduct a Question Drawer for the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL exclusively.

towns and rural districts of the province. The chief aim of the extension work is service. In commercial, social, industrial;—in every sphere of activity, the institution which would give the best service would have the greatest success. The first course opened for men and women of the farms last February had proved a surprise to the department. There were 279 who registered for the course, including grandmothers and grandfathers, girls and boys in their early teens, and many young men and women, ranging in age from twenty to thirty. Later courses had been opened in Hamilton, the university professors conducting evening classes. At Brampton and Cheltenham classes were opened. The demand for English literature as a subject for study was the most frequent. It was the aim of the university to provide courses when the request was received from an interested group, not to seek students. The next course for the farm students would include optional subjects of psychology, engineering, public speaking, the study of insects and various other topics, with economics and English literature as compulsory subjects. The courses were proving a boon to the members of player piano and phonographs, a love for the best music could be cultivated. It was the belief of the speaker that any community could be educated to appreciate the best music.

Discussion of Mr. Putnam's scheme by which the province would be divided into workable areas, co-operating closely with the larger federation, took up much of the time on the second day of the convention and resulted in the expression of many suggestive views. Organization in eastern and western Ontario has already been completed and is going on in northern Ontario. Central Ontario is not yet fully organized. The Province of Ontario, the birthplace of the Women's Institutes, has still the leadership in numbers and a division into sections is absolutely necessary if the work is to be carried out efficiently.

Miss Mary Yates gave an interesting address on "Outside the Country Home" and Dr. Helen MacMurchy dealt with the latest developments in the Child Welfare movement. The "Little Blue Books", recently sent out by the Department of Health in Ottawa, are invaluable to the newcomer, and will prove books of blessing to those who have not yet found

Through the Looking Glass

by VAIN JANE

"WOMEN," declared Theo impressively, "Are rapidly developing a sense of individualism. Every day they are becoming less the sheep-like human beings that they have ever been, talking alike, thinking alike and looking alike."

"Have you by any chance, been in New York recently?" enquired Marietta mildly.

"What on earth has that to do with the question?" demanded Theo.

"Only that it is the centre where we on this continent find women in the greatest mass, and where, if there are individuals, we would be most likely to observe them. Now, I have just come from there....."

"And from observations, you don't agree with me?"

"My dear, nine out of every ten women you meet there will talk to you of psycho-analysis and ask you if you don't find Freud fascinating; proving that the majority talk alike. Eight out of eleven are stricken with ego-mania; proving that they largely think alike, while at least seven out of twelve wear queer little cap-like hats pulled down about their ears, enveloping wraps of gorgeous fur and pale gold stockings and sandal shoes, proving that on the average they also dress alike. No, I am afraid I cannot agree with you; I believe that women on the whole still have the characteristics of sheep."

"Foolish arguments!" scorned Theo, "but do tell me more about the gold stockings—are they really new and smart?"

Theo is always intrigued by the fashions and in this manner may be led away from any tiresome argument.

"Personally I think they are out of place with a street costume, and as for the sandals, I do not believe any one with good taste would wear them out of the drawing-room or off the stage. But one sees hundreds of feet so shod, in all sorts of queer short-vamped and be-strapped combinations, tripping down the avenue at all times of the day and night."

"Tell me more about the fashions" requested Theo, warming to the subject.

"Well, let me see. To begin at the top, hats are either all black or very gay in coloring. Henna, tomato, tan, silver cloth, robins egg blue or grey—grey is especially popular at the moment. Many are satin, a few duvetyn, some felt and a very few velvet. For trimmings some are shaded with many-colored stones, others are swathed in uncurled ostrich feathers and many are trimmed with fur. As for wraps, they are very luxurious and even on the streets you pass countless coats of mole, or mink or seal or squirrel. Mostly they are sleeveless with deep cape collars and narrowing about the ankles. Cloth wraps have collar and cuffs of fox or possum or grey squirrel and quite the smartest are trimmed with grey lamb, which is continuing a wide vogue this season."

"And what about frocks?" inquired Theo interestedly.

"Mostly of silk crepes for the day time, (cloth dresses are passe) lace and chiffon or lace and crepe for dinner wear, and brocaded or plain velvet or wonderfully colored sequin creations with softening side sashes of tulle for evening. As for their hem line, it may be as irregular as the New York sky line, and still be smart—straight hems are out of style. Even in the day dresses a jog is given the even hem by dropping flowing panels below it. It is really quite effective and more graceful than you might imagine. As for the straight silhouette, I think its day is nearly over. The costumers have been experimenting with the tight bodice and full skirt with some success, and I saw several lovely cream velvet evening frocks of this order only the other day. There is a strong tendency too, to widen the hips and much whalebone is being used as a side foundation over which to drape soft chiffon or pliable taffeta."

"You make me hunger for a shopping tour" sighed Theo.

"Spend your money at home" advised Marietta, "its more patriotic and you save ten per cent. Besides we have all the best fashions here, even if New York does set them. But I had forgotten;—your vast admiration for the individualistic woman will naturally prevent your desiring to follow any recognized style, wouldn't it?"

"Nasty wretch," said Theo, smiling good naturedly, "one may admire in theory, mayn't one? At any rate I am going to have a cream velvet gown even if they are being worn in New York, so don't you give me away."

"And don't you talk to me about women not being sheep," laughed Marietta.

THE LETTER BOX

H. A. S. My dear, I am afraid I am not a bearer of good tidings when I say to you that electrolysis is the only permanent method. Unfortunately all other devices are but temporary, and leave the roots of the hair in the skin, to produce an ever-increasing growth. But why not electrolysis? There are now specialists in this treatment in most Canadian cities, and think of the comfort of finding a permanent cure! I must warn you however, not to be discouraged if some hairs return even after this method is used; the best operators declare that a percentage will always come back and that one must go through a second treatment to wipe them out completely. Cheer up, my friend; as long as there is a cure you must not be discouraged.

Pearls in the Mouth

Remove the film---see how they glisten then

There is now a new way to beautify the teeth. This offers you a pleasant ten-day test. It is based on modern research, endorsed by modern authorities. Leading dentists now advise it almost the world over.

Without it, teeth are almost always coated more or less by film, and that coat is dingy. With it, millions of teeth are given beauty which is priceless to a woman.

Film clouds the teeth

Film when fresh is a viscous coat. You can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Later it becomes dingy, sometimes greatly stained. Film is the basis of tartar.

Film is what discolors, not the teeth. Thin coats of film may cloud the whitest surface. Then that dim coat seems to be the natural tooth color.

Film is the great tooth enemy. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Most tooth troubles are now traced to film.

Very few escape them. Despite the tooth brush, all these troubles have been constantly increasing.

Film has been a difficult problem. The tooth brush used in old ways does not end it. No ordinary tooth paste can effectively combat it.

So dental science has for years sought ways to fight that film. Two ways have now been found. Able authorities have subjected them to many careful tests. Now it is evident that these new methods mean a new dental era.

A new-day tooth paste has been created, based on modern research. And these two methods are embodied in it. The name of the tooth paste is Pepsodent. It enables everyone to daily combat film-coats wherever they appear.

Other new effects

Modern science has also learned how to combat starch deposits. They gum the teeth, get between the teeth, and often ferment and form acids.

It has learned how to neutralize mouth acids—the cause of tooth decay.

These new discoveries are embodied in Pepsodent.

sodent. Thus every use brings these desired effects. It multiplies the salivary flow. That is Nature's great tooth-protecting agent.

It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits before they cause attacks.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids as they form.

Pepsodent gives these natural agents multiplied effect. It does this twice a day. Starch and acids are thus constantly combated.

Now in world wide use

Authorities the world over now advocate these methods. Dentists everywhere advise them. As a result, careful people of some 40 races are now using Pepsodent.

To millions it is bringing whiter, cleaner, safer teeth. You see the results in glistening teeth wherever you look today. To countless children it brings new protection which will have life-long effects.

That is the product we urge you to try. Make this ten-day test. Then decide your future course by what you see and feel.

A PERSON of Irish descent announced the other day: "I've resolved to make no more resolutions."

"But you are making one now," said a friend gayly.

"Then I'll make that the final resolution," said the Daughter of Erin. "I had an old nurse—Irish too—who told us that so long as we kept our resolutions to ourselves we were safe. As soon as they were spoken or written, the Evil One knew and at once set about tempting us to break them. Satan, according to Bridget, could hear our words and observe our deeds, but was not aware of our thoughts. So, it seems as if it were wise not to say too much about what we are going to do—just make a mental mark of it."

"Have you ever noticed," asked a serious-eyed matron, "that successful men do not talk about what they are going to do? And they don't say much about their work after."

"In other words," said a young girl gayly, "silence and success go together. I think, however, that I'd rather be a talkative failure."

"I don't think there's any rule about success and failure," said the Irish person in favor of "no resolutions." Then she added reflectively. "But it is so hard to know when you are really successful. Sometimes, when you get what you've longed for or do what you've tried for years to accomplish, you realize that you are not so very fortunate, after all."

"Perhaps Mrs. Browning has the answer," said the matron, who has good old-fashioned taste in poetry and abominates the free verse of Edgar Lee Masters. "She wrote, I remember, at the end of a poem: 'What's the best thing in the world?—Something out of it, I think.'"

CANADIANS are apt to be resentful of the Englishman who comes out to this country and expects to find wolves in Montreal and bears in the suburbs of Toronto. We forget that much of the fiction written by Canadians or about Canada has, for a background, the great wild places which are naturally of interest to the stranger or the newcomer. After all, this is a new country and it is not a far cry from the city to the wilderness. We must admit that some of the mistakes show that it is difficult for the newcomer to grasp the facts of our "magnificent distances." Not long ago an Englishman met a man from Hamilton in Montreal and asked him, on learning that Hamilton is several hundred miles west of Canada's largest city: "Do you often go out for a walk on the prairies?" The reply of the Hamiltonian is not recorded.

Then there was that unfortunate mistake made by Mrs. Humphry Ward in a chapter based on a trip through the Dominion:—when she sent a charming girl to a farm near Hamilton where the orchard stretched down to the shores of Lake Superior. However, we are not sure that Canadians are on firm ground when it comes to the facts regarding other lands, and it is altogether becoming to us to remember that a new country of nine provinces is quite a task to study.

IT is good to hear that the carnival is to be more popular than ever this winter. Skating is one of the finest pastimes in the world. Perhaps I should call it an art, for, when you see it at its best, it is the most exhilarating sport that can be seen. A hockey match is a spectacle to make even the Governor-General hold his breath:—and Ottawa can show the finest games of hockey on the continent. If you would see skating at its best, however, you must watch the waltzing and gliding of the girls who win the prizes at our skating contests. Feats of dexterity and swiftness which seem more like flying than skating, wherein the skater becomes a swallow or a lark or a dainty Ariel who "drinks the air" make us realize what the skater can do at her best. Is it not a pity that most of us give up skating as the years go by and leave it to the younger folk? France is wiser in its day and generation and is encouraging skating by citizens of all ages, whereas, in the realm of dancing, it is no new thing in France to see the great-grandfather "frisk beneath the burden of fourscore." Skating is good for us all:—and, if you are afraid of Father Time's advances, get your skates on and defy him.

HERE IS A FAIRY THAT PUTS ON AN APRON

FAIRY SOAP is one of those natural aristocrats of cleanliness which just happens to be low priced—an aristocrat not afraid to put on overalls or an apron.

Any soap could be made blue, or purple, or green, with a little inexpensive dye, and no matter how poor the quality it could be ground up and made into cakes, to look as good as the best.

With white soap! it is different. You can't dye a soap white. You can't make a white floating soap without using the highest grade materials.

Fairy Soap is the whitest soap made. Its whiteness is the admiration of the whole soap industry. There is nothing in the way of a soap better for the skin and complexion—and we have not spoiled it by making it smell like the Queen of Sheba.

For your toilet or bath, for your kitchen or your parlor—when you think of cleaning anything, think of Fairy Soap.

How We Solved the Clothes Problem In Our Family

By Irene Stevenson

EVER since I can remember I have longed to have distinctive, becoming clothes. Every girl does, I think. But most girls find it difficult to look their best in these days of high prices. Yet a year ago I found the way, not only to have pretty, attractive dresses and other things for myself, but also a way to solve the clothes problem in our family.

What is more, I have found the way to make more money than I ever expected to earn. Altogether my discovery has meant so much to our happiness and success that I am sure other women and girls will be interested in hearing about it.

Soon after leaving school, I started to work as a clerk in an office downtown. There were four of us, Ted, my ten-year-old brother; "Sister," just six; mother and myself. We had practically nothing but my meagre wage, and this, with the small income father had left us, provided funds enough to just about pay for our rent and food. There was never any money left for clothes. We wore our old ones as long as they would stand it and then called upon the village dressmaker to make us just the simplest kind of clothes, so her bill would be as small as possible.

Well, one night after the children were in bed, mother and I had a serious discussion of our finances. We decided that I could help by learning to make my own clothes. Neither of us knew anything to speak of about sewing. I remember my first attempt was on a little summer dress for myself. Just the other night, I was looking at a picture of myself in that dress. Well—the clothes I make now are different.

At the time, though, I felt pleased and mother and I were convinced that we could save quite a little if I became the family dressmaker. So I tried—evenings after I had finished my day's work. But soon my troubles began! I became so discouraged by my mistakes and the ludicrous garments I made that I told mother I would surely have to take at least a few lessons. But when we canvassed the possibilities for getting the necessary help and instruction, the outlook was gloomy indeed.

I couldn't possibly give up my position and leave home to learn how to make our clothes—we could scarcely get along as it was. We simply had to have the little money I was bringing home each week. And there seemed to be no other way.

Then just when I was most discouraged, something happened—it seems to me that it was the only thing that could have happened to change the situation and make possible more happiness and success and independence than I had dared even to dream for.

Like most girls interested in dress, I read several fashion magazines. And in one of them, I found the solution of my problem. The picture first caught my attention. And the story was about a girl just like myself who had been unable to take her rightful place because her clothes were not like those of other girls she knew. But she had quickly learned right in her own home, during spare time, through an institute of domestic arts and sciences, how to make for herself just the kind of stylish, becoming dresses and hats she had always wanted.

It was so true to life, so much like my own case, that I read every word, and mother agreed with me that it was surely worth finding out about, at least.

So I wrote the Woman's Institute and asked how I could learn to make our clothes.

The information I received was a revelation to me. The Institute offered just the opportunity I needed, so I joined at once and took up dressmaking.

I could scarcely wait until my first lesson came, and when I found it on the table at home a few nights later, I carried it upstairs and read it as eagerly as if it had been a love-letter.

Nothing could be more practical and interesting and complete than this wonderful course. There are more than 2,000 illustrations, making every step perfectly plain, and the language is so simple and direct that a child could understand every word of it.

Almost at once I began making actual garments—that's another delightful thing about the course. Why, I made a beautiful waist for mother after my third lesson! And in just a little while I was making all our clothes with no difficulty whatever.

Of course, as a member I had an opportunity to learn a great deal about the Institute and its work. It's perfectly wonderful what this great school is doing for women and girls all over the world! You see, it makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail. And it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or as little time to the work as you wish, and just whenever it is convenient. This has made it possible for women of all ages and in all circumstances to take the Institute's courses.

Among the members are housewives, mothers, business women, school teachers, girls at home and in school, and girls in stores, shops and offices—all learning dressmaking or millinery right in their own homes just as successfully as if they were together in a classroom.

I soon learned to copy models I saw in the shop windows, on the street, and in fashion magazines. Every step was so clearly explained that the things I had always thought only a professional dressmaker could do were perfectly easy for me!

For through the Woman's Institute I had learned how to make all stitches and seams; design patterns; use tissue-paper patterns; judge, select, buy and use materials; make simple, practical waists, skirts and dresses, perfect-fitting underwear and lingerie, dainty infants', children's and misses' clothing, afternoon coats, suits and dresses, evening gowns and wraps, tailored coats, skirts and complete suits; renovate, dye and make over garments; how to embroider, etc.

But the biggest thing my Woman's Institute training taught me was the secret of distinctive dress—what colors and fabrics are most appropriate for different types of women, how to develop style and add those little touches that make clothes distinctively becoming.

Well, when I found I was getting along so splendidly, I decided to do more than make just my own clothes. I saw that I could turn my study to further profit.

It wasn't long before my dresses attracted the attention of the best-dressed people. I called on several women who for years had gone to expensive city shops for their clothes. They welcomed my suggestion that I could create the kind of clothes they wanted and save them money besides.

The very first afternoon one woman gave me an order. I worked like mad on that dress! When it was finished she was so delighted she gave me two more orders—one for a tailored suit. From that time on, it was easy.

In less than six months from the night I first read about the Woman's Institute, I had given up my position at the office and had more dressmaking than I could possibly do alone. Mother, who had been deeply interested from the start, learned a great deal and helped me. But I had to get first one, then two, women to do the plain sewing. Now I am planning to move my shop from home to a business block in town.

Of course, our own clothes problems are a thing of the past. The dresses mother and I wear are always admired, the children have an abundance of attractive clothes and there is no more worrying about money. My income is large enough to make us very comfortable indeed.

To any woman who wants to make her own clothes or take up dressmaking as a profession, my advice is: Write the Woman's Institute and ask about its work. More than 125,000 delighted members have proved that you can easily and quickly learn at home, in spare time, to make all your own and your children's clothes and hats, or prepare for success in dressmaking or millinery as a profession.

Remember that every claim made by the Woman's Institute is borne out by its six years of experience in successfully teaching dressmaking, millinery and cookery in the home. The Institute is now the largest woman's school in the world. Its growth has been made possible only because it has rendered a service worth many times its small cost to every student. Many women's colleges grant credits for work done with the Institute, showing their high regard for the quality of its instruction.

The Institute is ready to help you, no matter where you live or what your circumstances or your needs. And it costs you absolutely nothing to find out what it can do for you. Just send a letter, post card or the convenient coupon below to the Woman's Institute, Dept. 31-A, Scranton, Pa., and you will receive, without obligation, the full story of this great school that is bringing to women and girls all over the world, the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes and hats, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business.

"When was it made?" That's the inevitable question that a picture of a child provokes. You know the answer now, perhaps, but later—

I really think I ought to try CLARKS' Reducing Salts, of which I have heard so much praise.

The Family Physician

Come to the consulting room and read what the Family Physician has to say about Health and the Home. The best of advice from one of Canada's most eminent women physicians is at our readers' service.

Questions about Health, Sanitary Subjects and the prevention of disease will be answered in this column from time to time, subject to reasonable limitations. If requested, replies will be sent direct to the correspondent if a stamped addressed envelope is enclosed, but no diagnosis or prescription can be given. This coupon should be enclosed with inquiry.

A BALANCED RATION

ONE of our esteemed readers writes to say that she is keeping all the Rules of Health to the best of her ability. Daily Exercise, proper Breathing and tonic baths, she attends to carefully but she says she is at a loss as to "A Balanced Ration"—and that she would "very much appreciate any assistance" the Family Physician can give her.

Madam, you shall have it.

You ask—"How many calories shall I eat every day?"

"What is considered A Good Balanced Meal?"

"Is there any book you can recommend which will give me reliable information?"

Well Madam, now to answer your questions—and I am sorry you have had to wait for your turn so long.

Once a Month

YOU see when I have only one talk with you in the month, and when so many of our readers do us the honour and pleasure of writing to consult us, it sometimes means delay in answering. This reader weighs one-hundred-and-twenty-three pounds and stands five feet eight inches. Of course that is rather underweight. A physician examining her for Life Insurance would make a much more careful examination than if she weighed one-hundred-and-forty-three pounds. But that does not mean at all that he would reject her. Her family may be inclined towards the minimum weight instead of towards the maximum weight and, as a rule, that is all the better for the family.

A spare habit, provided always that health and vigour are satisfactory, is no disadvantage.

The Best Book

About the book. I have nine of them in a row before me—and they are only the little ones. Thompson and my other big authorities look down on me from the shelves. Perhaps the one you would like best would be this one:—

"The Cost of Food. A Study in Diets," by Ellen H. Richards, late of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. A great woman was Mrs. Richards. Be sure you ask for the third edition, revised under the direction of Prof. J. F. Norton.

The book is published by Chapman and Hall, London, England, and by John Wiley and Sons, New York City, and may of course be obtained from your own bookseller.

Now about the balanced ration or the balanced meal, which is very much the same thing.

Five Food Groups

As Mrs. Richards points out, following Atwater and Hunt, there are five main groups of ordinary foods, as follows:—

Group I—Foods depended on for mineral matters, vegetable acids, and body-regulating substances.

Fruits: Apples, pears, etc. Bananas, Berries, Melons, Oranges, Lemons, etc.

Vegetables; Salads—lettuce, celery, etc. Potherbs, or "greens", Potatoes and root vegetables, Green peas, beans, etc. Tomatoes, squash, etc.

Group II—Foods depended on for protein.

Milk, skim milk, cheese, etc. Eggs, Meat, Poultry.

Fish, Dried peas, beans, etc. Nuts.

Group III—Foods depended on for starch.

Cereal, grains, meals, flours, etc. Cereal breakfast foods, Bread, Crackers, Macaroni and other pastes.

Cakes, cookies, starchy pudding etc. Potatoes and other starchy vegetables.

Group IV—Foods depended on for sugar.

Sugar, Molasses, Syrups, Honey.

Candies, Fruits preserved in sugar, Jellies and dried fruits, Sweet cakes and desserts.

Group V—Foods depended on for fat.

Butter and cream, Lard, suet, and other cooking fats.

Salt pork and bacon, Table and salad oils.

One or more out of each of these five groups should be on the table at each meal and then the safest rule in diet is to eat some of everything that is set before us.

But you, Madam, as you are rather underweight, should eat most of Group five; then Group four; then Group three; and then Group one.

Take meat once a day. That is often enough for anybody.

Eat Slowly

Another thing you should try to do, Madam, is to MASTICATE SLOWLY.

Thin spare people often bolt their food and it is rather more likely than not that you do. No, I know you do not think so, but my honest opinion is that you do! Try and see. Time yourself. You should take about half an hour to eat your breakfast and your lunch, or supper, and about forty minutes to eat your dinner.

Those who wish to reduce weight should eat less. They should consume at each meal a smaller quantity of food, and should especially reduce the quantity they eat of groups three, four and five.

The Balanced Meal

The balanced meal, then, is one that has all five groups represented in it, or at least, all five groups should be well represented in the three meals of each day taken as a whole.

The "Calorie"

The Calorie is a convenient way of measuring food—or rather of expressing the amount of nourishment in food. But what does it mean? A calorie is a measure of the energy, or strength, or heat, that we get out of a certain portion of food. The usual definition is this:—"A Calorie is the amount of heat required to raise one kilogram of water one degree centigrade in temperature."

How My Wife and I Turn Spare Hours at Home Into Dollars

The remarkable way in which Mr. and Mrs. P. J. Monaghan solved their extra money problem. Every wife, self-supporting girl, and father of a family can now use spare time to make money at home—in the same way they did.

By P. J. MONAGHAN

THE years 1916 and '17 were lean years for the working man in our part of the country, especially if he happened to be the sole support of a large family.

I kept hoping for some way to increase my income, and finally I had an idea. At this time the Red Cross and the St. John's Ambulance Society were appealing for aid in knitting socks for our Canadian Forces Overseas.

I had seen a hand-knitting machine advertised, and I thought that if I could get one I could help the Red Cross by knitting socks, and at the same time use the machine to increase my small salary and keep the wolf from the door.

With this idea in mind, I found the address of the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company in our local paper and finally sent for an Auto Knitter.

When the machine arrived my wife and I turned to the instruction book, and therein found the answer to all our questions. I was soon able to make splendid socks. I became more and more delighted with myself and the machine.

How I Started Making Money

I now volunteered to knit socks for the soldiers. The St. John's Ambulance Society furnished me with yarn. I knit several pairs of plain socks and was complimented on my work. I felt very gratified, for I was requested to knit more and was to receive 20 cents a pair for the work.

I began to make and sell socks to private customers as well as knitting for the Ambulance Society. In a comparatively short time I had my machine paid for. I was now making $15.00 a week in my spare time. My wife was able to buy clothing and shoes for herself and the children.

This story would be incomplete and convey a very wrong idea if I did not make it plain that I could not have accomplished all I have without the valuable help of my better half, Mrs. Monaghan.

$125 Earned in Spare Time

In about eighteen months from the time I started knitting I had a surplus bank account of $125.00.

Our house at this time consisted of a two-roomed shack on a rented lot. I decided now to buy a lot on which to move my shack. I selected a beautiful locality and arranged easy terms of payment, the price being $475.00—$100 cash and the balance $10.00 a month. I kept on using the Auto Knitter steadily in my spare time to add to my income, and in less than a year my property was paid for.

When the overseas demand for socks declined, I noticed that the quality of wool socks sold in the local stores was very inferior. I saw that there would be a good demand for a better article, and I knew I could supply it with my Auto Knitter.

So I bought some of the best wool in the city, manufactured it into socks and exhibited my goods to James Ramsey, Ltd. (one of the largest departmental stores in our city).

They gave me a trial order for three dozen pairs. Within a few hours after delivery I had a telephone call from the hosiery department of Ramsey's store, asking me to bring them fifty dozen pairs more! It wasn't possible for me to do this, but the James Ramsey Company took all I could supply them up to the year 1919.

Turned Poverty Into Independence

1920 was my banner year. I now of course had a little capital. Also I knew the demand for a good article. I purchased the best yarn obtainable, getting a substantial discount on a quantity purchase. I worked all summer, knitting this on the Auto Knitter in my spare time, but sold none until October, 1920.

Then I advertised my goods, also stating that I would make socks to order. Many people brought their own wool. I had to work hard to fill all the orders, even with the supply I had on hand. People from all over the city, including the Mayor and the Attorney General of the Province, came to purchase my socks. My advertising brought in orders from Calgary, Red Deer, Wetaskinwin, and Fort Saskatchewan.

I made, one evening after work that winter, $7.50 on the Auto Knitter, but you may infer that I did not retire very early.

After all the thousands of pairs of socks we have made, our Auto Knitter is as good as the day we received it, and it has never cost one cent for repairs.

Made New Home Possible

Last February we purchased a beautiful nine room house, as shown in the photograph, and had it moved to our lot. In our new house we arranged a work room where we can use the Auto Knitter. This house and lot, which is a real home, is now worth about five thousand dollars. What part the Auto Knitter has played in this splendid evolution it is difficult to figure precisely, as separate accounts were not kept.

This much I can vouch for, however. During the months of October, November and December, 1920, my bank account increased $700.00, and many days my wife took in $45.00 for socks sold. Of course this was covering the previous summer's work.

The Auto Knitter was kept going every spare moment I had. I verily believe that if we had not had it, we would have had to appeal to the Sunshine Society or other charitable organizations for help when times were the hardest with us. I am also sure that, but for the Auto Knitter, we should be tenants of a two-roomed shack on a rented lot.

I wish that I might be able to place an Auto Knitter in every home, especially where there is a large family. I believe that the gap between poverty and independence would be bridged in every case where there is industry and good management.

The man or woman who is ambitious, and wishes to improve his or her circumstances, can in no way employ their spare time better than in knitting socks on an Auto Knitter, either under the Company's Work Contract or for their own local trade. It will bring comfort and even luxury to the home and be the means of bringing joy and happiness to the family.

P. J. Monaghan, Alberta.

Mr. and Mrs. Monaghan have been very enterprising and energetic in using their machine to advance themselves and improve their circumstances. Mr. Monaghan was fortunate in being able to find a good local market for all the socks he could turn out, so he preferred not to take advantage of the Work Contract we sign with every purchaser of an Auto Knitter.

A Market for Every Salable Sock Guaranteed

This contract obligates us to accept and pay for every pair of socks sent us by an Auto Knitter owner—when made according to our standard directions. Hundreds and hundreds of Auto Knitter workers take advantage of this guaranteed market, and send us their entire output without trying to sell socks to local customers—although they are in no way bound to do so.

They simply send us the socks they knit and we send them back checks in payment for their work, at a guaranteed, fixed rate per pair. We also replace each time the amount of yarn used in the socks received.

The Auto Knitter comes to you with a sock already started in it, a supply of yarn, and a complete instruction book that makes everything plain.

Write Today for Our Offer

If you can use extra money—and most women can in these times—you will want to know all about the machine that has meant so much to Mrs. Monaghan's home and thousands of others all over Canada, England, and the United States. Send right away for the company's free literature and read the experience of some of the thousands of other Auto Knitter workers. Find out what substantial amounts even a small number of your spare hours will earn for you. Remember that experience is unnecessary, that you do not need to know how to knit.

Send your name and address now and find out all the good things that are possible for you. The Auto Knitter Hosiery (Canada) Co., Ltd., Dept. 431 Davenport Road, West Toronto, Canada.

additional privacy and greater economy, as well as improved architectural character.

THERE are several incidentals to comfortable and convenient living which should not be overlooked in the planning of a hall. The first in to avoid any inharmonious relationship between the hall and the rooms that adjoin.

Nevertheless, the neutrality of effect need not be provocative of either coldness or monotony; for there is a wealth of variety in the so-called neutral tints. Tan, fawn, ecru, camel, faintly-outlined block patterns. Nevertheless, for the amateur decorator, the choice most likely to insure satisfactory results is the unpatterned wall finish, whether plaster, paint, paper or fabric be decided upon.

To maintain architectural consistency, the use is almost imperative, in certain types of hall, of dark-stained woodwork, occasionally even carried ceiling-high in paneling; but, for other than a large or an exceptionally well-lighted hall, light-painted woodwork is infinitely better—Ivory white, cream, putty or French gray being especially suitable. This lighter finish fits in admirably with the present vogue for harmonizing walls and woodwork and tends to increase the apparent size of any room wherein it is employed. In one hall, a complete metamorphosis was recently wrought without the slightest structural alteration. The walls were stripped of their dark green and gold-flowered paper and hung with a straw-colored Japanese grasscloth: the nondescript brown woodwork scraped and painted to exactly match the walls. Presto! The cramped darkness had yielded its sceptre to expansive cheerfulness!

Although wood, tile, stone, slate, brick and cement are all available materials for the hall floor, the first-named is the only one suitable for a hall that is to be used as a living-room or a reception-room. For the floor of a hall which is only intended for an entrance or a passage red quarry tile is, however, preferable to wood, as it is not only easier to keep clean, but far less likely to show marks of wear at an early stage. Of course, tile is relatively expensive at the outset—but, whether in building or decoration, it is only fair to judge costs by their eventual rather than their initial phase.

Quite irrespective of the floor constructive material, the floor-covering in the hall should be in the form of rugs or long runners, rather than all-over carpets—in any event, on the score of cleanliness. Especially if in all other details the hall be neutral, there is in the selection of the rugs an opportunity to strike a telling decorative note by introducing into the hall the colors that predominate in the adjoining rooms. Thus, if mulberry be the dominating hue in the living-room, blue in the dining-room and taupe in the library, the three colors may be combined in the hall rugs to effect a pleasantly harmonious ensemble.

FOR a hall that is pronouncedly Colonial in its architectural treatment, the rag rugs, either hooked, woven or braided, which now enjoy a widespread popularity, are ideal: particularly for summer use. They are light in weight, easy to clean and of infinite variety in coloring and combination. For richness of effect, Oriental rugs, of course, remain supreme; although many of our domestic rugs, notably those in which motifs of the Far East govern the designs, warrant commendation, on account of their beauty of coloring and excellence of weave. The attractive blues and yellows of the Chinese rugs are also interesting for hall use, provided the same colors are to be employed in any adjoining rooms.

Restraint and welcome! Our stage is now set for the play of these qualities, save for the choosing and arranging of the necessary furniture. Just here it is well to stress that word necessary. Many halls lack restraint, lack dignity, even their power to welcome, simply by reason of the unnecessary furniture and fittings which they harbor. If homemakers could but realize how very little furniture is actually required

A PICTURESQUE LIVING-HALL

Unadorned, the oyster-white plastered walls of this attractive living-hall rise to the second-floor ceiling-height, except at one end, where the wall is paneled in wood to a shallow landing. The woodwork is stained to a warm brown that harmonizes with the oak and walnut furniture chosen for the room. The chair-coverings range in coloring from claret to fuchsia and dull gilt galoon adds still further richness. Especially decorative is the tall candelabra of wrought iron with its seven golden candles.

importance of these adjuncts is a coat-closet to serve as a proper repository for outdoor garments. Preferably, the coat-closet should be located near the main entrance and either communicating with or adjacent to a lavatory. A small telephone-room—if possible against an outside wall, that light and air may be freely admitted, and equipped with a counter for the telephone, a low stool and a self-closing door—is another feature too valuable to be omitted.

By what mediums can we now proceed to rear, upon the foundation laid by the architectural development of the hall, a superstructure which shall be thoroughly indicative as much of restraint as of welcome? First, perhaps, among the conciliatory mediums, we should place color, although very closely behind should be ranked furniture and its placement. In the judicious employment of these lies the great secret of successful hall treatment.

So long as restraint remains an essential quality, it is obvious that in the general coloring of a hall there can be no hilarious hues, no futuristic flights, permitted to dominate, although neither need be excluded, in so far as the minor accessories are concerned. The preferable basic coloring is, instead, neutral in effect—not alone to denote restraint, but café-au-lait, putty, yellowish gray—each of these is warm-toned, yet sufficiently neutral to suitably clothe the hall-walls and to form an agreeable background for any more glowing colors to be introduced in furniture or fitment.

Golden yellow—"bottled sunshine," as it has been aptly described—really deserves a separate paragraph for, although it is the antithesis of neutral, golden yellow not only lends itself well to combination with almost all colors, but marvelously brightens any room whose wall it covers. As halls are, as a rule, anything but brilliantly lighted, golden yellow holds a unique and very special place in the realm of hall decoration.

In itself, an absence of pattern implies restraint. For that reason, a patternless wall is excellent in any hall. Occasionally, however—especially in the hall that must serve both as reception-room and passage—an air of real distinction and interest can be imparted by the use of a patterned wall-covering. A continuous pictorial subject, after the manner of the quaint scenic wallpapers loved by our forefathers, is always decorative, whether developed in naturalistic or neutral colorings. Almost equally effective are the soft-toned, blurred foliage designs, so reminiscent of ancient tapestries, and some of the

The blurred foliage paper used in this simple little hall shows a pleasant blending of warm-toned grays and taupe, that is thoroughly in accord with the woodwork finish of French gray and mahogany. In the rugs, which are of domestic weave, the pattern is developed in taupe, gray and terra cotta on a dark blue background; and the mahogany furniture is upholstered in a fabric that carries the same distinctive combination.

9784—Ladies' Blouse. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. No. 9793—Ladies' One-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 24 to 36 waist. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. The costume in medium size requires 5 yards 40-inch Canton crepe—¾ yard 40-inch Georgette crepe for sleeves. Embroidery in design 12574 is applied to the wide bracelet sleeves. It takes the form of floral motifs and straight lines, to be worked out in running stitch and French knots or in small beads and bugles. The blouse itself closes at center-front and the overblouse closes on the left shoulder. In this attractive gown a wide panel is applied across the back of the one-piece gathered skirt and the side edges of the panel fall in jabot-like drapery descending in points below the skirt to give the fashionable uneven hem-line. The drapery may be faced with contrasting material or picoté.

Patterns may be purchased from any Pictorial Review Agent in the United States and Canada or by mail, postage prepaid, if you address the Company, 222 West 39th Street, New York City. Prices 20c to 35c.

9743—Misses' One-piece Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about 1¾ yard. Size 16 requires 2¼ yards 54-inch Poirer twill—¼ yard 36-inch linen for collar and cuffs.

9791—Misses' One-piece Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 16 requires 2¾ yards 54-inch wool Jersey—¼ yard 36-inch linen for collar and cuffs. The dress slips on over the head, and is slashed at the center-front where the closing is arranged. It is gathered at the neck, front and back, giving a soft fullness that is very becoming to girlish figures. Elastic is run through a casing adjusted on the underside of the dress at the waist-line, and this draws the dress into the figure and permits of its blousing over the girdle. The collar is a new variation of the bateau collar, and is distinctly smart.

9786—Misses' Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about 1½ yard. Size 16 requires 3¾ yards 40-inch satin crepe—2¾ yards satin ribbon. Braiding in design 12319 trims this dress effectively. It may be worked out in soutache braid. The dress is slashed at the side showing the contrasting underskirt.

Size 16 requires $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards 36-inch velvet— $\frac{3}{4}$ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. An allover beading design, 12612, is applied to blouse and also to the points on the skirt. The beading may be in jet, steel, or iridescent beads or if preferred braiding may be used carried out in soutache braid in self-color or silver.

9802—Ladies' and Misses' Dress. Designed for 16 to 20 years, and 34 to 42 bust. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard. Size 16 requires $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards 40-inch satin crepe. The dress is a one-piece slip-on model in the modish drop-shoulder style, and with the fastenings arranged on the shoulders. The uneven hem-line so much in vogue is gained by narrow panels at the sides which fall in graceful jabot-like drapery ending in points below the hem of the skirt. The model is adapted to any of the soft silks and crepes of the season.

Glistening Gowns and Lovely Fal-de-Rals

By Charlotte M. Storey

GAY colors will illuminate many a gladsome occasion between now and the beginning of Lent, for bright colors and light tints predominate in evening dresses and dance frocks. Black gowns there will be, but as the sombre cluster of spruce, that in the autumn, makes a foil for the flaming maple in the foreground. And, as if all this brilliancy were not sufficient, our friend Dame Fashion has had her handmaidens embroidering net flouncings and tunics with rhinestones and sequins, till they almost dazzle our beholding eyes.

Even the fabrics glisten. Chiffon velvets have a sheen like polished steel; shot taffetas toss back their glints of light and satins glow like moonlight.

who took dove grey Georgette crepe and almost covered it with porcelain bead embroidery in wisteria shades and then girdled it with jade moire ribbon.

Young and old are wearing velvet and also lace. There are some very pretty dancy frocks made of cherry-colored velvet, sapphire, jade, etc., with panel fronts hanging straight from neck to hem, the top being cut straight across, meeting the back panel on the shoulders, thus forming what is called the boat neck. This is cut rather high, especially across the front and one must confess that it is not always as becoming as some other styles that one finds in these youthful frocks.

The décolletage is not nearly so

One of the big dress questions of the day concerns the length of the skirt. You have all heard that gay Parisians have let their skirts down to the floor, or at least to the ankle—we have seen pictures that prove the report to be no idle rumor, but what of us here in Canada—shall we do likewise?

Dressmakers say "No." But one rather thinks we shall see a few concessions and a gradual letting down of the hem when spring comes. In the meantime, the couturier is compromising with a soft uneven line around the bottom of the skirt, frequently referred to as the "uneven hem." But, friends, it is not an uneven hem. It is drapery and sashes that are allowed to drop down below the hem and now that we are accustomed to it, we think it is quite the prettiest fashion that has obtained for many a day. Can't you recall the anguish of mind you have at times when you felt that your skirt did not hang even and how many anxious moments you spent before the glass trying to convince yourself that it was even, because you couldn't help yourself if it wasn't?

The vogue of wider skirts has materialized only for young girls. Some of their party frocks have full skirts—indeed many of them have hoops on the sides extending down as far as the knees, and if a pretty tight bodice tops the skirt, all the better for her who can wear it. These are in both taffeta and velvet, but particularly the former.

WITH so many parties on the tapis, one sees a great many new evening cloaks in the city, and velvet is the favored material—brocaded, if possible; if not, then the plain velvet may be embroidered and it is lined with gorgeously-colored printed silk. There is of course a fur collar—a very generous one of kolinsky, sable, Canadian beaver, mole, lynx or squirrel. Brown, taupe, peacock and crimson are some of the shades used for these sumptuous evening cloaks. Fur must also be taken into consideration when the subject is an evening wrap for a Canadian winter. Exquisite kolinsky, moleskin, squirrel, beaver, Hudson seal, to say nothing of ermine, wraps, are to be found in the exclusive furrier's. They are wraps and no mistake—full length garments with loose sleeves and "rests" inside where the hands may snuggle while they hold the fronts together, keeping out the cold, and then great deep collars which are almost a garment, every one of them.

There is little said about muffs which we used to carry with so much pride and satisfaction, but a cable from England the other day brought the news that the Princess Mary had been seen carrying one while out with her fiancé a few days before, so they may be coming back into fashion once again.

FASHION is very exacting about footwear for frolicking feet this season. Light shoes and hosiery are essential for gowns of palest tints, but for the stronger shades black patent strap pumps with hosiery the shade of the frock are quite permissible. Plain chiffon silk hosiery or with lace inserts are what is being worn.

Scarves of every kind, but especially lace are what every woman needs who goes out of an evening. We at once recognize the Spanish influence on fashion with the introduction of Spanish lace scarves, than which there is nothing more beautiful and useful. The real Spanish scarves are to be had in black and white and an imitation in the pastel tints—blue, pink and gray. The cob-webby Shetland wool shawls and scarves are with us again after an absence of several seasons due to the war.

A Charming Evening Gown.

Radium laces in large open mesh have their lustre too, so you see that whatever you elect to wear on festive occasions, you must perforce scintillate.

For the debutante there is nothing much prettier than a white net tunic embroidered with brilliants and made up over a foundation of silver cloth. The tunic really makes the gown and no other trimming is required. Naturally, silver shoes and stockings go with it; a string of pearls for the neck and pretty bandeau of some kind for the hair, and lo! the debutante is ready for her debut.

But tunics are not the exclusive property of the young and fair. There are beautiful black ones made glorious with jet or colored sequins which matrons and dowagers delight to wear, and one does not hesitate to recommend them, for the best dressmakers are using them for their most fastidious patrons.

An artistic combination of color was achieved by a French designer conspicuously low as it was last year, and in many of the frocks for the younger set, there are short, quaint little puffs at the shoulders, which in our grandmother's day were thought quite worthy the name of a sleeve, even for street clothes. There are still many gowns with only straps over the shoulders but they are much more reliable-looking than the average of last year. We really are getting quite modest, even in our most festive raiment.

The back and front of the evening dresses are quite plain, but unless one's figure actually forbids, there are draperies on the sides and this is where even with velvet, lace comes in very handy. Some of the handsomest models have lace sleeves, mere draperies, or in some cases, long and wide, blending with cascading down the side of the skirt, all of lace. Radium lace is dyed in bright shades such as flame, jade, cardinal, pink and blue, as well as black and brown.

1000 Eggs in Every Hen

New System of Poultry Keeping—Get Dollar A Dozen Eggs—Famous Poultryman

TELLS HOW

"The great trouble with the poultry business has always been that the laying life of a hen was too short says Henry Trafford, International Poultry Expert and Breeder, for nearly eighteen years Editor of Poultry Success.

The average pullet lays 150 eggs. If kept the second year she may lay 100 more. Then she goes to market. Yet, it has been scientifically established that every pullet is born or hatched with over one thousand minute egg germs in her system—and will lay them on a highly profitable basis over a period of four to six years' time if given proper care.

How to work to get 1,000 eggs from every hen; how to get pullets laying early; how to make the old hens lay like pullets; how to keep up heavy laying production all through cold winter months when eggs are highest; triple egg production; make slacker hens hustle; $5.00 profit from every hen in six winter months. These and many other money making poultry secrets are contained in Mr. Trafford's "1,000 EGG HEN" system of poultry raising, one copy of which will be sent absolutely free to any reader of this paper who keeps six hens or more. Eggs should go to a dollar or more a dozen this winter. This means big profit to the poultry keeper who gets the eggs. Mr. Trafford tells how, if you keep chickens and want them to make money for you, cut out this ad and send it with your name and address to Henry Trafford, Suite 342F Court Bldg., Birmingham, N.Y., and a free copy of "THE 1,000 EGG HEN" will be sent by return mail.

Canadian Women's Institutes

Johnson, Islington; Mrs. Gardiner, Owen Sound; Mrs. F. Wilson, Mount Forest; Mrs. McDonnough, Cope-town; Mrs. A. B. Rose, Echo Place; Mrs. A. A. Watt, Bracebridge; while the remaining members are: Mrs. A. H. Robertson, Maxville; Mrs. Dummer, Carleton Place; Mrs. Charles Yates, Athens; Mrs. Edwards, Komoka; Mrs. Bruner, Olinda; Mrs. Kerstine, Matheson; Mrs. W. J. Nixon, Sault Ste. Marie; and Mrs. A. McTaggart, Fort Francis. The directors later elected the officers.

The Hon. Manning Doherty, Minister of Agriculture, gave an excellent evening address, emphasizing the work being accomplished by the Women's Institutes in the upbuilding of community and national life.

While there was a rapid development of the work in many districts, there were still thousands of centres which might be established for community work, where short courses could be taken in the winter months, and where child welfare could receive the necessary attention. It was of the utmost importance to save the rising generation and educate them for complete citizenship. Mr. Doherty congratulated the institutes upon the number of community halls being built. There was a great work which could be done by the women in welcoming the new settlers who had emigrated from overseas. They could stretch out the hand of friendship and advise the newcomers in many ways, giving practical assistance in meeting the new conditions. A campaign was now being carried on in rural Britain to induce the best type of agricultural workers to come to the Canadian farms. It would be unwise to allow all classes of people to flock in indiscriminately. They should possess a British sense of justice and British ideals, and must be law-abiding. There must be co-operative effort in production and marketing, and the standard of Canadian products must be such as to inspire confidence. Mr. Doherty expressed his opinion that all organizations should retain their initiative, and not be controlled by the Government.

Dr. Annie Rose of Guelph spoke on "Recreation in the Community". The speaker dwelt on the fact that play is a character-building factor, children learning from their earliest games an idea of fair play and an ability to be cheerful losers. A description was given of the use of amateur plays in the community work, and the pleasure afforded to the young people in the drama.

Dr. A. E. Marty, Public School Inspector, Toronto, gave a stimulating address, pointing out the need for education on broad and general lines, not merely emphasizing agriculture in the case of the farm boy or girl, or the technical side, in the case of the boy or girl from the city. Education was not only a question of book learning. It had become vitalized by the introduction of dramatics, gymnasium work, handicrafts, household science, etc. The Adolescent School Act, which had now come into force, making education compulsory up to a higher age, had necessarily abolished fees in the case of High Schools, and this was also an advance. Dr. Marty emphasized the importance of extending the Consolidated Schools.

Miss K. F. McIntosh, Department of Agriculture, Brampton, gave a fine address, showing where the Institutes might co-operate in the matter of education and better schools.

Mrs. Pankhurst dealt briefly and effectively with several matters concerning public health, and Miss O. Cruickshank of the Ontario Agricultural Staff, Guelph, explained that the college stands ready to help the members of the institutes and to co-operate with them in short courses and demonstrations.

Dr. J. J. Middleton, Department of Health, Toronto, gave an address on the work of the Provincial Board of Health, showing how progressive is the modern campaign, and Dr. Margaret Patterson gave a practical and graphic talk on "Available Helps on Health Lines", and illustrated a talk on "Foot Follies", showing the necessity of wearing sensible boots. She emphasized the need for nourishing foods. There must be a strong reverence for God taught to the children and a respect for life itself. Her book, "Conserving Our Best", was written with a view to answering health questions for the home.

Miss W. I. Brodie of the Department of Agriculture, gave an instructive address on "The Value of Business Methods." The announcement by the President that the Women's Institutes of Ontario would remain associated with the Department of Agriculture was greeted with applause.

The retiring President, Mrs. William Todd, paid tribute to the untiring, unselfish, whole-hearted service of the members of the board of directors of the Federated Women's Institutes of Ontario. The amount of work which she herself had put into the federation, declared the retiring president, was a slight thing compared with the wealth of experience which had come out of it.

"The institute in its federation has a great future," said Mrs. Todd, quoting the prophet of old, who had said, "Where there is no vision the people perish."

"We have in our institutes," went on the speaker, "the finest units in the land in our individual branch members; but the vision our federation presents to you is a mighty massing of these units 'for home and country'—in better schools, in better health measures, in better agriculture, in better home-making, in better laws; with all these as our united aims our whole rural life will be dignified; it will be known as the way of life, most truly blessed."

Mrs. Todd was presented with a leather attache case and a hand bag. Mrs. Hewson of West Simcoe and Mrs. A. A. Watt of South Muskoka making the presentation. There were also presentations of flowers to Mrs. Sutherland Ross and Mrs. Macoun.

Officers elected for the ensuing year were: Honorary President, Mr. Putnam; President, Mrs. George Edwards; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. Charles Yates, Athens; Mrs. Nixon, Sault Ste. Marie; Mrs. Gardiner, Owen Sound; Recording Secretary, Miss W. Brodie; Corresponding Secretary Mrs. Macoun, Campbellford; Publicity Convenor, Miss Chapman; Legislative, Dr. Downing; Health, Dr. Patterson; Agriculture, Mrs. Leggett; Home Economics, Miss Cruickshank; Education and Better Schools, Mrs. McIntosh; Immigration, Mrs. Meade. Mrs. J. O. Allan, of Fort William, was elected as an additional director and was presented with a bouquet of flowers. A vote of thanks was passed to Miss Coatsworth and to Miss Beardmore for the community singing which had proved such a splendid feature of the convention.

Discussion of resolutions took up considerable time this afternoon at the closing session of the Women's Institute convention. The following were included in those brought in:

Whereas we, the women of the Women's Institute of Ontario, view with apprehension the military activities of the world;

And whereas, our country, with others, has suffered the privations of war;

And whereas, we believe that such activities may precipitate another war;

Be it resolved, that we ask our Federal Government to use its influence with other nations to restrict or cease such activities.

Such was one of the resolutions passed at the annual convention.

Another resolution, dealing with Indian affairs, asked, first, that the Government establish at least one camp in every province to which tuberculous Indians may be sent; and secondly, that training be provided in hospitals for Indian girls, who will be expected to return as nurses, especially for tubercular patients among their own people.

Other resolutions were:

That applicants for marriage licenses secure a medical certificate of health, and that medical examination be made by the medical health officer; and that women be given a place in the Senate, in order that moral issues may receive just consideration; that suitable provision for the feeble-minded be taken up more aggressively by the Provincial Government; that the Women's Institutes place themselves on record as being opposed to capital punishment; that the right of married women to take out citizenship papers in her own right be provided for; that the establishment of supervised playgrounds, swimming pools, and gymnasiums be encouraged, and wherever public dancing is allowed, a qualified supervisor be in attendance. A resolution was also passed approving of moving-pictures that are uplifting and amusing, but decidedly opposing pictures of a criminal or sensational nature, and urging that no child under twelve years be

Had Your Iron Today?

A Vital Attraction

that some women overlook

—the proper use of foods frequently determines youth or age. Note what a famous sanitarium prescribes

There's a reason for stewed raisins—a dainty breakfast dish—that transcends their unique attraction for the palate.

That reason is food-iron. Raisins are rich in it.

Food-iron is the basis of a rare vitality and magnetism that are woman's greatest charms.

Some women overlook these real attractions, thinking mainly of trim features and rosy lips and cheeks. Yet iron promotes true beauty, too, by producing natural color that cosmetics cannot imitate. There's no beauty that is so beautiful as the good looks of good health.

Not youth's sole rights

These attractions don't belong to youth alone. Women of forty-five and fifty may preserve them and enhance them. And certain foods—the “iron-foods” like raisins—are prime aids.

You need but a small bit of iron daily, yet that need is vital.

That dish of luscious stewed raisins enjoyed regularly each morning is a safeguard to proper iron supply.

At Battle Creek

Stewed raisins is a part of “the treatment” in the famous sanitarium at Battle Creek for pale-cheeked, listless women who are old before their time.

Physicians thus attest the power of raisins as a regular breakfast dish.

Take their advice and try it for yourself.

It's good food if you're well, to retain those vital powers and that natural beauty if you have them. Begin tomorrow to make a two weeks' test. If you feel under par or are a little pale, this dish may “re-make” you in just the way you wish.

SUN-MAID RAISINS

We make Sun-Maid Raisins from finest California table grapes—kinds too delicate to ship fresh long distances. The grapes are juicy, tender, thin-skinned, and so are the raisins. Try them stewed. There never was a daintier breakfast dish.

Seeded, blue package (seeds removed), best for pie and bread; Seedless, red package (grown without seeds), best for stewing; Clusters (on the stem)—a luscious, quick dessert. All dealers sell them. Insist on Sun-Maid brand.

Raisins are cheaper by 30% than formerly—see that you get plenty in your foods.

between level green banks, just like any quite undistinguished canal. Then one comes to the first of the world-renowned locks, the Miraflores. Attainment, particularly when heralded by those excellent press-agents Rumour and Supposition, is apt to bring a chill of disappointment. In this case, however, even the most hardened traveller can only exclaim with the ungrudging admiration of the Queen of Sheba "and, lo, the half was not told me!" It would be useless for the mere lay mind to pretend to have grasped the workings of these wonderful locks, even after having them laboriously explained, with diagrams, by one member of the ship's crew after another: still more useless to attempt a technical description. One need be no technical expert, however, to see in imagination something of the extraordinary engineering difficulties encountered in a task of such unparalleled magnitude and to appreciate the indomitable perseverance and high degree of skill necessary to overcome them. Beyond this, the ordinary observer can only marvel at the exceeding size and strength of the great steel gates swinging open with exact precision at the touch of a lever: at the gentleness with which this vast volume of water lifts the mighty vessel as easily as a cockleshell craft: at the "many inventions" of man in making terms with Nature and harnessing this irresistible force to work for him. Leaving out the strength and solidarity of the locks the whole scene looks as if it had been transplanted from an Exhibition City. Everything is of dazzling white concrete and there are rows and rows of arc lamps making the passage of the canal as easy and safe by night as by day. The locks are built in pairs and a huge illuminated arrow points to the side the incoming vessel has to take. The lock chambers are one thousand feet long, but supplementary gates divide each into two compartments of six hundred and four hundred feet. As ninety per cent of the vessels at present using the canal will fit into one or other of these compartments their use means a great saving of time, labour and water, but with the snobbery only a really big boat knows we rejoiced in taking up the entire length of the locks! To ward against any possibility of accident, vessels are not allowed to enter or go through the locks under their own steam, but are towed by little electric engines working from tracks laid on top of the lock walls—four engines to a boat, two forward and two aft.

The Miraflores Locks raised the boat fifty feet by a series of two locks into a small lake two miles long. At the end of this lake the Pedro Miguel Lock raised it another thirty-five feet right into the Culebra Cut. Perhaps this part of the canal will always be the most spectacular and convincing to the ordinary ship's passenger. One can see plainly what has been done. Nine miles of mountain have been removed, not by faith only but by dynamite and steam shovels, by truck and barge loads, and the "big ditch" flowing sluggishly between grim, perpendicular walls divides the rocky backbone running through North and South America. This spine of hills has been dissected at its lowest point. Gold Hill, the highest peak in the Cut, is about four hundred feet high. A ragged, sloping bank of earth and rock on the right reaching far back into the hills marks the devastating progress of the great Cucuracha Slide which slid over the Cut like a glacier. One could see that if the Cut had been all through solid rock they would not have had such trouble with slides as it would simply have been a matter of blasting a way through and no worse than a railway tunnel: being of volcanic origin, a mixture of soft earth and rock, the hills are continually giving. Steam dredges were at work on both sides of the Cut sucking up the constantly slipping mud into barges to be towed away and emptied well out of the canal's course.

THE Culebra Cut leads straight into Gatun Lake, and now what miracle was this. A great ocean-going liner steaming at full speed over a freshwater lake twenty miles inland and eighty-five feet above the level of the sea! It is difficult to realize that this lake is man-made and that the many wooded islands dotting the twenty-four mile course were mountain tops only a few years ago. The lake fits so perfectly into the encircling arms of the hills that even the long, low, verdure-clad ridge of Gatun Dam which, by damming the torrential Chagres river flooded its valley and created the lake, seems to melt imperceptibly into and form part of the hills themselves. The discovery of the unwanted luxury of fresh water baths caused a regular rush on the bathrooms, and apropos of fresh water, this run through the lake is quite a financial consideration as an off-set to canal dues: the expense of drydocking vessels to scrape off the barnacles is saved as the fresh water kills them all off. There is an immense hydro-electric station at the head of the lake: water from the spillway of the dam supplies the power for operating and hauling vessels through the locks and for lighting the entire canal.

The Gatun locks lower the vessel by a series of three locks the 85 feet risen from the Pacific side. It takes an hour and a half to drop to sea-level on the Atlantic and about ten hours altogether to go through the canal. These last locks are the most impressive of all, their walls are continuations upwards of the rock on which they stand, as immovable, as indestructible. In beauty of line they might worthily represent some Temple erected to the Dignity and Nobility of Labour. To quote the reluctant tribute of a Scotch engineer, "Whoever may have won the war, the Yanks have done something here really worth bragging about." Cracked stone and sand for the construction of these locks was brought from Puerto Bello where Sir Francis Drake sleeps his long sleep at the bottom of the bay. "So long as you are let lie undisturbed in your grave" was predicted to him concerning his discovery of the passage around Cape Horn, "the road you have opened from East to West no man shall shut. If not, then iron ships shall sail over dry land." So strangely and literally to be fulfilled in every detail, this prophecy seemed something more than mere meaningless patter of a mediaeval soothsayer even to the most sceptical who had that day "sailed over dry land." With the echoes of the modern blasting machinery set up in Puerto Bello reverberating to the very depths of the harbour has come the gradual abandonment of the old trade route round the Horn.

They point out an unfinished channel bearing off to the left shortly after leaving Gatun Locks. This was the beginning of de Lesseps' attempted sea-level canal: the rest of it, winding through the Chagres valley, lies submerged beneath Gatun Lake. Covered with a kindly mantle of creeping vine, leaf and flower were rows of abandoned excavating machinery. Effect-

Apple Shortcake. For apple shortcake make a dough with two cupfuls of sifted flour, two tablespoonfuls of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of butter into the flour, then add baking powder, salt and milk. Divide into three equal parts and roll, handling as little as possible. Lay one of the sheets on a buttered round tin, lightly grease it with melted butter, place on another sheet, grease it and lay on the third. Bake in a hot oven until ready. Separate the sheets, and spread between the warm apple sauce, seasoned with sugar, butter, ginger and a pinch of salt. Serve hot.

Jelly Roll. Beat three eggs until very light, add three-fourths cupful of sugar gradually, then beat well together, then add one-half tablespoonful of milk, one cupful of flour sifted with one and one-half teaspoonfuls of baking powder and one-saltspoonful of salt. When well blended add one-half teaspoonful of orange extract and one tablespoonful of melted butter. Line the bottom of a dripping pan with paper, then butter the paper and the sides of the pan and pour the mixture into it and spread it out evenly. Bake for twenty minutes in a moderate oven and turn out on to a paper which has been sprinkled over with powdered sugar. Quickly remove the paper from the bottom of the cake and spread with jam, jelly or marmalade, or marshmallow filling, then roll. After the cake has been rolled, roll it in waxed paper so that it will keep its shape. For the marshmallow filling, mix three-fourths of a cupful of sugar with one-fourth cupful of milk in a saucepan and bring to boiling point slowly, without stirring and then boil for six minutes. Break one-fourth pound of marshmallows into pieces and melt in top of a double boiler, then add twelve tablespoonfuls of boiling water and cook until the mixture is smooth, then add the hot syrup stirring all the time. Beat until cool enough to spread, adding one-half teaspoonful of orange extract.

Old Fashioned Gingerbread. Put one cupful of molasses into a bowl, add one-half cupful of butter, one-half cupful of brown sugar and one cupful of boiling water, stir well and then allow to cool. Then add one-half cupful each of chopped nut meats and cocoanut, one-half cupful each of seeded and seedless raisins, one-fourth of shredded candied citron peel, three cupfuls of flour sifted with three teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one-fourth teaspoonful salt, one teaspoonful each of powdered ginger, nutmeg, allspice, mace and cinnamon, then add three beaten eggs. Pour into a buttered and floured cake tin and bake in a moderate oven for one hour. Turn out and when cold cut into neat squares.

Conducted by Bertha E. Green

To my Journal Junior Friends.

I've taken all good wishes that the Old Year brought to me,

And placed them 'round about us, like a summer primrose-ring.

And with them woven my wish for the New Year that's to be—

A wish for all the happiness twelve months could ever bring.

The Wish-Garden of Father Time

MOST people think Old Father Time is just a thin, tall, old, long-bearded man, with a scythe on his shoulder, and an hour-glass in his hand. They think of him as a very to be seen. This was the reason that the old man was not nearly so cheery as usual, and he shook his head slowly and said aloud to himself:

"Not a blossom, not even a plant—just flower-pots. Why, it's not a week since Christmas, and all the good wishes of that merry time that blossomed in my garden have gone. Of course they were given away, but it leaves me with all my pots without even one wish-plant to tend."

A door opened, and through it came another old man, not so old as Father Time but gray-bearded and stooped. This new-comer's eyes had a merry twinkle in them, and when he saw the glum, discouraged look on "The wish of Father Time," read Nineteen Twenty One when he had finished.

Then Father Time began:

"A last wish for the old year,
A first wish for the new,
May fairer bloom unfold here,
Than e'er Time's garden grew.
To wishers of the old year,
To wishers of the new,
Who wish for those they hold dear,
I wish your wish comes true."

"That's the idea," said Old Nineteen Twenty One, "Look! Your wish is growing already."

Sure enough, above the rim of the pot marked "the wish of Father Time," appeared a sprout of green. It rose slowly until the slender shoot branched in long, narrow leaves.

Old Father Time watched his wish-plant growing so fast, and he said to himself:

"I wonder if it will blossom. I'm sure it will. Oh, there is nothing like watching a wish-plant grow, for one never knows what kind of flower it will bear."

"This one will surprise you," chuckled Old Nineteen Twenty One.

"Why, do you know what kind of a flower it is going to be?" asked Father Time.

"Wait and see," was the reply. "A wish-plant won't flower at all unless you watch it, you know."

The wish-plant grew, its narrow leaves lengthened their bending tips, and, as the plant grew, the pot that held it grew, too, and all the smaller pots made way for it.

A sturdy flower-stem appeared, growing and growing until its tip showed the first traces of a folded flower.

"It's the biggest one I ever had in my wish-garden," said Old Father Time.

"Keep watching," reminded Old Nineteen Twenty-One.

The flower grew its green paling as it budded. Old Father Time had never seen its like before, as it unfolded petal after petal of snowy white.

Then as the wish-flower opened to a full, shallow bell, with mouth up-turned above its petaled rim appeared a golden, curly head, a smiling, boyish face, and a bare-armed, bare-legged, little figure.

"Did you ever see the like!" exclaimed Old Father Time, turning, as he spoke, to where Old Nineteen Twenty One had been standing. But Old Nineteen Twenty One had vanished, and, as Father Time looked toward the wish-plant again, the little stranger in the flower-bell sang joyously:

"Come to the New Year, bringing Your wishes great and small;
'Tis Time's new gardener singing
Of promised joy to all:
Of love and goodness taking,
Of longing, too, a part,
With tender wishes making
A garden of your heart."

While he had been singing, the flower-stem curved downward, and the New Year stepped down among the tabled row of flowerless pots, and said:

"I am your new helper, Father Time, now that Old Nineteen Twenty One has left you."

Then Father Time noticed that each of the pots had a growing wish-plant in it. "The New Year must have brought those Wishes here himself," thought Father Time.

Some of the wishes blossomed almost at once, while others grew so solemn fellow who journeys through the world, always in a bit of a hurry, and they think, too, he has no home and never rests at all.

Most people think this because they have never seen Old Father Time, and have never been told of his snug house in the land of "Just-Around-The-Corner."

It was just six days after Christmas, and an old man was sitting on a stool in his green-house, looking at his flower-pots. His eyes were kindly, and the wrinkles at their outer corners told that he smiled a great deal. Just now, however, the old man's face bore a serious, almost worried look as he sat there in his long, gray robe, with a hand on either knee.

It was Old Father Time in his Wish-Garden. Lighted lamps hung from the glass roof, showing in their mellow light long-tabled rows of little, round, brick-red pots. It was a splendid indoor garden, excepting that there was not a single flower

Father Time's face, he laughed, and said cheerily:

"I can see what the matter is—your garden has no plants in it."

"Yes," said Old Father Time a bit grumpily "it's partly your fault, too. For just twelve months you have helped me tend my wish-plants, and now you are leaving me on the last day, with no flower to tend myself."

The newcomer laughed again:

"I've been your helper for twelve months," said he, "and you would have had a hard time to find a better one than Old Nineteen Twenty One. If it's wishes you want, Father Time, why don't you make one yourself?"

"I never thought of doing that," said Old Father Time, stroking his long beard thoughtfully.

"This is the very pot for it to grow in," said Old Nineteen Twenty One, picking up a pot, and with a piece of chalk he printed some letters around the outside.

OTHER MANTLE LAMPS ARE LAID ASIDE AND REPLACED BY THE

"NULITE" LAMP

The "Nulite" Lamp

THE "NULITE" LAMP makes and burns its own gas. It is so inexpensive to operate that the most humble home can be lighted as brilliantly as a palace.

It will give you a bright light, stronger than twenty coal oil lamps. Every lamp is guaranteed, and if not as represented, you may return it at our cost.

Why Experienced Users of Mantle Lamps Prefer the "Nulite" Lamp—because

It gives a light of 400 candle power at the small cost of a Third-of-a-cent an hour.

It has no globe, and therefore, saves a bill of expense which is attached to most all other lamps.

It has no wick to trim or fuss with, and, above all, there is a big saving in mantles. It is equipped with a needle which cleans the generator automatically.

No chimney to clean, no wick to trim or fuss with, ten times safer than the ordinary kerosene (coal oil) lamp.

Unlike every other lamp, in common use, it will burn in any position—side-ways, upside down, or it can even be rolled on the floor with perfect safety.

NULITE $22.00 Lamps Will be sold for $9.90

Price of Lantern $8.90

As we have found by experience that the best advertisement is to have lamps in use at different places, we have decided to open the season by shipping to any destination one of our "Nulite" Lamps, equipped with fancy shade, and which we always sell for $22.00, on receipt of $9.90. This offer is good only until Jan. 15.

The Secret of the Stradivarius is revealed in this Piano

BEAUTIFUL tone that improves with age—that is the secret which Owain Martin wrested from the ancient violins of Antonio Stradivari and embodied in the Martin-Orme Piano. In the "Violiform" (reg'd) plan of Sounding Board construction as used exclusively in the Martin-Orme, no flattening of those scientifically correct curves is possible. Consequently the tone instead of deteriorating, becomes more beautiful as the wood mellowes with age.

in a hall, how wonderfully our houses would gain in charm!

Welcome is expressed in the very fact of any furniture being used in the hall—for does not furniture invite use? How, then, can the element of restraint be introduced to modify that welcome? Is not a formality in the type of furniture and a proportionate formality in its placement the one logical answer? Here, of course, we are considering the hall that is neither living-room nor reception-room, but which is merely an entrance to the house proper: as the use to which any room is to be put can alone dictate its proper furnishing. In the living-hall, therefore, a rigid formality of furnishing is neither necessary nor desirable, just as in the conventional hall it is virtually essential.

Formality, nevertheless, does not involve a lessening of decorative interest: instead, it may tend to an augmentation of that very quality through the accompanying elimination of banalities and through the concentration of the few essential pieces of furniture into well-balanced groups. Even to furniture of rather mediocre design, a certain distinction can be lent by a grouping that has been properly studied. A table—large enough to hold a card-salver, a flower bowl, possibly a pair of brass candle-sticks or some other interesting bits of old metal—with a chair at each end, is usually all that is actually required in a small hall: but, to add a touch of pure decoration, above the table may appropriately be hung a mirror, a piece of old tapestry, brocade or embroidery, or even one picture, flanked either by modern lighting fixtures of good design, or, better still, by antique brass sconces. Surely such a grouping is not difficult to achieve—yet it is never commonplace.

Chests, chairs and cabinets, highboys, lowboys and settles are all suited to the hall, because they may be ranged along the walls, thereby maintaining the formality becoming to the nature of the room. Properly speaking, except in a very large hall, there should be a marked paucity of pictures. On the other hand, if suitably framed and carefully disposed, mirrors will be found attractive, not alone as wall decorations, but as a means of increasing the apparent size of the hall. Each mirror should, however, be used as a unit in a grouping of furniture, rather than as an isolated object, that there may be an obvious reason for its employment.

Restraint? By all means—but a restraint so tempered by a subtle touch of gentle welcome, that, even in the hall, there may be present an indication of the genial hospitality ruling beyond. Imbued, thus, with both welcome and restraint, ever coupled with a gracious dignity, the hall assumes entity as a fitting portal to the intimacy and pleasure to be found within the inner circle of the home. And does not a hall invariably serve as an index to the personality of those who make up the home circle? If it does—that alone would surely appear to be reason sufficient for an especial regard for the proper appointment of any entrance hall, whether great or small.

The Romance of a Canadian Prima Donna

The Unique Career of Bertha Crawford, Who Spent Seven Years in War Areas in Poland and Russia

By Hector Charlesworth

A FEW years before the beginning of the great war a girl in her teens came to Toronto from a small Ontario village determined to secure a musical education and develop the sweet and appealing voice which from childhood had been the delight of relatives and neighbors. Scores of such girls come to Toronto and the other musical education centres of North America in the course of an ordinary year, but the careers of most of them are uneventful. Even those who have really fine voices usually marry and settle down after a few years of effort teach them that the great prizes of the singing profession are for the very few. But destiny had strange adventures in store for this particular girl; things undreamed of in her most ambitious moments. How could she or anybody know that her singularly sweet and silvery voice was to draw her into the very vortex of an unanticipated world war, into the very part of Europe which is still unhallowed by peace; that within a decade her name should become much more famous in Russia and Poland than in Canada itself? Yet that was what fate had in store for Bertha Crawford when she came to Toronto to study music,—a long sojourn in strange cities and among strange peoples, an exile in troubled lands.

Miss Crawford went for instruction to Mr. E. W. Shuch, a veteran teacher of singing, who at once discerned that she had that very rare thing a true coloratura voice;—that is to say a voice so light, flexible and resonant that it could compass the very difficult ornamentations of old-fashioned music,—the runs, and trills and roulades which only a few are able to master,—the kind of music which has the lightness of bird-song, and is to that extent hardly human, but on which the fame of the great singers like Jenny Lind and Adelina Patti and the later Amelita Galli-Curci is based. For a beginner there was little market for that kind of singing in a country which had no permanent opera; and where the natural field for a girl who had to earn money with her voice was the church choir. She first secured a small engagement at Erskine Presbyterian Church, Toronto, a once famous place of worship, which has been almost submerged by the tide of foreign immigration. From thence she graduated to the Sherbourne St. Methodist Church, which is supported by several of the leading public men of Canada, and finally attained one of the prizes of the field of choir singing, that of soprano soloist at the Metropolitan Methodist Church, which has been noted for its music for half a century. At the same time she was building up a considerable reputation as a local concert singer. Her engagement at the Metropolitan Church had a definite influence on her future career. One or two wealthy members of the congregation decided that in Miss Crawford Canada had a real song-bird worthy of European training; and provided the funds to send her abroad.

When she left Toronto in 1911 it was with the hope that in two or three years time she would be back in America as a singer in concert and perhaps in grand opera,—but, as has been said, fate had decreed otherwise. So far, the unique and silvery beauty of her voice had been a passport to her everywhere, and thus it was when she got to London. She did not have to wait for an interminable period for recognition as have many aspirants. She was placed under a teacher of considerable ability and influence, Madame Nevosky; and within a year had made successful public appearances in the two leading concert auditoriums of London, Queen's Hall and Albert Hall. Her appearance in these vast edifices, demonstrated one fact that has had much to do with her subsequent success. They proved that though her voice seemed light and bird-like it had wonderful resonance and carrying power, which enabled her to fill a large auditorium with ease. It became apparent that she was well in which her chief aria was the lovely and familiar melody "Caro Nome". This was in 1912 and her success was immediate. It led to appearances in other Italian cities. When she returned to Milan an engagement awaited her at the Teatro Dal Verme, an opera house second only to La Scala in international fame. There she built up a repertoire comprising many of the famous coloratura roles; Violetta in "Traviata", with her great aria, "Ah Fors e lui"; "Lucia di Lammermoor" with the famous "Mad scene" the chief role in Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette" with its charming waltz song; Marguerite in "Faust" with the "Jewel Song"; Rosina in "The Barber of Seville" with "Una Voce Poco Fa" there for two or three months and then returning to Milan where she had built up a circle of friends, among the many English speaking residents of that cosmopolitan city. But the outbreak of the great war in the summer of 1914, found her still at Warsaw. She became so popular with the Polish people that engagements both for opera and concert, not only in Warsaw but all the lesser Polish centres made it profitable for her to remain. In passing it may be said that she still remains an idol of the Polish people, and that Warsaw still remains in a sense her home; for many of her belongings are still there including a veritable kennel of pet dogs, a special fad of hers.

In illustration of her position a curious incident which occurred in Massey Hall, Toronto, on October 31st of this year (1921) may be cited. On that evening, Paul Kochanski, the Polish violinist, and one of the greatest of living virtuosos, was playing there. Apparently he was entirely oblivious of the existence of his audience, but his eyes were open, for after his first group of numbers, he said excitedly to his manager "There is a lady in that audience whom I know. I am sure I played at a concert with her in Warsaw seven or eight years ago. It is strange to see her so far from home." He was asked for her name; "I cannot remember. It was a strange, foreign name. But she had something beautiful in here (indicating his throat). Oh, very, very beautiful indeed!" He described her appearance and where she was sitting. Miss Crawford was sent for and there was a happy reunion. Kochanski at time when they had appeared on the same platform was a beginner like herself whose future fame was unanticipated.

Miss Bertha Crawford

qualified to essay coloratura roles in grand opera of the type with which the name of Adelina Patti had been especially identified.

AS yet however Miss Crawford had had no experience which qualified for stage appearances which required acting as well as singing and she therefore decided to go to the greatest existing centre for operatic training, Milan, Italy. She placed herself under a noted coach, Madame Corsi and had been in Italy for but a few months when she was engaged for an appearance in the Venice, Opera. It was therefore in the old city of palaces and canals that she made her actual debut as a prima donna, singing the role of the childlike Gilda in Verdi's "Rigoletto" and other parts, the music of which has been made familiar to the wider public through phonograph records.

Another turning point of her life came quite unexpectedly in 1913. In that year the director of the Grand Opera at Warsaw, Poland came to Milan looking for fresh talent for that institution. Poland was at that time a Russian province and it was one of the virtues of the late Czarist regime, that it lavishly supported music, and every considerable city of the Russian Empire had its opera houses and conservatories, supported out of public funds. The popularity of this system was so well-established that the Bolsheviks, who have abolished many other things have done their best to maintain it. When Miss Crawford left for Warsaw it was with the intention of singing

THOUGH it is hard to realize it, music boomed in Poland all through the early stages of the war, just as it did in all European countries, where the authorities encouraged it as a relief to the anxieties of the situation. But early in 1915 the great German advance against Warsaw began. There came conflicting reports, tidings of Russian victories, but all the while the foe was steadily advancing. At last there came a day when panic spread. The Prussians would be in Warsaw in twenty-four hours, without a doubt, and it would hard with Miss Crawford a British subject; and so with other singers of foreign birth she packed a hand-bag hurriedly and fled to Petrograd. It was the last she was to see of Warsaw for more than three years; and in time her exile was to cut her off completely from the outside world. But luck in a professional sense did not desert her. She at once obtained an engagement at the "Narodnydom" or People's Theatre of Petrograd. The Czar was still ruler but admission to the Imperial Opera was denied to all singers unless they could speak Russian. The People's Theatre was however more catholic in its scope and here Miss Crawford had an invaluable experience, singing in an auditorium that seated eight thousand people and in company with celebrated artists like the great basso, Chaliapin. The Russian capital in the early years of the war was a gay place, despite Russian reverses,

Over the Brow of the Hill

By Marie Louise Goetchius

THERE was the big white bed, and on it lay the tired little child, who had been tired for a very long while. Sitting beside the child there was the Mother.

The twilight hour spilled shadow pools over the big pink room. Light from the fading rose sun, drifted petal by petal in through the shaded window and fell upon the un-played-with toys in the corner. The old clock ticked and stopped to listen and ticked and stopped to listen.

The child's hair lay tangled upon the pillow. It seemed to be trying to crawl away in thin curved golden strands from the white blue-veined little forehead.

The Mother held the child's small elusive hand and the Mother's eyes were black with unshed pain. But the child's eyes were wide and wondering and the child asked questions in a whisper voice that barely stirred the words.

"Mother, shall I stay here long?"

"No, my Little."

"When can I play again, Mother?"

"Soon, my Little."

"But I don't want to play now. When shall I want to play?"

"Soon, my Little."

"Mother, why do you look so sad?"

"Mother's not—sad, child."

"You come and lie down and I'll sit there. Oh, I can't raise my head, Mother. It's a mean feeling. Please take it away—I'm frightened."

"It won't be long, child dear. The feeling will soon steal away."

"Why, Mother, you're crying—I'm frightened."

"There's nothing to be frightened of, love child."

"Yes, there is. It's all so strange. It isn't as if it were just bedtime. It always seems bedtime now. Give me my doll. She might lie here with me."

The Mother brought the doll—the child cuddled it close to her. "Mother, it's cold."

The Mother drew a pink comforter over the white bed. The child began picking at its tufts.

And the Mother's heart wept—"Dear God—any hour now. How can I keep her from knowing and being afraid?"

"Mother, something queer's happening. You always tell me everything. Why can't I sleep tonight?"

And the Mother's heart wept—"How can I keep my lamb from being afraid—at the last?"

"You always used to explain things to me in stories, Mother. Put me to sleep with a wonderful story. Make me feel warm with a story, and take away the dark 'fraid feeling."

"If I can lead her gently to the Sleep, She will never have known fear," cried the anguished heart of the Mother. "If I should see fear in my darling's eyes—it would haunt my own death. She must smile, and let go of my hand smiling. Of me—nothing now."

So she sat on the lonely edge of the twilight, and it was as if the big soft bed were a white ocean, rocking her Only One, her frail child away from her—on into a Blue Beyond—while her voice from the Beaches, as the child sailed palely out of reach, became fainter to hear and fainter to hear—telling the Wonderful Story.

"There was once"—she began—"a dear baby girl who lived in a very beautiful garden, and all the flowers that grew about her—"

"What kind of flowers, Mother?"

"Roses and mignonette and jonquils and violets, and every other kind of flower which smells sweet, my Little.

And all the birds who sang in the trees—"

"What kind of birds, Mother?"

"Thrushes and nightingales, dear. And the blue sky, and the brook that laughed and tossed its silver hair—all these things loved my Little—loved the baby girl. Nothing but the beautiful was known to her."

"Did she have dolls and candy and a mother—Mother?"

"Yes, dear, she had dolls and candy and a—mother. There was the Spirit of the Garden too. This Spirit showed the baby girl how to play, and kept her from harm."

"What did the Spirit look like, Mother?"

"It looked like early morning and spring and it had little children's eyes and wings as white as apple blossoms, and it spoke like the voice of water before it reaches the sea—and it had the heart of all things untouched."

"I don't understand, Mother, but I like the Spirit."

"The garden was shut away from the world by a big thick wall of pearl. The child ran and sang and played with balls that flashed like rainbows in the sun. Sometimes, too, she went wading in the brook."

"Oh, I'd like to go, Mother."

"She went wading, and chased tiny silver fish that she never quite caught. Then she would sleep under the trees, and the happy sun would climb down through the leaves and kiss her."

"Where was the mother?"

"The mother was sitting by, in the shadows, dear—watching her baby girl—"

"Go on, Mother."

"But the baby girl could not stay in the garden forever—"

"Why couldn't she, Mother?—Oh, you hurt my hand—you are holding it so tightly, so tightly."

"No, my Little, I am not hurting you. Because the child grew tired of the garden—she had played with everything there. She pressed her eager little face now against the white bars of the garden gate, and she looked and looked at the country beyond—until the Spirit knew that the child must pass through the garden gate. Then the mother wept, for she had been in the country beyond, and had seen many dangers and terrible things there. She wept so hard at the thought of the child meeting these dangers, that the Spirit took great pity on her—"

"What kind of dangers, Mother?"

"Storms and blackness and rain that breaks delicate things, and hands that wring desolately, and voices that cry, and eyes that weep, dear."

"I'd hate the black, Mother."

"So the Spirit took pity on the wisdom in the mother, which dreaded the passing of her child beyond the gates—and it said to her as she stood loving her child—"There is another way. There is a road that leads off over the brow of the hill, but you can only walk half that road now with the child. Later you may meet her by going the other way. But this road is so white that only tiny light feet may touch it—the feet which leave no print. Yours would darken this road, for you have wandered much and dipped your feet in the shadows which stain." The mother could not decide at once, so the Spirit decided for her. The child should go by the white road. "You may guide her"—it said to the mother—"to the brow of the hill, since you love her so much—but over the brow of the hill, the child shall go alone and she will find such a beautiful land there, that she will always be happy, and she will never know such sorrow as you—"

"Mother, why can't anyone go over the brow of the hill?"

"Because,—oh my baby child, my little child—it is only a road for tiny light feet. See, we are going to walk together—just so far. Then—for you have been very good, and you may go over this road—you shall follow it to its promise."

"I'm cold, Mother. It blurs my throat when I talk. Can you hear me? Are you going away? You look far away. Touch me."

"Be still, my Little—we are walking down the white road."

"I felt something hot and wet fall on my hand—what was it, Mother?"

"It was a kiss, dear baby. See how clear and smooth the road is. The light shines through white rose bushes, and the air is very soft."

"But over the brow of the hill, Mother—can't you come—can't you, just this once?"

"No, my Little. You will find—let me see what you will find—a palace of white—"

"Sea-shells, Mother."

"Of white sea-shells, on the border of an ocean that rocks my baby to sleep—and there will be lots of other little boys and girls there to keep her company. She will find them waiting for her. That's right,—smile, my Little. You will love them dearly—You can speak of the garden to them—You see Mother told you that it was beautiful. But you will think of her, sometimes—she will come sailing to you over the Ocean, very soon—and my Little—Have we reached the brow of the hill?—My child—my child—the story is not finished—Wait until I finish it—"

The soul of the Mother uncovered its face and looked once at the vanishing soul of the child, over the brow of the hill—then it fell to its knees and mourned, and the air about it shivered with pain. For the Mother stood alone—and the story was not finished.

FOR many days and nights, the Mother knelt where the child had left her—the unfinished story trembling in her grieving heart. It was her dear secret—this unfinished story—and she hugged it close to her, for she felt strangely afraid to finish it by herself.

As time passed, many little friend children came to her, who called her sweet names, but never the sweetest of all. Still they stood at her knee as she told them stories—not the wonderful story—and their faces were like torches which lit her lonely dreams back over the white road to the garden. There lay echoes and bird songs which spoke of the little one who had gone—there lay the hush of the silent playtime of tiny light feet.

Yet she loved these other children. She saw many of them pressing their faces against the garden gate, and she knew then that the Spirit was going to send them out among the dangers. So she tried to help them arm themselves against these dangers, and she became loved and revered for her gentle wisdom. Often she wondered if Peace of a mystic kind did not after all wait for her at the end of the won-

Pork Cake. Pour two cupfuls of boiling water over one pound of chopped salt pork and allow it to stand until nearly cold, then add one-half teaspoonful of baking soda, one cupful of molasses, two cupfuls of brown sugar, one pound each of currants, seedless raisins, seeded raisins, chopped candied mixed peels and nut meats, one teaspoonful each of powdered mace, nutmeg, ginger, allspice and cinnamon, one teaspoonful of baking powder and enough sifted flour to make it very stiff. Pour into a buttered and papered cake tin and bake in a moderate oven for two hours. No eggs in this cake. When cold cover with the following frosting, to the grated rind and strained juice of one orange add one teaspoonful of vanilla extract and one-half teaspoon-juice of one orange and one-half cupful of cream and mix well together. Fill into pie shells and bake in a moderate oven for twenty minutes. Remove from the oven and top with meringue made from the whites of the eggs beaten to a stiff froth, adding two tablespoonfuls of sugar and beat until smooth. Return to the oven to slightly brown and serve.

Cocoanut and Lemon Tarts. Line gem pans with rich pastry. Beat up two eggs, then gradually beat into them one cupful of sugar, the grated rind and strained juice of one lemon, two and one-half cupfuls of chopped cocoanut, and one-fourth cupful of melted butter. Divide into the prepared tins and bake in a moderate oven for twenty-five minutes. Serve hot.

Chocolate Layer Cake. Beat three tablespoonfuls of butter with three-ful of lemon juice. Let it stand for twenty minutes, then add slowly the yolk of one egg and enough sifted confectioners' sugar to make thick enough to spread.

Almond Cake. Beat one cupful of butter with one cupful of sugar until creamy, then add six beaten eggs and beat again, then add one cupful of flour, one-half cupful of chopped candied citron peel, one cupful of ground almonds, one-half cupful each of currants and seedless raisins, then add one more cupful of flour sifted with one teaspoonful of salt, then add one tablespoonful of fruit juice and mix well. Pour into a cake tin lined with buttered paper and bake in a moderate oven for two and one-half hours. When cold cover with the following almond icing, mix one cupful of sugar with one cupful of ground almonds, add one white of egg and one-half teaspoonful of almond extract. If not stiff enough add a little confectioners' sugar.

Jam Tarts. Roll pie crust out thin and cut into four-inch squares. Brush each square with the white of one egg, then fold over the corners to meet in the middle. Slightly press together, brush with white of egg, sprinkle over with sugar and bake in a hot oven for fifteen minutes. When done make a little hole in the middle and fill with jam, jelly or marmalade.

Custard Pies. Cream one-third of a cupful of butter with one-third of a cupful of sugar, then beat in one at a time the yolks of three eggs, beat well, add the grated rind and strained fourths cupful of brown sugar, add two beaten eggs and beat again, then add one-half cupful of water, one cupful of flour sifted with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and a pinch of salt, add two tablespoonfuls of grated chocolate and one-half teaspoonful of vanilla extract. Mix well and divide into two buttered and floured layer cake tins, and bake in a moderate oven for twenty minutes. Turn out and cool. For the filling, put two cupfuls of grated maple sugar into a saucepan, add two squares of chocolate, one cupful of milk and a pinch of cream of tartar and cook until it forms a soft ball when tested in cold water, add one tablespoonful of butter and mix well. Remove from the fire, stir in one tablespoonful of cream and one teaspoonful of vanilla extract, beat until thick enough to spread between the layers. For icing the top, dissolve one-fourth cake of chocolate in one cupful of boiling water add one cupful of sugar mixed with two teaspoonfuls of flour, add one teaspoonful of butter and cook till thick, stirring all the time, cool and spread on top of cake.

Pound Cake. Cream two cupfuls of butter with two cupfuls of sugar, then add twelve well beaten eggs and beat again for twenty minutes, add four cupfuls of flour sifted with one-half teaspoonful of baking powder, one teaspoonful of powdered mace, then add one and one-half teaspoonfuls of lemon extract and beat for eight minutes. Turn into a buttered and papered tin and bake in a slow oven for one and one-half hours.

Dunlop Tires

MEAN

Double-Life, High-Mileage

Fredericton, N.B., Oct. 25, 1921.
"Up to this date one of the 32x3½ Traction Fabric Tires—purchased six years ago—has travelled 21,373 miles and the other 20,400; both are still going. I might mention that I am considering the purchase of a new McLaughlin Car in the Spring and am desirous of having it fully equipped with Dunlop Tires."
(Signed) "GILFORD DUNPHY."

Dunlop leadership in Tiredom is most manifest. Mileage records almost unbelievable are piling up all over Canada. The Special Mileage-Making Process, which is the basis of our Fabric Tires, has worked wonders. Perfect shape and balance, stronger side walls to resist curb and rut abuse, special wear-resisting anti-skid tread, etc., add the last touch to popularizing to the full a tire that has long stood in high favor.

Dunlop "Cords" made good from their inception. These tires taught motorists to expect more resiliency, greater air space, larger amount of material, better carrying capacity; in short, bigger mileage, and that is the standard by which all Cord Tires are judged to-day.

NEVER COOK UP COLD MEAT WITHOUT IT

A STORY of the West with a wild and woolly touch is "The Quest of Alistair" by Robert Allison Hood, who has already given "The Chivalry of Keith Leicester" to a novel-reading world. The hero, Alistair Kilgour, is a Scotchman—but we must admit that we wish his name were spelled in the old way "Alastair." This young man leaves a home near Selkirk, in Scotland to investigate a ranch in British Columbia on which his father had owned a mortgage. There has been failure, if not worse, on the De Roche ranch, and Alistair comes to Canada in a critical mood. There are two desperate villains in the story who almost compass the hero's downfall, but this noble youth finally emerges triumphant, with the prospect of marriage with a charming girl, who began by indulging a violent hatred for the intruding Scot. This is an entertaining and wholesome story, told in a fashion to encourage one to read more of Mr. Hood's romances. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto, Price $2.00).

One of the books beloved of childhood and still read by those grown-ups who are fortunate enough not to have forgotten the pass word to fairyland is "Alice in Wonderland" by Lewis Carroll. This delectable story, with "Through the Looking Glass," has been published once more by the Macmillan Company, Toronto (price, $2.00) and you have ninety-two illustrations by John Tenniel, who "did" Alice and her friends in a fashion that no other illustrator has equalled. Here they are, the Mad Hatter, the Dormouse, the Gryphon, the Mock Turtle and the rest of them, as lively and entertaining as they were when first we met them. We have but one regret after reading this story for the forty-eleventh time:—that the story and the pictures did not come before Christmas—or, rather, in time for notice in the December issue. However, "Alice in Wonderland" is for all seasons, and there is always a birthday for which this will prove the most welcome gift. You may say that there are little girls who will not appreciate Alice. If any such child exists, then must we resort to the language of the Queen in the story and say "Off with her head!"

The advertisements of books are usually rather misleading and overdone. However, the statement on the "jacket" of "Wings of the Spirit," by Evelyn L. Weller—"A most unusual story of delightful people" is partly true. The story is unusual, but the characters are not invariably delightful. The reader discovers, before he has gone far in the story, that the writer is a theosophist—or a sympathizer with the followers of theosophical teaching—and, indeed, part of the story resolves itself into a tract on that belief.

The heroine, Vashti Templeton, is a nurse, a being of marvellous beauty, and she is so unfortunate as to fall in love with a clergyman who has already provided himself with a wife. The attachment remains spiritual (for that circumstance, considering the muddiness of many modern novels the reader is grateful) and Stephen, the hero, becomes a martyr to his work in the poorest of neighborhoods. Vancouver and Victoria are the background of the story, although the last scene whisks us to Colorado.

The theology of the chief characters is said to be one of the rarest spirituality; but we wonder what a genuine "sermon-taster" would think of this description of a discourse by the hero:—

"Golden-voiced, the younger man brought to his audience gems of deep thought and knowledge—sometimes the cool, yet deep, color of an emerald then the rich glowing color of the ruby flashed before them in a passionate utterance; again the warm blue shining of a sapphire entered into the enthusiasm of his voice or the shimmering warmth, yet austerity of a pearl, etc., etc." Some readers may consider this "fine writing," others will find it intolerable gush.

The descriptions of the physical charms of various characters remind us of Bertha Clay of precious memory—dear to the school-girl heart. The heroine has "gray eyes—brimming with lights, that from the illumination within her soul shone through the velvety curtains that restrained and controlled the radiance that poured forth from her being." The hero had sea-blue eyes, hair of red gold—and his clerical collar encircled "a fine bronzed throat." This book will probably be called "perfectly lovely" by the young person who is addicted to the movies. (Published by the Musson Book Company, Ltd., Toronto, Price, $2.00)

Mrs. MacKay of Vancouver (formerly of Woodstock, Ontario) is a Canadian writer whose work has charm and versatility. Her poems are still her best work in the estimation of many of her readers, who, nevertheless, admit that her novels have a graphic interest all their own. "Up The Hill and Over" was a story of a Canadian community which was unusually vivid; "Mist of the Morning" was an exhilarating tale, which was uncommon in characterization and plot; but Mrs. MacKay's latest work of fiction, "The Window-Gazer," surpasses her other productions in dramatic force and interest. Indeed, we should not be surprised if Mrs. MacKay were written among the dramatists. Professor Benis Hamilton Spence, a bookworm who, nevertheless, went to the war, finds himself in a remote part of British Columbia, lured thither by the craft of a most uncanny old villain, Dr. Herbert Farr. There is a daughter, of course, a Miranda-like person called "Desire" who says: "I never went into any of the stores. The things I wanted were inside and for sale—but I could not buy them. I was just a window-gazer. That's what I am still. Life is for sale somewhere. But I cannot buy it." Desire is a thoroughly enchanting young person—romantic without being tiresomely sentimental—and when she becomes the "wife in name only" of Benis Hamilton Spence, the reader is certain that the honeymoon will end in a love story. This is a highly engrossing tale, with just enough of horror in the old scoundrel of the Island to make a true "thriller." And you will surely be glad to meet Aunt Caroline. She is worthy of a place in any galaxy of intrepid spinsters. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto, Price, $2.00).

Madame Pantazzi

It seems ever so long ago, that we read Miss Corelli's "Romance of Two Worlds." In fact, it was two wars ago, as Canada counts, for it was written before the Boer War of 1899. In that early and highly popular tale, Miss Corelli seemed to consider electric force as the secret power of the universe. Her theory was ingeniously and dramatically developed. The world of scientific discovery and invention has travelled far and fast, since the early "nineties," and we now find that Miss Corelli, in her latest novel, "The Secret Power," has returned to the subject of a ruling force, spiritual and physical, which is marvellous beyond all former experience, in its ability to construct or to destroy. Morgana Royal is an extraordinary young woman, with wealth "beyond the dreams of avarice," who is also a discoverer in scientific realms. Morgana uses her discovery to further the flight of a tremendous aeroplane which she names the "White Eagle," and incidentally acquires a wonderful palace in the Island of Sicily. There is a half-savage young person of brunette loveliness in the State of California, who makes deliberate and unashamed love to that disagreeable professor, Roger Seaton, who also is an explorer of "the secret power." This girl, Manella, is a decidedly animal type who becomes less unpleasing as tragedy befalls the man on whom she has set her stormy affections. The story is out-of-the-way, even in a world of strange tales, but if Miss Corelli possessed a sense of artistic or literary restraint, her imaginative efforts would be much more impressive. (The Ryerson Press, Toronto, Price, $2.00).

Madame Pantazzi belongs to Toronto, Canada, by right of birth, and was well-known as Miss Ethel Greening. Her marriage, some years ago, to Commander Basile Pantazzi of the Roumanian Navy, removed her to a country which was destined to play a dramatic part in the Great War. Madame Pantazzi, during a recent visit to her native land, wrote an account of her adopted country, "Roumania in Light and Shadow," (published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto, Price, $5.00), which is an excellent and picturesque portrayal of that Balkan State. Two chapters of this work were published in advance by The Canadian Home Journal:—so, our readers already have some idea of the writer's graphic and graceful style. The book has a narrative charm and yet gives the reader a vivid impression of national scenes and political events, as well as those more intimate details of personal experience which make for unusual appeal. We really visit Bucharest and learn something of that picturesque capital and are also brought into sympathy with the peasantry of the country. Canadians can understand the feeling reference in conclusion to the million citizens of Roumania who perished in the great struggle.

"But they have not died in vain! It was right about the 'star,' after all! 'Roumania Mare'—Greater Roumania—the national dream of centuries has by their heroic sacrifices become a living reality!"

This Canadian writer has written a dignified and memorable record of this land with a heroic past and a hopeful future.

Constantinople in 1067 A.D.—just about a year after William the Conqueror began to break up the happy Saxon homes of England—must have been a lively capital, with the factions of Blues and Greens fighting for the ascendancy, and the Saracen already beginning to threaten the and so were the minor Russian cities, where Miss Crawford's services were presently in demand. In 1916 she sang a long engagement in Moscow and was praised in ecstatic terms by the critics as she had been in Petrograd.

Gradually Russia was so closely invested by Germany, and telegraphic communications so congested, that it became practically impossible for private individuals to communicate with the outside world. For nearly three years in all, Miss Crawford's friends and relatives in Canada could not get in touch with her and for a time believed her dead, though all the while she was filling engagements. Later she was to learn that messages she had sent had never been despatched, and communications to her had never been delivered. Such was the turmoil of Russia in war time. The first Russian revolution, that of the Intelligentsia in March 1917, found her at Helsingfors in Finland, and here she did get a message through to Canada to say that she was safe. She did not return to Petrograd until after the collapse of the Kerensky regime there in the autumn of 1917, when risings in Finland made it advisable to get away from there. When she got to the Russian capital it was to find the Whites and the Reds in conflict and the Bolsheviks in power. It was a distressing period of which she does not care to talk; but in Russia she was obliged to remain throughout the ensuing twelvemonth while the war with Germany was being fought to a finish on the Western front.

Miss Crawford has this to say for the Bolsheviks that they let singers and theatrical artists alone, so long as they abstained from interfering in politics; and as she was never able to fathom the mysteries of Russian politics they had nothing to fear from her. They even encouraged public entertainments with a view to keeping the people from becoming restive; but their rule made it very difficult for people even of large earnings to get anything to eat. In 1918 Miss Crawford sang in many distant parts of Russia. She was in the large cities of the Crimea and the Caucasus and even got as far East as Vladivostok in Siberia. There she and her companions in her concert party had hoped to take ship and get away to Japan. But before they could do so, the Bolsheviks obtained control of the local government and put a ban on such departures.

When the armistice was signed on Nov. 11, 1918 she was back in Petrograd again, and for a time Lenin and Trotsky relaxed their ukase against departures, and so she got back to Warsaw from which she had fled before the German advance three and half years previously. The Poles are a very musical people and in their elation over the withdrawal of the hated Prussians they were enthusiastic for opera, and so Miss Crawford found it profitable to remain there until July of the present year. When she came back there after the peace she had hoped to be free of wars, and the joy of the people at regaining their lost nationality made the old capital a pleasant place for one accustomed to it. But in the summer of 1920 came the Bolshevik-Polish conflict, and ere long another enemy was at the gates of Warsaw. Once again Miss Crawford had her trunks packed to flee, this time to Danzig. But as most readers will recall, the tide was turned in the nick of time by the French auxiliaries under General Weigand; and so Warsaw was saved the catastrophe of looting by Chinese mercenary troops which was to have been its fate. Again there was rejoicing but the pressure of want was bearing heavily on Poland and early last summer Miss Crawford decided that she had had enough of Eastern Europe. A longing to see Canada once more became irresistible, and she made her way to London by the Baltic route. In August, her parents received a welcome cable that after ten years absence she was at last coming back to the home land. Her public appearances since her return have more than justified the enthusiastic regard in which she was held in Russia and Poland, and no doubt many Canadians will in future hear her sing very celebrated arias. But there is one simple song which has special significance in her case. The other day I heard her render "Home, Sweet Home" before an audience of Toronto women, and never have I heard it sung with more heartfelt emotion.

ive for the soft earth and sand of Suez, it was powerless against the heavy clayey soil and rock of Panama. Ill-fated de Lesseps! Do you know his statue at Port Said where he stands proudly triumphant at the head of his successfully completed canal while the great ships pass by going East and West? What a contrast, that commanding confident attitude of victory and this pitiful little meandering channel which the great ships pass heedlessly by going East and West through another's engineering.

After a level stretch of seven miles the canal reaches deep water on the Atlantic side, opening into Limon Bay, into the very waters sailed by Columbus in his fruitless search for the "hidden strait." After four centuries his vision has become a reality: vessels mightier than any he could picture are daily taking a fifty mile water-way created by the hand of man, which, by severing a continent, had linked two hemispheres.

Christendom of Eastern Europe. A story of this city of marvellous color and unlimited intrigue is told in "Eudocia," by Eden Phillpotts. This writer seems to have forsaken his pastoral stories of Devonshire for scenes which lend themselves to melodrama. "Eudocia" is called by the author a "comedy royal" and it richly deserves the sub-title. The Empress Eudocia is a regal heroine who might have stepped out of a fairy tale, her lover, Romanus, is all that a Prince Charming should be; but the core of the comedy, the dominating figure, is Nicephorus, who plays the ancient game of politics in a fashion to break or make an empire and incidentally to unite hearts. It is a most interesting tale, told by one who is master of his craft. (Macmillan and Company, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

slowly that it would be months before even a bud would show. Amongst them all, the New Year gardener, 1922, worked busily, a pot of comfort here, a sprinkle of hope there, a helping, loving hand for each growing wish.

The lights that hung from the glass roof had grown dim, but they were not needed, for in their place now shone the bright sunbeams of the morning. Then Father Time rose from his seat, smiled at his busy gardener, the New Year, and stepped out into the crisp morning. There was a glad smile on his face, and you might have heard him singing: "Within my garden growing I leave my wish-flowers there Unto the New Year, knowing They'll have the tend'rest care. Wishes to those I'm taking Who think day-dreams outgrown; I'll help them in the making Wish-gardens of their own."

Bertha E. Green.

IN THE PINES

The man who paddles the canoe for me in the summer had slipped on a mackinaw, and as he reached for cap and mitts he asked:

"Aren't you coming calling with me this morning?"

"Of course," I replied, "where to?" "To call on Piney," answered the man in the mackinaw, "I have an idea that we will find him very much at home."

There was little wind, but the cold brought red cheeks and the somewhat heavy walking through the snow was a pleasure. I followed my guide across fields and over three rail fences. At the far side of the third fence I jumped short and had to be pulled out of my landing place, a snow-filled ditch.

Right ahead of us was the Littlest Woods, a grove only mostly of small evergreens. We had left it uncleared, a sort of outdoor summer-house and I was now to find it a winter pleasure too.

We approached the trees silently, although I did want to ask who Piney was. Just at the edge of the grove the man in the mackinaw stopped, pointed to a small pine near by and said in a low voice:

"Allow me to introduce Master Piney Grosbeak."

A bird somewhat smaller than a robin was perching on a branch but a few feet from us. Its feathers were of a rosy hue with darker notched tail and white-lined dark wing feathers. Its bill was short and strong like a sparrow's, and the eyes were set well toward the front of the head.

Master Piney looked us over carefully and then gave us an exhibition of taking seeds from pine-cones that was well worth watching. After this the grosbeak whistled again and again and presently he was joined by another bird much like himself in appearance excepting that the new-comer's feathered suit was dull yellow and greyish brown.

Mistress Piney Grosbeak was somewhat shy and though she treated us to a sweetly warbled song she did not stay long in the pine tree. Master Piney followed her and my guide and I followed them both. They flew across the fields in the direction of the house and as we walked homeward I learned that the grove was the home of the grosbeaks, winter and summer, that they nested in the pine trees and hatched out a little family of three or four from bluish green eggs prettily spotted with mauve and brown.

You Never Can Tell

"Oh, no," she answered quickly, while an interested group drew near. "People never write their own sorrows; the broken heart does not sing, that's the sadness of it. If one can talk of their sorrows, they soon cease to be. It's because I have not had any sorrows of my own that I have seen and been able to tell of the tragedies of life."

"Isn't she the jolly best bluffer you ever heard?" one of the men remarked to another. "Just think of that beautiful creature, born for admiration, living ten miles from anywhere, on an Albertan ranch of all places, and saying she is happy. She could be a top notcher in any society in Canada. Why, Great Scott! any of us would have married that girl, and been glad to do it," and under the glow of this generous declaration Mr. Stanley Carruthers lit his cigarette and watched her with unconcealed admiration.

AS the Arts and Crafts had predicted, the newspapers gave considerable space to their open meeting, and the Alberta author came in for a large share of the reporters' finest spasms. It was the chance of a lifetime—here was local color, human interest, romance, thrills! Good old phrases, clover scented, and rosy hued that had lain in cold storage for years, were brought out and used with conscious pride.

There was one paper which boldly hinted at what it called her "mesalliance" and drew a lurid picture of her domestic unhappiness "so bravely borne." All the gossip of the Convention was in it, intensified and exaggerated; conjectures set down as known truth; the idle chatter of idle women crystallized in print!

And, of this paper, a copy was sent by some unknown person to James Dawson, Auburn, Alberta.

The rain was falling at Auburn, Alberta, with the dreary insistence of unwelcome harvest rain. Just a quiet drizzle—plenty more where this came from; no haste; no waste. It soaked the fields, keeping green the grain which should be ripening in a clear sun. Kate Dawson had been gone a week, and it would still be a week before she came back. Just a week—seven days—Jim Dawson went over them in his mind as he drove the ten miles over the rain-soaked roads to Auburn to get his daily letter.

Every day she had written to him long letters, full of vital interest to him. He read them over and over again.

"Nobody really knows how well Kate can write, who has not seen her letters to me," he thought proudly. Absence had not made him fonder of his wife—for every day he lived was lived in devotion to her. The marvel of it all never left him—that such a woman as Kate Marks, who had spent her life in a city surrounded by cultured friends should be contented to live the lonely life of a rancher's wife.

He got his first disappointment when there was no letter for him. He told himself it was some unavoidable delay in the mails. Kate had written all right—there would be two letters for him to-morrow. Then he noticed the paper addressed to him in a strange hand. He opened it eagerly. A wavy ink line caught his eye.

"Western author delights large audience!"

Jim Dawson's face glowed with pride. "My girl," he murmured happily. "I knew it!" He wanted to be alone when he read it and folding it hastily, put it in his pocket, and did not look at it again until he was on the way home.

The rain still fell drearily and spattered the page as he read. His heart beat fast with pride as he read the flattering words. His girl had made good, you bet.

Suddenly he started, almost crushing the paper in his hands, and every bit of color went from his face. What's this—"unhappily married," "borne with heroic cheerfulness." He read it through to the end.

He stopped his horses and looked around. He did not know himself what thought was in his mind. Jim Dawson had always been able to settle his disputes, without difficulty, or delay. There was something to be done now.... The muscles swelled in his arms.... Surely something could be done....

Then the wanton cruelty, the utter brutality of the printed page came home to him.... there was no way.... no answer. Strange to say, he felt no resentment for himself—even the paragraph about the old lover, with its hidden and sinister meaning, angered him only in its relation to her. Why shouldn't the man admire her, if he was an old lover? Kate must have had dozens of men in love with her—why shouldn't any man admire her?

So he talked and reasoned with himself, trying to keep the cruel hint of the words out of his heart.

Everyone in his household was asleep when he reached home. He stabled his team with the help of his lantern, and then, going into the comfortable kitchen, he found the lunch the housekeeper had left for him. He thought of the many, merry meals he and Kate had had on this same kitchen table, but now it seemed a poor, cold thing to sit down and eat alone, and in silence.

With his customary thoughtfulness, he cleared away the lunch before going to his room. Then, lamp in hand, he went, as he and Kate had always done, to the children's room, and looked long and lovingly at his boy and girl asleep in their cots—the boy so like himself with his broad forehead and brown curls. He bent over him and kissed him tenderly—Kate's boy.

Then he turned to the little girl, so like her mother, with her tangle of red curls on the pillow. Picking her up in his arms, he carried her to his room, and put her in his own bed.

"Mother isn't putting up a bluff on us, is she, dearie?" he whispered as he kissed the soft little cheek beside his own. "Mother loves us, surely.... it is pretty rough on us if she doesn't.... and it's rougher still on mother...."

The child stirred in her sleep, and her arms tightened around his neck.

"I love my mother—and my daddy," she murmured drowsily.

All night long, Jim Dawson lay wide-eyed, staring into the darkness, with his little sleeping girl in his arms, not doubting his wife for a moment, but wondering.... all night long.... wondering!

The next evening Jim did not go for his mail, but one of the neighbors driving by volunteered to get it for him.

It was nearly midnight when the sound of wheels roused him from his reverie. He opened the door, and in the square of light, the horses stopped.

"Hello, Jim! Is that you?" called the neighbor. "I've got something for you."

Jim came out bareheaded. He tried to thank the neighbor for his kindness, but his throat was dry with suppressed excitement. Kate had written!

The buggy was still in the shadow, and he could not see its occupants.

"I have a letter for you, Jim," said his friend, with a suspicious twinkle in his voice; "a big one, registered, and special delivery—a right nice letter, I should say."

Then her voice rang out from the darkness: "Come, Jim, and help me out." Commonplace words, too but to Jim Dawson they were sweeter than the chiming of silver bells....

An hour later, they still sat over their late supper on the kitchen table. She had told him many things.

"I just got lonely, Jim; plain straight homesick for you and the children. I could not stay out the week. The people were kind to me, and said nice things about my work. I was glad to hear and see things, of course. Bruce Edwards was there—you know I've told you about Bruce. He took me around quite a bit, and was nice enough, only I couldn't lose him—you know that kind, Jim, always saying tiresome, platy sort of things. He thinks that women like to be fussed over all the time. The women I met dress beautifully and all talk the same, and at once. Everything is 'perfectly sweet and darling' to them—they are clever women, all right, and were kind to me, and all that, but oh, Jim, they are not for mine; and the men I met while I was away all looked small and poor and trifling to me, because I have been looking for the last ten years at one who is big and brown and useful. I compared them all with you, and they measured up badly, Jim. Do you know what it would feel like to live on pop corn and chocolates for two weeks, and try to make a meal of them—what do you think you would be hungry for?"

Jim Dawson watched his wife, his eyes aglow with love and pride. Not until she repeated her question did he answer her.

"I think perhaps, a slice of brown bread would be what was wanted," he answered, smiling. The glamor of her presence was upon him.

Then she came over to him and drew his face close to hers. "Please pass the brown bread!" she said.

Peter's—and she should have recognized that fact at first—instead of—but Paul had been such a pathetically eager little boy—it had been such a pleasure to watch over him for a while, and lead him into his Land of Heart's Desire—

It was the last day of July that Peter appeared at the Library. It was late in the afternoon, and Frances was picking out a novel for an elderly woman who did not want a very exciting one, because she said her nerves were bad. Peter sat down and waited until the woman had gone. Then he went over and stood in front of Frances, while she made a great pretence of tidying her desk.

"I'm sorry to disturb you," he began, "I know you'd just as soon I didn't bother you—"

"You know that isn't true," Frances broke in, in a low voice.

"But I have a message for you—so that's why I'm here." He paused. "It's from Paul. He's gone away."

"I'm not surprised. Tell me about it."

Peter's eyebrows went up in astonishment. "Can you get away from this place now and come for a walk? I'd be—rather glad if you would."

"I can't till about half an hour from now."

"I'll come back then," said Peter, and he did.

It had been a hot day, and the leaves hung lifeless on the trees above the dusty streets. They walked out to the edge of the town and down to the water.

"Well," Peter threw a tiny pebble out into the water, "we've been talking about everything under the sun—and I haven't yet given you the message."

"Tell me about Paul," Frances' eyes were on the faint horizon, and she was very still.

"He's gone on the freighter 'Manitou' for the rest of the season—till school starts, that is. The captain happened to mention that he needed a boy on board, and before you could turn around, Paul was off like a shot to collect a few clothes to go aboard."

"The 'Manitou' was due to leave in forty minutes, but Paul was back before that, running like a hare. I take off my hat to the little beggar. It was fine!"

"You said once you'd like him better in Timbuctoo"—Frances was smiling a little lop-sided smile.

"Which should prove to you," Peter replied grimly, "that I always mean exactly what I say. Paul and I had a short conversation aboard just before the 'Manitou' cast off. I gathered that he had explained to his mother and rushed off leaving her gaping."

"I know just how overcome she would be, poor soul! It isn't the first time Paul has astonished her."

"It seems he is determined to work on these freighters every summer until he's through High School. He told me he wants to earn enough money to go to the city—any city—and work his way through University. He wants to be an engineer and build things."

"You haven't given me Paul's message yet."

"He told me," Peter said soberly, "that I was to tell you that he would write lots of letters to you, since he didn't have time to go and say goodbye."

"I'd realized that little boys grow into big boys and then they go away. Once, I thought—"

She stopped abruptly, and Peter leaned towards her and took her hand in his two big brown ones.

"Some big boys come back, again and yet again. And some big boys wait and wait—"

"Ages and ages. Yes. I know, Peter. It was—dear—of you."

"I kept on hoping, Frances, that sometime Paul would let me have a tiny foothold—where I'd like to be. Has—is there a little bit of room for me now?"

She turned to him, and her eyes were very soft—

"Peter, dear—there has been all along—only—Paul was such a precious, lively little boy—that—that I didn't quite realize at first—"

There was an interruption here—an interruption without words—and after a while, in the gathering dusk, the lighthouse on a tiny island far across the water began to blink its yellow eyes. And it seemed to say just what was in the hearts of two happy people who sat on in the peaceful darkness—

"I—love—you—I—love—you."

Health and the Home

Perhaps it would be a little plainer if we said—"A Calorie is the amount of heat required to raise two quarts of water one degree Fahrenheit."

If you rise from your chair, walk eight feet, turn, walk back and sit down again, you have used up about one calorie of heat.

The average number of calories used up on his day's work by an ordinary man is from 2500 to 3000. But anyone doing very hard work may use up about twice as much.

The average number of calories used up by an ordinary woman is perhaps from 2200 to 2800, according to her occupation.

Replacing Calories

Therefore we should eat at our three meals, food which will give us the same number of calories as we use up in our daily work. An average helping of any one article at the table is about 100 calories.

Each of the following is a "Hundred Calories Portion":—

- 2 slices of white bread $\frac{1}{2}$ inch thick by $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches square.
- 1 cubic inch of butter.
- A Medium sized ripe banana.
- A large boiled egg.
- $3\frac{1}{2}$ lumps of sugar.
- $\frac{5}{8}$ cup of milk (whole).
- $1\frac{1}{8}$ cup of milk (skim).
- $\frac{1}{3}$ cup of baked custard.
- $\frac{1}{2}$ cup scalloped potatoes.
- 2 medium-sized chocolate creams.
- 1 cup of oatmeal (cooked).
- 1 large apple.
- $\frac{1}{2}$ large apple baked with two tablespoonfuls of sugar.
- 2 cooked prunes with two tablespoonfuls of prune juice.
- 1 large orange.
- 1 medium-sized potato.

They are very useful to wear inside the wrap and are very dainty.

If one has the means to be really fashionable, there are some exquisite Chinese shawls and scarves of heavy crepe embroidered as only the Oriental can, and finished around the edge with deep, tied fringe. These shawls are not ephemeral as some modern toggeries, but will last for centuries and are quite well worth while as heirlooms, if one wishes to be gratefully remembered by coming generations.

WOMEN'S INSTITUTES' METHODS

By Mrs. Alfred Watt, M.B.E.

THIS page will be conducted in the interests of Women's Institutes' methods of work. It will consist for the most part of explanations and descriptions of how Institute features are managed and their activities carried out, and of answers to questions. Any member of an Institute is at liberty to ask questions or request a description of any phase of the work. The page has been instituted at the wish of the Federated W.I.s of Canada and is in the personal charge of a committee appointed for that purpose. In their desire to give this service to the Institutes of Canada, the committee has been met with whole hearted co-operation on the part of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

It is the sole wish of all concerned to be of use to the Institutes; but, for this service to be of value, there must be two consenting parties, those who are arranging for this exchange of information and experience and those who are receiving the benefit. Naturally, it is not expected to reach the perfectly self-satisfied. It is the common experience of all Institute workers that those who ask least for help, need it the most. But it is hoped that those who feel a need, who want their own Institute to be the best in the Institute world who have the good of the whole movement at heart will give of their best to us and let us give of our best to them.

The international character of the movement will be emphasized. There are now kindred women's rural societies in the United States, Ireland, Belgium, England, Wales, Scotland, France, New Zealand, and other countries. Accounts of how their work is carried on will be given as space permits, and it is hoped through this page to spread abroad descriptions of our work here.

We are living in the midst of trying but wonderful times. A whole world is being reborn. We must see to it, that, we Women's Institute members, who have been pioneers in the work for rural women and have won an honored place in the rural community continue as leaders and do not fall back into the ranks of those who also ran. To march with the times there must be new life and new growth. "The year of 1920 was the year of re-organization, 1921 the year of re-adjustment" and the year of 1922 should be the year of re-inspiration. We did re-organize our Institute forces as Provinces and as a Dominion. We did try to readjust our organization to the changing conditions. It is now up to us to re-inspire every member and every part of our movement. We are perfectly free, self governing, independent, organizations, with a tremendous backing in our government assistance and sympathy. We have only ourselves to blame if we do not measure up to the standards of the times.

This month's page will give an illustration of the arrangements made for the sharing of our experience and problems. The Question Drawer contains answers to questions asked at meetings or received in letters. A report is given of an English W.I. to show the sort of report which an official organ or a district or group conference would like to receive. Later it is hoped to show the model newspaper, and other reports exhibited by Miss MacIsaac at the Alberta Convention. A short Agricultural Course as given at a Welsh W.I. is given to show how our agricultural aims may be carried out. An outline is sketched of a possible paper by a member on "How Women's Institutes are adapted to every country," which it is hoped some enterprising member may prepare for her own Institute and which later may find its way into print for the benefit of other Institutes. Next month a description of a Women's Institute market will be given and a talk on how Discussions, so important a part of Institute meetings, should be conducted in order to make the most of them.

So now we're off, with high hopes, but cheerfully ready for correction criticism and suggestion, so long as we are all going the same way, the way of Institute activity and success.

WHAT WE HAVE

It is not generally known even among our members, what a wealth of Institute material we have, nor is it realized what we miss by not having a national Headquarters where all our splendid material may be made available.

To give only a hurried summary:—

There are Institute Song Sheets, Official Journals, Diaries, Calendars, Badges, Songs, Plays, Poems, Uniforms, Medals, Certificates, Books, Programmes, Stationery, Sets of books for minutes, records etc., Colors, Ribbons, Gavel, Membership Cards, Photos, Lantern slides, Films, Prize Cards, Banners, Pamphlets, Posters, Leaflets, Baby cards, Presentation Shields and Pins,—now what do you think of that?

This list is written from memory and it will be interesting to see how much can be added if members tell us of other material.

Besides this, it is amazing our wealth of human material. The two first women judges in Canada were W.I. members and well known workers, Mrs. Murphy and Mrs. McGill; nearly all the women members of Parliament we have are W.I. members, including the two latest, our own Mrs. McClung and Mrs. Wintringham, the only British-born woman to sit in the British House of Commons. Our Mrs. Todd was President of the First Social Welfare Council of Canada and the only member of the Order of the British Empire who is a native-born Canadian received it because of her Institute work. The two women to be given important charges under the Dominion Government, Mrs. Robson and Dr. MacMurchy, are both W.I. members. The first woman School Inspector Dr. Marty, is one of our Conveners. Many Nurses who won War Decorations belong to us. Her Majesty, Queen Mary, is the President of Sandringham W.I. and the Princess Louise, of Challey W.I. The first woman member of a Cabinet Mrs. Smith of British Columbia, is also a W.I. member. But the list is legion. Some day there will be a "Who's Who" of the Institutes and we will simply swell with pride over the great and good women who are with us For Home and Country.

OUTLINE OF PAPER ON THE ADAPTABILITY OF WOMEN'S INSTITUTES

In presenting this outline for a talk or paper on this subject it is hoped that papers may be prepared by some members for a meeting. If members like the idea, other outlines will be given on other phases of our methods of work and in this way a real interest in the organization of our movement which, believe me, is a fascinating study, will be aroused.

1. W. I.'s STARTED IN CANADA, THE LAND OF HUGE RANCHES.
 2. IDEA ADOPTED IN BELGIUM, THE LAND OF SMALL HOLDERS.
 3. SUCCESSFUL EVEN IN IRELAND, THE LAND OF MISFORTUNE.
 4. THE FIRST W.I. IN THE BRITISH ISLES STARTED IN WALES, LAND OF MUSIC AND POETRY.
 5. ENGLAND THE MOTHER COUNTRY HAS NOW ABOUT 2500 and 150,000 MEMBERS.
 6. SCOTLAND WITH ITS ISOLATED HAMLETS HAS MOST FLOURISHING W.I.s.
 7. FRANCE THE OLD, HAS STARTED THE MOVEMENT.
 8. NEW ZEALAND THE NEW, HAS BEGUN IN A SMALL WAY.
- CONCLUSION The idea is suitable for all lands where there is a willingness to co-operate.

THE QUESTION DRAWER

Question. Do you recommend a Programme sub-committee?

Answer. Yes.

Question. How long should a Programme be, and how many items?

Answer. Two hours is the usual time allotted to the Programme. Many Institutes open the doors and have room, with Notice Board, Library, and etc., going at 2 o'clock, begin programme at 2.30 and end at 4.30 for tea.

The number of items depends, of course, on the length of time allowed for each. A good Chair-woman always makes the programme go briskly, gives a time allowance to speakers, plans time for discussions and questions and sticks to time allotted. I prefer a number of short items to one or two lengthy addresses and long-drawn-out business.

Question. In a printed programme is it well to have quotations and W.I. colors and Motto?

Answer. Yes. A reproduction of the W.I. Badge also adds distinction.

Question. Should the financial or annual Report, if brief, be printed on programmes of next year?

Answer. It is not usual, but it has been done both in Canada and abroad. There is no objection if funds permit.

Question. How can an Institute get on well if the Directors are no good?

Answer. Tut, tut. We have regular elections and we can all vote by secret ballot. We will get just the Directors we deserve. And we will get on just as well and just as badly as we deserve. Suppose the question were put differently. How shall we get a good and representative Board of Directors or Executive Committee? Here are a few hints:—

See that the election is conducted, not only in order, but with due preparation and in an intelligible manner, that is:—

Nominate in writing to Secretary in December if election is in January;

Nominate only those whom you honestly believe will be faithful and capable, having first got their consent;

See that the Secretary prepares ballot papers before the election, with names of those nominated in alphabetical order;

Attend Annual Meeting. Vote correctly for those whom you consider will make best Committee members and officers.

Before election is held, insist on records of attendances at last year's meetings being read, if any of last year's Directors are up for re-election.

Friday for Losses

By Mabel F. A. Thibaudeau

I was walking lately with a friend (not Claudia for a wonder,) when a chance remark led to the subject of superstitions. Elgiva had just affirmed with much emphasis that "no person with a grain of common sense could be superstitious, that a belief in signs and omens was a relic of barbarism, etc., etc." when our progress was stopped by a quantity of material strewn in front of a building in course of erection. With considerable strategy I endeavoured to find a pathway through the debris, when my friend suddenly grasped my arm and deliberately piloted me into the middle of the road which recent rains had left in a condition the reverse of pleasant. In answer to my look of dismay as I surveyed my mud-bespattered skirt, Elgiva demanded in an incredulous tone, "were you really going to walk under that ladder?"

The inconsistency of this with her previous remark anent "her non-belief in signs and omens" was aggravating in the extreme, more especially as in deference to her expressed opinion I had left undisturbed only a minute before a pin which lay in my pathway with the head invitingly towards me, and which if I did not pick up would only entail, so I firmly believed, a series of ills for the remainder of that day. Elgiva's action on this occasion leads me not to the subject of feminine inconsistency but to the superstitions indulged in by different classes and creeds in this mad world of ours.

Let us take just one little superstition but common to many nations. The sixth day of the week for instance. The ill-luck ascribed to Friday has been an almost universal belief from earliest times. This ominous day even in this prosaic age is regarded by many — who might in other respects agree with Elgiva's opinion of superstitious observances being "relics of barbarism"—as a day to be avoided for embarking on any important undertaking.

Tradition states that the ill-fate imputed to Friday had its source in the fact that the Sacrifice on the Cross was offered upon that day, thus giving a Christian import to a superstition which has existed among the Indian Brahmins from immemorial ages.

The Talmud asserts that Adam was created, transgressed and exiled from Eden on a Friday. A widely prevailing tenet in the ill-fortune attributed to this especial day, is one of the many superstitions governing the daily life of the Rumanians. No business of consequence is transacted, neither bread made, or a needle or pair of scissors handled by them on Friday, while it is interesting to note that Wednesday also is saddled with all the evil reputation associated with Friday. As a variant, the Italians couple Tuesday with Friday, and a well known proverb proclaims that no self respecting citizens must dare tempt the fates by marrying or setting out upon a journey on either the third or sixth day of the week. This phase of the subject associating an unfortunate termination to all journeys undertaken on a Friday prevails in other countries of Europe, and during the early years of the last century this belief was so strongly held that a person setting out upon his travels on this unpropitious day was deemed a most fool-hardy or an extraordinarily brave individual.

According to Welsh, Irish, and Scotch folk-lore we learn that the fairy-folk are permitted to play all sorts of pranks upon mankind on a Friday, and it is asserted and believed that upon this day of days the "little people" assume the forms of hideous imaginary animals which they retain until the following Monday.

The ill-luck of all the Fridays in the year appears to be concentrated in Good Friday. Among many Christian races until a comparatively recent date few people had the temerity even to drive a nail on this sanctified day. More especially is this the case in the North of England where a Yorkshire housewife — clinging to the traditions of an older era—would in no circumstances permit clothes to be washed on Good Friday, and in respect of household tasks as few performed as possible. The washing of clothes is especially regarded as grievously unlucky and great misfortune is bound to follow any one sufficiently courageous to engage in that necessary and commendable employment upon that most questionable day. The genesis of this latter superstition dates from an ancient legend which recounts that when the Saviour was on His way to Calvary, a woman washing clothes in a wayside pool, in derision shook the wet garments before the Lord's face and henceforth articles washed on the recurring anniversary of that tragic day, would bear forever spots of blood.

Not only are we forbidden to marry or enter into any important engagements upon any Friday of the year but we must refrain from cutting our tresses or manicuring our nails in obedience to the old couplet which declares,—

"Friday cut, and Friday shorn Better never had been born."

Again if we sing on Friday assuredly we shall weep on Sunday.

While this is only a brief category of some of the various ill omens associated with the sixth day of the week, we fortunately have sufficient data to warrant the assumption that the exception proves the rule to the embarrassment of those persons who do not recognize this perplexing day as wholly symbolic of misfortune. Charles Dickens, for example, it is well known, insisted that Friday was his day of good fortune, for his most melted butter. Mix well together successful undertakings were planned, or completed, so he has told us, on that superstitiously contradictory day. Also the people of the Scandinavian peninsula consider Friday the luckiest day of all the week, while in Scotland and many parts of Germany this is the day held as the most favourable from nuptial ceremonies. The Mohammedans also hold Friday in greatest veneration from the fact of it being the Moslem Sabbath. The people of the United States, it is well known, regard Friday as essentially a fortunate day in the sense that they perpetuate the anniversaries of certain Fridays with acclaim, for many historic events of profound import for them as a nation occurred on a Friday. On Friday this hemisphere was first sighted by Columbus. On Friday the Pilgrim Fathers disembarked from the Mayflower in Plymouth Bay. These are only a few of the many outstanding episodes which are red-lettered upon the calendar of this sometime doubtful day of fate.

As an afterthought I am reminded that it was only the other day that Taurus the "dominant" was heard to declare that Friday was a singularly "lucky" day, as it suggested soured salmon, or planked whitefish!

ward, so that the back part was never invaded by the tide, and was quite dry. The walls were formed of solid rock, and as the only light came from the entrance, the interior was gloomy. The professor was digging in one corner; he desisted as Peter approached him.

"No use going any deeper here," he said. "They had only a broken oar to dig with, so the hole they made could not be deep, I'll try further along. Peter, take the pick-axe, and start in that other corner, working this way."

Peter, murmuring that when he visited an asylum he always did as the inmates requested, took the tool and set to work. They were still digging when Mrs. Swanson came to announce that the kettle was boiling, and that, being famished, she refused to wait any longer for her lunch.

"If you want to hunt for Captain Kidd's money, you can do it just as well after you've all had a cup of tea," she said. "When I was a girl I remember an old man—Crazy Bill Mason we called him—who used to go out most every night to hunt for pirate gold. He always drew a circle, and put spells so that the evil spirits couldn't get inside it, for they do say that Kidd used to kill and bury two black sailors every time he hid money, so that their ghosts would frighten folks away. I remember the captain saying that the laws must have been dreadful lax in them days, and that he would probably lose his ticket, to say nothing of being hanged, if he tried such games with his crew. Well, as I said, Crazy Bill went out every night, so naturally he had to sleep in the daytime, which didn't leave him much time for his farm work, and they say he ended up in the poor-house."

"May his fate be a warning to all treasure hunters," said Blake solemnly. "Come on, folks! let's have our eats. We can resume our gentle exercise later."

The professor ate silently and thoughtfully. Sometimes he would stop and stare out to sea, as if he were trying to remember something just out of his memory. Then his right hand ran up his left arm with the same motion Peter had noticed in the boat. "I have it," he exclaimed, springing to his feet and rushing back to the cave.

Mrs. Swanson, comfortable under the shade of a big umbrella, placidly continued her meal, but Hilda and Blake followed the professor. They found him examining the walls of the cave with his pocket flashlight.

"It came back to me suddenly," he explained. "Harold was thin from loss of sleep and anxiety, and his gold torque used to keep slipping down. At last he took it off, and put it in a little niche high up in the rock wall, just over the spot where he was digging. He was a tall man, and—"

They all exclaimed, for the light had revealed a recess in the face of the rock. The professor rolled a stone forward, and balancing precariously upon it managed to reach in his hand. He drew out something that flashed in the torch light—a thick bracelet, engraved in Norse characters.

"The torque of Harold Einarsen," he said. "We will dig here."

Again they fell to work, but this time it was Peter who was excited.

The professor worked steadily and calmly, like a man who is certain of what the result of his toil will be. Soon his spade grated against what proved to be an iron chest, about two feet square and a foot deep. A blow of the pick-axe shattered the rusty lock, but Peter, who raised the lid, let it fall again with an exclamation of disappointment.

"It is less than half full of money," he said. "Those Norsemen must have had moderate ideas of wealth."

"They had, compared with our standards," agreed the professor, fingering the coins. "But I see that most of this money is gold of Byzantine coinage and very valuable from a collector's standpoint. I think Nils' treasure if properly disposed of, will fetch a very satisfactory sum."

"But what is in this corner?" asked Hilda, plunging her hands into the coffer. She brought out a little golden casket, beautifully worked. It was not locked, and when the cover was lifted a heap of jewels—diamonds, rubies, and emeralds—glowed and sparkled in the electric light.

Hilda gasped. "Oh, John, you are rich!" she exclaimed.

The professor was too excited to notice her use of his first name. "The treasure is yours," he said. "It was buried by Nils Svensen, and you are his descendent."

"But it was you who found it—who persisted in looking for it even when some of us were inclined to laugh at you," Hilda insisted. "It was you who—"

"For the land's sakes! What you got there?"

Mrs. Swanson's hearty, vulgar voice acted on the young folks like a dash of cold water, bringing them back suddenly from a past a thousand years distant. Peter was the first to recover his self-possession.

"We've found something," he explained, superfluously enough.

"Bring it outside, where we can get a good look at it," directed the practical Mrs. Swanson.

Between them the two men carried the iron box down to the beach, where Mrs. Swanson methodically arranged the coins in piles on the tablecloth.

"Seventy-five, eighty, eighty-five, ninety, ninety-five, a hundred," she counted. "An even hundred of them, and each piece worth ten dollars, I suppose. Let's see—that's a thousand dollars. I suppose it's not bad for a morning's work, but I always heard those old pirates was real rich. Land's sakes—a man nowadays would put a thousand dollars in the bank, and not get excited about it. Even if Crazy Bill had found a treasure he would have been better off by sticking to his farm."

"You haven't seen these, mother," Hilda said, emptying the contents of the golden casket on the cloth.

"I declare to goodness," Mrs. Swanson exclaimed, staring at the jewels.

"When you joined us we were debating as to the ownership of this treasure," the professor told her. "I maintain—"

"Why there's nothing to argue about," interrupted Mrs. Swanson, "as you would know if you were a sailor instead of a professor. But there, no man can know everything, I suppose. I mind once the captain salvaged a brig in the Caribbean—loaded with logwood, she was—and the salvage money was divided among the officers and crew in equal shares, according to their rank. So being as we're all on an equal footing, so to speak, we'll just each take a quarter of this stuff."

"But mother," Hilda remonstrated, "You and I did nothing; it was the professor who had the idea of looking for the treasure, and he and Mr. Blake did the digging. I think—"

"Mrs. Swanson's decision is worthy of Solomon himself," interrupted the professor. "We will have our find valued and divided into four equal shares. You can go to Paris, Peter, whether your pictures sell or not."

"And you, John—and Miss Hilda? Will this treasure help you too to realize your heart's desire?"

Hilda flushed under Peter's laughing regard. He seated himself beside her mother.

"Let me help you count those things," he offered. "I am really tired after all that digging. But the professor is indefatigable, and I know he won't rest until he has shown Miss Hilda the bubbling spring on the other side of the cape. Peter Wills says that if two lovers drink from that spring, hand in hand, their future happiness is assured."

The gold had been put back in the chest, and the dishes washed and packed in the lunch basket, before the professor and Hilda were seen returning hand in hand.

"Poor Mason," said Peter softly.

"Oh, he was much too old for Hilda," rejoined Mrs. Swanson. "Of course if things had been different, I might have advised her—But that nice Mr. Mason would really be happier with some settled woman nearer his own age. Not," she concluded hastily, though with a speculating gleam in her eye, "that I would ever think of putting another man in the captain's place."

Over the Brow of the Hill

derful story—and pondering over this she grew very wistful.

At last, one night, she fell asleep and dreamed:

She stood on the place where the child had left her—when suddenly back over the brow of the hill came the child. Only now in its eyes shone a wisdom greater than any the Mother had ever known. The child's arms were outstretched. It went straight to the Mother and took her hand.

"Come"—it said—"It is time to finish the story."

"But there is only one way of finishing the story"—said the Mother, "and that I may not do. I can't follow you, my Little, over the brow of the hill. My feet are not tiny and light enough. I should leave sad dark prints to disfigure the beauty of the way. I must go by the Ocean which washes and washes out dyed shadows."

"No, no, little Mother. You shall finish the wonderful story this way. For don't you see that you have waited for me here so beautifully and bent over so many other little children, even when you were most lonely, that you have become as one of them. Come. You will find it all as you thought, only more beautiful."

The Mother humbly took the little child's hand—and together they travelled over the brow of the hill to the end of the story.

The Picture He Carries Away

Will it be an alluring image of charm and freshness, or the pitying recollection of a pretty girl made unattractive by a poor complexion?

Of all the features men admire, a beautiful skin comes first. No girl can hope for much attention when hers is blotchy and coarse in texture.

Since a few weeks' scientific treatment will remedy such defects, no girl should be discouraged. It is within every woman's power to have and keep a smooth, fine, clear skin, radiant with the charm of health and freshness.

The cause of blackheads, of pimples, of enlarged, coarsened pores, is easily removed, and the ways and means are simple. In a surprisingly short time the improvement will delight you.

The First Step

The first thing you must do is to find a soap mild enough for thorough cleansing. Clogging accumulations of oil, dirt and perspiration are the cause of most bad skins. Once a day they must be thoroughly removed and only soap will do it.

Cleansing lather must be massaged into the skin. Use your hands, gently patting and rubbing. Rinse thoroughly, still with your hands, for a wash cloth may roughen and irritate.

Do this before you go to bed and apply cold cream liberally, all your skin will absorb, and you are ready for real beauty sleep. You will wake to a new and becoming freshness which will increase each day.

If you have a very dry skin apply cold cream before washing to supplement the lack of natural oil.

Safety in Palm and Olive Oils

Since the days of Cleopatra these mildest, most soothing cleansers have been used by lovely women to beautify their skins. Today we blend them in Palmolive Soap.

The great value of olive oil is its softening, relaxing qualities, so beneficial to the skin. It produces a mild, penetrating lather which enters the network of skin pores and glands and cleanses them of every foreign particle, without a trace of irritation.

Palm oil supplies richness and body and makes the profuse lather lasting.

Royal Cleansers—Yet low priced

Just as in ancient times, palm and olive oils are among the most costly ingredients which can be used in soap. But the popularity of Palmolive, which keeps the factories working day and night, allows us to import them in such vast volume that it reduces cost.

This saving, combined with manufacturing efficiency, keeps the price of Palmolive low. The cleansers of royalty are offered to modern users in a fragrant green cake which costs very little. A trial cake sent free if you will return the coupon.

Editorial Chat

The various departments of especial interest to home-makers we have endeavored to keep up in the columns of this magazine, and have been able to secure from time to time articles of up-to-date interest. There will be published in our pages, during this year, a series of articles by Collier Stevenson on the various apartments of the house which will prove of practical and artistic value. In our January issue there was published the first of these, entitled "The Welcoming Hall," and a series of these excellently-written and illustrated contributions will appear throughout the year.

Born in Ontario, some thirty-odd years ago, Collier Stevenson, from his earliest days gave evidence of that innate love of the beautiful which urged him later on to the study of architecture and interior decorating.

One of his first and best-loved possessions was a box of paints—and no doubt the creations therefrom were fearfully and wonderfully futuristic. Later on, during school days, many a punishment was meted out by teachers who despaired of implanting the principles of algebra or the axioms of geometry in the head of a boy who infinitely preferred to be adorning his books with queer little sketches of houses or humans. Ultimately, however, came the end of tiresome mathematics and classics; and, leaving Albert College, Belleville, Mr. Stevenson began a course in architecture, water-colors and design at the Hamilton Art School.

From Hamilton, Mr. Stevenson went to Philadelphia, for further study, broadening his scope by extensive foreign travel. Shortly after, he served for three years as secretary of the architectural exhibitions then held annually at The Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, Philadelphia—the oldest art institution on the American continent—by the T. Square Club, an organization of which he has long been a member. This was, of course, an experience of incalculable value.

Induced by all the study, travel and architectural association, there was a gradually growing desire to reach a larger public, to disseminate through the medium of magazines and newspapers information that would tend to stimulate general interest in the beautifying of the home. When the opportunity presented itself, Mr. Stevenson, therefore, accepted the architectural editorship of "American Suburbs"; and, that he might make an intelligent analysis of contemporary architecture, made a six-months' tour of the larger cities of the United States, studying especially their domestic design. Later, he became architectural editor of the Philadelphia "Sunday Record," a position which he held for four years, while continuing his contributions to a circle of well-known magazines, such as "Country Life in America," "House and Garden," "The House Beautiful," "The Ladies' Home Journal," etc.

However, in the midst of the success which has come to him, Mr. Stevenson has never forgotten that his earliest literary recognition came from the Canadian Home Journal which, as early as 1909, published several architectural articles, written and illustrated by him. He has, therefore, a unique sentimental interest in the series of articles presented in this JOURNAL during 1922.

* * *

We received some interesting articles on the subject of "A Model Kitchen," and are publishing in this issue the prize-winning contribution with photographs. Mrs. E. Whiting of Sidney, British Columbia, is the fortunate prize-winner whom we congratulate on her success. The kitchen is pre-eminently the feminine kingdom and yet, for centuries, women have shown a strange lack of initiative in demanding or inventing the proper equipment for this principality of pots and pans. The kitchen, as described in this article, is anything but a scene suggestive of dreariness and drudgery.

For some years, Marion Harris Neil had been contributing our articles on cookery, and on her lamented death more than a year ago, her sister, Mary M. Neil continued the department. Miss Neil is now contemplating a return to her beloved Scotland, and after the month of March, her contributions to our columns will cease. We regret Miss Neil's departure and wish her every happiness and prosperity in the "Land o' Cakes." We hope to be able to announce in our next issue that we have secured the services of a writer who is acknowledged as a specialist in articles on culinary topics.

A WRITER ON ARCHITECTURE

Mr. Collier Stevenson, who is writing a series of articles on the various apartments of the house, is an architectural authority who has spent years of study and has had much practical experience in his chosen profession.

The real naphtha odor means sweet clean clothes

Clothes with the sweetness that tells they are clean through and through—really clean! The real naphtha in Fels-Naptha goes through every thread, makes the dirt let go, then vanishes, carrying all odors with it.

Because of the great help of the real naphtha, less rubbing is needed with Fels-Naptha than with any other soap. After the little rubbing, douse the clothes, and the Fels-Naptha soapy water flushes all the dirt away. Then what a delightful clean-clothes smell!

The combination of splendid soap and real naphtha gives Fels-Naptha a double cleaning-value—the cleaning-value of soap and the cleaning-value of real naphtha.

The only way you can get this benefit in soap is to be sure you get Fels-Naptha—the original and genuine naphtha soap—of your grocer. The clean naphtha odor and the red-and-green wrapper are your guides.

FREE If you haven't seen or used Fels-Naptha lately send for free sample. Write Fels-Naptha, Philadelphia.

For laces and all fine things

Let good soap and real naphtha—the excellent, safe cleaner that dry cleaners use—clean your silken and filmy garments. The only way you can get this combination is by using Fels-Naptha. It loosens the dirt so gently that it makes the clothes last longer. It washes fine white fabrics snowy white. It quickly restores the bright fresh look to all your lovely clothes.

Useful all over the house!

Fels-Naptha not only washes anything washable, but safely cleans anything soap-and-water will clean. It washes dishes and cut-glass free from greasy streaks, and leaves them sweet and glistening. It takes spots out of rugs, carpets, cloth, draperies. Quickly brightens linoleum and painted woodwork. Cleans enamel of bathtub, washstand, sink, refrigerator. Makes everything sweet and sanitary.

FELS-NAPHTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPHTHA ODOR

A VARIETY OF COMMENT

THE approaching marriage of Princess Mary and Viscount Lascelles is an absorbing topic of social interest in Britain in these early months of 1922, and the wedding, which is announced for the month of February, is being discussed in all those varied details which are joy to the feminine heart. British goods are to be used for the trousseau and British craftsmen are to be employed in its manufacture. Irish linen, Scottish wool, English silk and lace are all to figure in the trousseau of the only daughter of King George and Queen Mary.

The position of an only girl in a family where there are several brothers is usually an enviable one, and Princess Mary seems to have enjoyed the wholesome role of "chum" to the sons in the Royal Household. As this is an essentially democratic age, there is no disappointment expressed over the fact that Princess Mary is to be married to a nobleman of the non-royal ranks of Great Britain. Viscount Lascelles, the future son-in-law of King George and Queen Mary, is an attractive young man of considerable fortune who has had a varied career. He has seen diplomatic service—part of it in Canada as aide-de-camp to the Governor-General in Earl Grey's regime—and distinguished himself during the war. His family is an old one in Yorkshire, but the earldom of Harewood, to which he is the heir, was created only about one hundred years ago. It is by no means the first time that British princesses have married outside the reigning house. One of Queen Victoria's daughters married the late Duke of Argyll, and one of King Edward's daughters married the late Duke of Fife. The engagement of Princess Mary is popular in England, and there are a good many quiet hints that the marriage of the Prince of Wales to an Englishwoman would please the people even more. The prince has shown his usual tact and charm during his trip to India, and a good deal of courage too in refusing to permit himself to be too strictly guarded from the crowds he meets.

THERE is a persistent rumor that the Prince of Wales is to marry Lady Rachel Cavendish, the fourth daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire. While the Duke was our Governor-General (1916-1921), three of his daughters were married. The eldest, Lady Maud Cavendish, was married in Ottawa in 1917 to Captain Angus Mackintosh, who died in Washington in the autumn of 1918. A little daughter was the only child and, of course, "Moy Hall," the ancestral home of "The Mackintosh" will go to a male heir. Lady Blanche Cavendish was married to Mr. John Cobbold and Lady Dorothy Cavendish to Captain Harold Macmillan—the weddings of the younger daughters taking place in England. There are two unmarried daughters left in the Devonshire household:—Lady Rachel and Lady Anne Cavendish. The persistent rumor regarding Lady Rachel's romance is, to say the least of it, rather remarkable:—and Canadians will hope that the Prince, who won all hearts on his visit to the Dominion in the autumn of 1919, may be allowed to follow the dictates of his own choice and make something more than an "alliance." Lady Rachel was a bright accomplished girl, as Ottawa knew her, and, in true English fashion, distinguished herself in sports, winning a coveted prize in the Minto Club skating competitions.

In Queen Victoria, sovereign in her own right, the Empire had an admirable example of the domestic, as well as the executive virtues. It has become the fashion, among the would-be smart, to use the word, "Victorian," with a half sneer to indicate that the good Queen and the virtues of which she approved are behind these extremely advanced times. Those who indulge in such a sneer are surely ignorant of the British history of three-fifths of the Nineteenth Century and would do well to consider the era and the ideals which they dismiss so lightly.

Queen Alexandra, who is now in her seventy-eighth year, by her graciousness and womanly sweetness, won the hearts of the British people when she came as a bride to London, more than fifty-five years ago, and is affectionately regarded as "the Queen Mother." Queen Mary has been eminently admirable as Queen Consort and has shown in her home life, the virtues of industry and sympathy so linked with all that has made the present Royal Family of Britain held in high esteem. May the young Prince of Wales make as wise and happy a choice as did Edward VII, and George V.

HERE is an interesting story of "The Last Pow-Wow on the Kawarthas," by Miss Idell Emmerson of Toronto, who says:

"The facts were told me by a man who remembers seeing the fleets of canoes pass up the lake and years later heard the explanation of the breaking up of the pow-wow, as told by the superstitious Indians.

"Nested close to the southern shore of the inviting waters of a Kawartha

Lake lies a large island almost covered, seventy years ago, with deep maple and beech forests where the Indians roamed, hunted and built their camp-fires.

"In those far-off days, one evening when the sunset sky and its reflection in the lake's calm surface made the scene like fairy-land; a fleet of canoes, each holding many redmen, sitting erect and paddling noiselessly in perfect rhythm; glided up the silver path on the water and reached the shores of Sugnish Island. With each succeeding sunset, others came in greater and still greater numbers until on the sixth day many hundreds of canoes lay sunken or hidden along the island's shores.

"At night huge camp-fires sent their flames upward, brightening the bronzed faces of the Indians and making the scene similar to those of the days of Frontenac.

"Out on the water, about a mile away, white people in sail-boats and canoes watched and listened. They could distinguish the chiefs by their necklaces of bears' claws and the ermine skins fastened to the ends of their braided hair. They could see how intently all listened to each story-teller until their lithe bodies leaned towards the speaker in their eagerness but they enjoyed most hearing the sweet, soft songs of these children of the forest.

"Long after the chill midnight air had driven the last of the spectators home, they continued their festivities, increasing constantly in joy and fervour until the gray light of early dawn made them seek their blankets with the happy thought that for three glorious weeks this enjoyment and feasting would last.

"But on the twelfth night no fires were lighted, no stories told or songs sung and those out on the lake went home puzzled and disappointed. The next night the same thing occurred and on the succeeding evening the fires were lighted only to be suddenly smothered. Early the following morning as the sun was rising above the horizon the visiting tribes were seen to embark and vanish down the lake until, at sunset, only the native tribe remained.

"Greatly the white people wondered, but could get no information by any means from the Redmen and for years it remained a source of mystery and would have continued unsolved had not Big Wind, almost twenty years later, when excited by too much fire-water, told us the whole story.

"On the twelfth day of the pow-wow as they were preparing to build the camp-fire a strange warrior passed slowly around their chief's tee-pee and, when spoken to, replied not, but suddenly disappeared, leaving no imprint of his moccasined feet on the grass or ground anywhere. So, lest he should be an Iriquois spy, they ceased their merry-making for that evening. Next night he returned and

With Pond's Vanishing Cream as a base, the powder will stay on many times longer

Every normal skin needs two creams

One to protect it from wind and dust
Another to cleanse it thoroughly at night

Complexion flaws that require a daytime cream without oil

Chap, windburn, roughness. You can protect your skin from the devastating effects of the weather if before going out you apply regularly a softening, protective cream.

Pond's Vanishing Cream is specially made without oil for daytime use, so that it can never reappear in a shine. Rub it lightly over your face whenever you are going out of doors. It disappears at once. It counteracts the drying effect of wind and cold, keeping the skin free from chap or roughness.

Shiny Skin. The reason most women are troubled with shiny skin is that, though they are continually powdering, they do not powder properly. Each time before you powder, apply a little Pond's Vanishing Cream, the disappearing cream without oil. This acts as a base for the powder, giving the skin a soft, velvety surface to which the powder adheres smoothly and evenly. You will be amazed to see how long you can go without having your nose or forehead become shiny.

Dull, tired skin. Whenever you feel the need of freshening your skin instantly, you will find that rubbing the face lightly with Pond's Vanishing Cream brings renewed vigor and fresh color. The tired, tense muscles respond at once to the relaxing effect of this soothing cream.

Before retiring rub a little Pond's Cold Cream into the face

Complexion flaws that need a night cream made with oil

Blackheads. When dust and dirt have bored deep into the skin and have been allowed to remain, blackheads form. These can only be reached by a cleansing so thorough that it gets way under the surface of the skin.

At night wash your face with hot water and pure soap. Then rub Pond's Cold Cream well into the skin. This rich oil cream works its way into the pores, gathering up every particle of dirt. Do not omit this nightly cleansing. Though you may think your skin is clean, the dirt that comes off when you wipe off the cream will show you how necessary this more thorough cleansing is.

Wrinkles. Once wrinkles have fastened themselves on the skin, it is almost impossible to erase them. But you can forestall them, if you start while they are still only a suggestion of fine lines.

Rub Pond's Cold Cream into the skin, paying particular attention to those places where wrinkles start first—around the eyes and mouth, under the chin, at the base of the nose. This delicate cream contains the oil needed to lubricate the skin and keep it elastic. It is when the skin loses its elasticity that wrinkles start to form. If you use Pond's Cold Cream regularly, rubbing the face gently but persistently, you will do much to prevent little lines from getting a chance at your skin.

THERE was a young man in the neighborhood who was unlike anyone else. Vanessa hadn't thought much about him so far; but she knew others had. He was different, and he wasn't going to stay. At least he said he wasn't and there was no reason why he should. It wasn't as if there had been any opportunity good enough for him to stay for, Mrs. Platt said. So far Vanessa had not really cared about him one way or the other. This was the summer of Herman and Bernice Simpson; who were not twins, but who might as well have been. They always thought the same about everything; one of the things they thought the same about was twisting Vanessa's curls. Herman would start at one shoulder and Bernice at the other. But by this time Vanessa could read deeply if anything outward disturbed her equilibrium. It is a great thing to make the acquaintance of someone sublime when one's curls are being twisted half off one's head. Naturally, however, Herman and Bernice had prevented Vanessa from noticing the artist for some time. The artist's name was Mr. Mahoney.

Here were Maud and Mr. Mahoney coming up the street. Where had they been?

Vanessa was not exactly sure that she had ever seen Maud looking precisely as she was looking when she and Mr. Mahoney came up the street at any previous moment in her existence. Mr. Mahoney was leading Maud by the hand. Maud being fourteen and Mr. Mahoney nearer thirty than twenty-five nothing dangerous is intended: personally Maud was not the kind of girl to let anyone think he could lead her round by the hand if he wanted to. But this was an exception. Maud was wearing a wreath of roses, red ones, in her hair; and that in itself would have been enough to startle anyone. The roses, or Mr. Mahoney, or the aspect of Maud, something about it anyway, made an idea occur to Vanessa. The idea was—that Maud was good looking, even pretty. Vanessa had a mortal conviction that otherwise Mr. Mahoney would not have thought it worth while leading her by the hand anywhere. Instantly Vanessa's mind had taken a great stride forward. It had never occurred to her before that an actual living Brown of the second generation could be pretty, or indeed good looking.

But where was Mr. Mahoney leading Maud? She would go at once to her mother and find out.

Her instant departure from the front garden, however, was hindered by the appearance of Maud's only best friend who came in at the gate, and, without saying anything, took a seat on the front steps. This was Bella White. She and Maud went to school together; and since each knew everything the other did, they obtained the same marks, and shared the same desk. Bella seemed to be feeling melancholy. She said nothing for some time, and when she spoke it was with an intense sigh.

"Do you think Maud is very pretty?"

A second before Vanessa had not been prepared to say what she thought, but now—

"Yes," answered Vanessa boldly.

"So do I," said Bella. There was a fatiguing silence.

Vanessa did not feel that she could discuss the subject with anyone else like Bella White, who didn't go up and down in value with the family whether she wanted to or not, until after she had spoken to Mrs. Brown.

At last Bella said: "Vanessa, wouldn't you have liked to have been Mary, Queen of Scots?"

"Um-m," said Vanessa. "I don't know. Why?"

"Oh-h," answered Bella with wailing emphasis, "to be so beautiful and to have every man who saw you falling in love with you."

"I would have liked it," said Vanessa. "But what's the good?"

"Wouldn't you rather be that than anything else?" pursued Bella.

The Happy Fair

No one can quite deny having thought about things; but it isn't necessary to say so if you have. It was necessary, however, to consider this suggestion of Bella's. There could be no doubt about it; the idea was fascinating.

"But what's the use of wanting to be what you can't be. It's not going to help any." This time it was Vanessa who wailed. There was indignation in her voice; not with Bella, but with the primary constitution of the idea.

Bella sighed deeply. "I'd rather be that," she said with an air of finality; "or as near to it as I could be."

Vanessa had been polite longer than she had thought possible. The

Mrs. Brown appeared to inquire from her youngest if she felt that she should have been consulted about Maud's portrait, and conveyed a bland suggestion at the same time that for a very little girl this was worse than usual.

Vanessa reflected. Of course Mrs. Brown wouldn't say anything about Maud's being pretty. But a further idea was beginning to exist vaguely in her mind. Mr. Mahoney might eventually become responsible for a good deal more than he had considered.

"But the roses, mother. Did he tell you about the roses?"

"For the picture?" Mrs. Brown asked calmly. "Oh certainly."

Vanessa began to doubt if after all

It was necessary, however, to consider the suggestion.

subject was too poignant to be discussed in the dark any longer.

"Just you wait here till I come back, Bella, will you? I want to speak to mother for a minute."

"No," said Bella, "I'm going anyway. I only wanted to see what someone else would think about it. You might tell Maud when she comes that I was here."

* * *

"MOTHER," inquired Vanessa, appearing with incredible suddenness at the dining room window which could be reached from the outside by means of a chair. "What's Mr. Mahoney going to do with Maud?"

Mrs. Brown was as placid as usual. She examined Vanessa's frock minutely to see if it fitted her before she replied.

"Mr. Mahoney spoke to your father and me about painting Maud's picture, and we agreed that he might. He said that our doing so would oblige him greatly."

her mother did think that Maud was pretty. If she did she couldn't ever have felt about it the way Bella White did about Mary, Queen of Scots.

At that moment Hector traversed the Brown garden swiftly from the rear. He hadn't seen it himself, but someone had told him. He had come to find out if the Browns were going to stand this kind of thing from Maud.

Vanessa stepped down from the chair. From her manner one could have felt sure that she had no idea what Hector had come for; but she looked back over her shoulder and remarked, "She knows," which meant that Mrs. Brown wasn't saying anything. Hector got up on the chair, but he said very little. There was nothing to be gained by continuing Vanessa's investigation.

The subject of Maud and Mr. Mahoney occupied Vanessa's mind for several days. She couldn't help feeling that there was more in it than her mother seemed to think there was. Of course, Mary, Queen of Scots, was out of the question; but that scarcely exhausted what Bella had said. It was more convenient to speak of Bella.

The painting of Maud's picture was taking place in an arbor which was situated in the garden of the John Hutchisons. The John Hutchisons consisted of two unmarried ladies; and this was where Mr. Mahoney boarded. Vanessa had not gone to see the painting, but she had thought about going. With an idea in one's mind which needs to be determined, one naturally thinks of doing anything.

Mr. Mahoney in some way was a most particular man; he always came for Maud himself. The next time that Vanessa was present when the procession passed down the street she followed it. She cast down Herman and Bernice from her curls, and went after Maud and Mr. Mahoney.

She first considered the combination of Maud and the arbor, and then Maud by herself critically. As she did so, especially from the contemplation of Maud's nose, a joy flowed into Vanessa's soul. Mr. Mahoney was right. Intrinsically there was a reason why Maud should be painted. But she had known that Maud was pretty for some days. That wasn't what she had come to find out.

There were no roses this morning, but one could imagine them without any trouble. As Mr. Mahoney said, what he wanted to get was the idea. When he came to painting the roses he could have them again.

Vanessa had asked Maud privately if she liked being pretty, that is, in connection with having one's picture painted; and she had answered that she did. But when pressed further to say exactly how and why she liked it, she had said that Vanessa was a mean thing. Vanessa now had come to see for herself, and Maud regarded her with veiled apprehension; which was not creditable to Maud, for she ought to have known better, nor to Vanessa, for Maud wasn't the kind of person to think that you would do anything you shouldn't do unless you had done it once or twice before.

But it appeared that Mr. Mahoney was overjoyed to see Vanessa. Whether it was that he was tired of painting Maud's picture, or whether the sister of a picture is always of some importance to the artist—a fact which she had not before suspected—no one could tell. Mr. Mahoney, if anything, was too profuse. He offered to get a glass of milk from the Miss Hutchisons for Vanessa; and when she let him see that to offer milk to the wrong person, on account of age, may be regarded as an offence, he asked Maud pathetically what her sister would care for. It wasn't often, Mr. Mahoney said, that girls didn't like him. Maud said, Oh, no, Vanessa didn't mean that she didn't like him; that wasn't it. What Maud was struggling to express was that Vanessa was pre-occupied.

"Vanessa," said Mr. Mahoney, stretching out his legs until a very little more and they would have reached across the arbor, "If you want to talk to me half as much as I want to talk to you, you would never be able to maintain that chilly reserve of yours. All sorts of dear little thoughts would spread their wings and fly from you to me to tell me how much I would like them. Come here, my child, come closer, so that I may observe you."

If there was anything particularly disgusting to a Brown it was to hear a person talk like this. For one thing, there was no possibility of answering it with dignity; unless one was too dignified and that was just as bad. The Browns had been brought up to know that if an older person said anything decorative to them they didn't mean what they said; it was only their way of making fun of whichever Brown it was

GOING DOWN

By B. L. Smeeton

THE man and the girl faced each other across the table, antagonism showing in every line of their set faces and tensely poised figures.

Out side, the rain swept down in torrents, trailing dripping fingers against the window panes. The wind blew bleakly, piercing the unfortunate wayfarer with the chill arrows of its driving onslaught. The falling leaves, storm tossed, rain soaked, swished soggly on the protecting glass as though seeking warmth and shelter.

But within, the two occupants of the room heard none of these sounds, so engrossed were they with themselves and their grievances.

And it wasn't the kind of room to quarrel in, for it was a cheerful homey place, as all good libraries should be. On two sides of the room were large windows, whose wide seats were softly lined and thickly piled with cushions, inviting the weary to stretch full length on their yielding depth and let the cares of the world slip by. Thick curtains of leaf brown shut out the dreary night and from an opposite side of the room, in which was set a huge fireplace, crackling logs flamed and roared. And on all sides were books. The walls were lined with them, rising clear to the ceiling. Old books, new books, classics and best sellers, deep and frivolous, stood cheek by jowl, jostling each other on the overflowing shelves. These were no stiff "sets" with uncut pages, but intimate friends, each one read many times and dearly loved. The flickering firelight played over them, here deepening the leather binding of some rare edition to russet brown or a deep wine color, and there picking out the gold lettering on the back of an old favourite and making it gleam anew.

Down the centre of the room ran a long narrow table, cheerfully littered with books and magazines, each one begging to be opened, deep soft chairs held out beckoning arms, and over the fireplace the ruby eye of a placid bronze Buddha stared unwinkingly, aloof from the passions and sorrows of life, detached, absorbed in contemplation of the joys of the infinite.

The girl standing on one side of the table was very slender, tall, her up-piled mass of dull black hair emphasized her height. A loose gown of a soft dark material threw into sharp contrast her cream-white arms and shoulders. Her head, proudly poised on a slender throat, was flung back in defiance, her eyes, usually blue as sapphires, were a stormy purple as a flush of anger burned against the clear pallor of her skin.

The man facing her was even taller, with a lithe almost wiry frame, his features were clean cut and just now set in stern uncompromising lines, his hair was dark brown and his eyes of the same shade were hard and unyielding. His lean, deeply-tanned hands were gripping the edge of the table, the knuckles showing strangely white against the dark, polished wood.

The two were almost glaring at each other, oblivious of their surroundings.

Presently the girl spoke, her words falling coldly, clearly, like icicles dropping on the frozen ground.

"This," she said, as she drew the diamond and platinum solitaire from the third finger of her left hand, "this is positively the last time."

"It certainly is," agreed the man grimly, carelessly pocketing the sparkling ring that had been put on with many protestations and renewed vows of faith only a week before.

"I'm sick and tired of this everlasting bickering and quarreling, this eternal jealousy and suspicion."

The girl smiled bitterly. "Jealousy!" she said scornfully. "My dear Bob, have you forgotten the old adage about people in glass houses? And may I ask what precipitated this vulgar quarrel but your wild unreasonable jealousy of poor little Dicky Forsyte?"

Bob snorted, no other word can attempt to express the sound which he made, calculated to convey his utter disgust and contempt for the unfortunate Richard.

That lounge lizard!" he sneered. Jealous of him! I should say not, but I must say that a fellow doesn't like to see the girl he's engaged to running around to fast shows with a pink tea hound like—"

"Just one moment, Mr. Robert Ames," Betty's voice was dangerously quiet and the two bright pink spots on her cheeks boded ill for the object of her anger, "You seem to have forgotten that, after breaking an important engagement with me, on the plea of business (oh, the scornful disbelief she threw into the word) I saw you at that same 'fast show' you mentioned just now with another woman; some siren of the underworld I suppose."

"But, my God!" cried Bob wrathfully, "Haven't I been trying to tell you—"

"Please don't be profane," she was colder, if possible, than before. "There is no need to add that to your list of delinquencies. You surely didn't expect me to believe such a threadbare excuse. Oh," her voice broke, "I've tried and tried to believe you and keep on trusting in you, but this," she hardened, "is the last straw. I'll never believe another man as long as I live."

"It may console you to know that you've shattered any illusions I had with regard to women. I used to think that when a girl cared for a chap, she would go through thick and thin for him, would help him along, not try to hinder, never doubting, always faithful. What a fool I was. I know now that you're shallow, fickle, mercenary, ready to go with any man that has lots of money and time to spend on you."

Her face whitened and she turned away wearily.

"Let's not go all over it again," she begged, "I think we've said everything before."

"Very well," he agreed, "Then this is the end, the end of all our plans and hopes, our dreams. And I was idiot enough to think—"

She winced as though he had struck her at the sound of his laugh but she said nothing. There was silence then.

"Good-bye," said the man huskily, even then some sign from her, some word, might have melted him as often before, but the girl did not even look around.

"Good-bye," she said indifferently, and the man did not notice her tightly clasped hands, her strained attitude, if he would speak, if he would move— But she heard instead his retreating footsteps, heard him stalk into the hall, snatch up his hat and coat, heard the front door slam, and heard him descending the steps—out of her home—out of her life.

She drew a gasping breath and fled madly through the room, into the hall, up the stairs, and into her bedroom, where she flung herself face downwards upon the bed and sobbed and sobbed.

NOW there were two definite and distinct reasons for this unfortunate situation and the majority of Bob's and Betty's quarrels and disagreements might be clearly traced to them. The first was that Bob had too much to do and not enough time to do it in, and the second was that Betty had not enough to do and too much time to do it in.

This state of affairs had existed ever since Bob's return from overseas when he had first met Betty at the home of a mutual friend. It had been as the novelist says, "love at first sight". There had been two weeks of unalloyed bliss and then had come the first cloud on the horizon, for Betty's father, on being informed of the engagement, had called to Bob's attention a fact which as the latter afterwards remarked, gave him "somewhat of a jolt". He said in effect that, while he liked and admired Bob very much and would rather see his daughter marry him than any other of the young cubs of her acquaintance, at the same time he was not aware that Bob's financial status was of the most affluent, and he was not prepared to hand over his only child until he was certain that her husband was able to support her in a reasonably comfortable manner as he did not wish to see her working out by the day in order to pay the rent.

Bob ruefully saw the wisdom of these remarks, and as a result he and Betty had a serious, and on her part a rather tearful, conference as to what was to be done. The outlook, it must be admitted, was far from hopeful. Bob was alone in the world as far as relations were concerned and, as he had been existing solely on the accumulated gratuity which a grateful Government had bestowed upon him at the conclusion of his four and one half years of war service, he would shortly be in that rather destitute condition known familiarly as "stony broke".

As a direct result of this momentous discussion Bob promptly banked the remainder of his capital and went job hunting. Contrary to expectations and by an extremely lucky opportunity which he was quick to seize he obtained a very good position in the large and growing firm of Bell and Hopwood, importers of rare and valuable timber, chiefly from the islands of the Hawaiian group.

With the winning of Betty as his aim, Bob set out to make himself invaluable to the firm of Bell and Hopwood. He was obtaining a fair salary for a single young man and by being careful was able to add a little each month to the afore-mentioned bank account. However, after an evening of close calculating and computing, Bob discovered to his horror that, at this rate, even allowing for the average annual increases, he would be exactly ninety-two years of age by the time his income had reached the minimum amount stipulated by Betty's father.

Obviously something must be done.

It was at this time that Bob learned through devious sources the fact that later altered the whole course of his life. It seemed that Mr. Bell having attained the span of years allotted to man was thinking of retiring and for the rest of his life doing nothing more strenuous than clipping Victory Bond coupons. In this event another partner would be taken into the business, and here was where Bob came in or at least fully intended to. When the name of Bell was erased from the company's letter head paper the name of Ames should replace it. And right then was where the trouble began. For Bob, after much cogitation and weighing of pros and cons decided that he would not tell Betty of his ambition, fearing to raise her hopes too high and then were he not to reach his goal that she in her disappointment would decide she could not wait for him and marry some other fellow with plenty of easy money. So he merely redoubled his efforts and when Betty questioned him as to the reason for this close application to work, he only said that the firm was doing a lot of business lately which called for late hours and special effort.

Gradually Bob became more and more familiar with the inner working of Bell and Hopwood. He had the firm's rates and prices at the tip of his tongue; he could quote statistics as involved as the income tax as glibly as the income tax investigator. Was anyone in doubt as to a certain order, ask Bob, he knew; was there an especially tough customer from whom an order must be extracted, Bob could get it; was there a mix up at the wharves as to shipping, Bob could untangle it; was there extra work to be done, Bob would come back at night and do it. And as a result of unceasing effort and vigilance Bob had the comfort of knowing that Messrs. Bell and Hopwood were aware of his value and depended on him to a greater extent than on any other of their numerous employees, and by certain hints thrown out from time to time Bob was reasonable sure that his eligibility for the partnership was being considered and tested.

But Betty could not understand why Bob had no more time to devote to her, why his evenings were filled with work and his occasional absences from the office with trips to different parts of the surrounding district, as Bob explained, "chasing the wily customer".

Many times did she charge Bob with unfaithfulness and waning ardour and, after two or three broken engagements which Bob had been unable to fulfil on account of an unexpected request from Mr. Hopwood to perform a special commission, her jealousy and suspicion grew. Three or four times was the diamond solitaire removed after a particularly stormy scene, and a corresponding number of times was it replaced with many tears and tender promises.

Just at this time Betty's mother and father were sailing for a trip to Honolulu and wished their daughter to accompany them, but, as a loving reconciliation with Bob had recently been effected after one of their ever more numerous quarrels, Betty elected to stay and thus prove to Bob her unswerving devotion and patience. So Betty was left alone in the big house and thus had more time than ever in which to think over her grievances and magnify Bob's neglect.

One night, just as Bob was leaving the office, he was called into the private sanctum of Mr. Hopwood, where he had a heart-to-heart talk with that gentleman which transformed him from a normal young man tramping the plebeian concrete into an all-conquering young god treading lightly on the slopes of Olympus. Mr. Hopwood had three things to say which he imparted at some length.

After having remarked that both he and Mr. Bell had been watching Bob for some time and had marked with growing pleasure and commendation his application to business, his mastering of the intricate details of the trade, his tact and success with customers, his willingness to attempt difficult jobs and, in short, his efficiency in general, Mr. Hopwood went on to say, firstly, that it had been decided to increase Bob's salary to an extent far beyond that gentleman's wildest dreams, secondly, that Bob was to be sent shortly on a trip of inspection to all the company's trading posts in the islands, which would involve an absence of some months, and thirdly that, as Bob was no doubt aware, his esteemed partner and friend, Mr. Bell, was seriously contemplating retirement, in which event someone would have to be found to fill his place, and, on Bob's return from the proposed tour, well, we should see. Here he chuckled jovially and slapping Bob heartily on the shoulder sent that dazed and jubilant person out of his office in a state dangerously bordering on delirium.

As in a dream from which he feared to waken, Bob descended to the street and, all unconscious of the hurrying crowds about him, began to make plans for the future. Suddenly, as he was halfway across the street at one of the busiest corners in the city, he stopped short, with a laugh, cried, "By George, I wonder—."

An oncoming motor jammed down its brakes with a screech, stopping directly across the car tracks; two south-bound and three north-bound cars were held up; other motors pulled short; irascible drivers shouted forcible remarks to those ahead and numerous epithets of a more or less uncomplimentary nature were hurled broadcast. Finally a traffic cop, having penetrated to the heart of the melee, found a young man standing with rapt gaze lifted to the electric signs winking overhead, heedless of the surrounding chaos, who, when asked "what the blankety blazes did he mean, holdin' up the traffic that way", beamed on the officer with the utmost good nature and murmured, "Its all right, old top, don't mention it. Awful glad to have met you. So long," and then retracing his steps returned to the same side of the street from which he had come.

With a rush and a roar the cars and pedestrians moved on, traffic swirled back to its steady flow, and a wrathful traffic officer walked back to his stand muttering angrily. "The young devil, tellin' me not to mention it, it was all right. He musta been nuts, that's sure."

The unconscious cause of all this confusion walked swiftly along for several blocks, his heart filled with song and his head whirling with newly arisen hopes and fears. Presently he halted in front of a store window and, in an effort to think clearly and definitely, stared unseeingly at the display contained therein. Suddenly, however, he was restored to his normal calm with a swift transition from the sublime to the ridiculous when he became aware of two young girls who were standing at his elbow and whose smiles and giggles made it plain that he was the object of their mirth. He then for the first time noticed that he was facing a jeweler's window and that for the past two or three minutes, he had been gazing earnestly and frowningly at a sign which read "Marriage Licenses issued Here."

Blushing, Bob was about to turn away when the thought came to him. "Well, why not. Might as well try it anyway. I'll get a license and a ring, persuade Betty to marry me before I'm sent on this trip, she'll go with me, peach of a honeymoon, and when we meet father-in-law in Honolulu I'll have the news of the partnership to stun him with and after that he won't have a word to say. Jolly good idea."

So in he went and, very pink about the ears, obtained a marriage license, purchased the latest thing in wedding rings, and, thus armed, set off to break the news to Betty.

On second thoughts, he decided to telephone and if possible, arrange to take her out to dinner somewhere, then to a theatre, and at supper afterwards to tell the glad tidings and unfold his daring plan. Entering a public telephone booth and dropping a nickle in the slot, he soon heard the beloved voice coming over the wire.

"Oh, hello, Bob honey! Seems to me I haven't seen you for ages. You bad boy! What have you been doing with yourself?"

"That's what I want to tell you, darling. When can I see you? This evening?"

"Oh, Bob dear, I'm awfully sorry but I'm dining with the Armstrongs tonight. You know they're old friends of Mother's and Dad's and I couldn't possibly put them off. Tomorrow night perhaps?"

"Surest thing you know! I'll call for you early and we'll have dinner at the Empress, take in a show and afterwards have supper at that little place we discovered the other night, and then," he laughed happily, "then I've something to tell you, young lady. Something that'll make you sit up and take notice."

"Bobby! How lovely! Is it a surprise?"

"I'll say it is, and a mighty nice one too."

"Oh, I can hardly wait. Do come early, won't you dear?"

"You bet I will. Have a good time to-night, sweetheart."

"Good-bye, darling."

"Good-bye."

Somehow Bob could not help wishing that he had told Betty his news, even over the 'phone. To-morrow was a darn long way off and a chap could never tell what would happen. But that was rubbish and with a lift of his shoulders Bob swung off boarding-housewards.

BUT on the morrow, during the latter part of the afternoon, Bob was called in by Mr. Hopwood who had a little job for him.

"You remember the firm of Ackroyd's Ltd., up in Lennoxville."

"Sure," replied Bob laconically.

"Well, they used to be one of our best customers. Used to do a lot of trade. They haven't done much lately, though. War sort of stopped their business, making valuable furniture, antiques, old mahogany. Unique rare woods used in their stuff. They've a number of young men in my employ who would be glad to accept this commission, and also, no doubt, the trip of inspection. Mr. Bell and I could probably find another—"

Visions of a receding partnership swam before Bob's eyes. It would never do to lose the old boy's friendship. He could explain to Betty.

"Oh, very well, I'll do it," he said resignedly, "Where is this guy anyway."

"I knew we could rely on you, my dear boy," smiled Mr. Hopwood. "Just come this way."

He led the way into Mr. Bell's office, where they found that gentleman deep in conversation with an extremely pretty young lady.

"Let me introduce Mr. Robert Ames, Miss Ackroyd. Mr. Ames is one of our most promising young men. Mr. Bell and I think a great deal of him," and he beamed paternally on sent a representative to town who tells me that they're starting up again and are looking around for material. Now they've been getting prices at a couple of other firms but we've got to get their business, see? and that's where you come in."

"My dear sir," the Rev. Mr. Richards was plainly taken aback. "How could I? You are surely joking."

"Uh-huh," Bob was noncommittal.

"I want you to show this party a good time. Dinner, theatre, supper, the usual thing, and land a big order."

"All right," agreed Bob. "Lead me to it."

"Very well, here's two tickets for 'The Wolf' and—"

"But see here, these are for to-night!"

"Well, when did you think they would be for? New Year's Eve?" with great sarcasm.

"No, but I can't—to-night—simply impossible!"

Mr. Hopwood's manner grew chilly. "Of course," he said stiffly, "if it's impossible, I have no doubt there are Bob, well pleased with the result of his little surprise.

That unfortunate individual was almost too stunned to speak. Good night! Old Ackroyd's daughter. If he'd known it was a woman he would never have consented, but he couldn't back out now, to offend the boss' daughter would put the kibosh on any hope of an order. He must go through with it. So he gave her one of his most engaging smiles and murmured that he was delighted.

And that was why, half an hour later, Bob 'phoned up Betty and, in sackcloth and ashes, explained that he was frightfully sorry but he simply couldn't take her out that evening.

"Oh, Bob!" mourned Betty, "And why?"

"Business, darling."

"Oh, bosh!" said the voice of his adored, irritably. "I'm getting good and tired of hearing that. Couldn't you think up something else, for a change?"

"Why, Betty! You know, darling, that I wouldn't deceive you. I'm awfully disappointed myself, but it can't be helped. This is positively the last time it will occur."

"You always say that. And let me tell you, Bob Ames, that I'm not going to let you spoil my evening. I'm going to follow your example and have a good time too!"

With which parting shot, she closed off.

As a result of which conversation, Miss Ackroyd from Lennoxville found the young man from Bell and Hopwood's the glumest and dullest dinner companion she had ever had.

"Believe me," she thought, "I'm not going to give any orders to a firm that can only produce a dud like this one. Hope the show's more exciting."

Which it certainly was, being one to which Bob had refused to take Betty on account of its daring frankness and sensationalism. So I leave it to you to imagine his feelings, when, he and Miss Ackroyd having found their seats, he observed Betty, accompanied by a young man of whom Bob entirely disapproved, in a seat not far distant.

She saw him at the same moment and, betraying no surprise, gave him a knowing smile which seemed to say, "Just as I thought," and then, turning to her escort, said something which caused that young man much amusement.

There was a quality in that smile which sent the blood pounding through Bob's veins in a tide of anger. Very well! He'd show her! If she thought him capable of deceiving her and having an affair with another woman, he wouldn't disappoint her. If she cared for him so little as to go with a man whose reputation she well knew was not of the best to a play which even the critics declared to be too daring, he could follow her example he guessed.

And just then Miss Ackroyd got a surprise. For her companion was so attentive, so devoted, so gallant a cavalier, that she remembered for many a long day the young man from Bell and Hopwood's who had so suddenly been transformed from a "dud" to the most thrilling of escorts. (I may mention in passing that Bell and Hopwood subsequently received a large and lucrative order from Ackroyd's Ltd. of Lennoxville).

So, as I said some time ago, this was the reason for the irremediable quarrel between Betty and Bob, which brings us back to the point when Bob slammed the door and went down the steps positively for the last time, and Betty lay face downwards on the bed and wept.

EXACTLY a week later and at precisely twelve minutes past five in the afternoon Bob stood at the door of Mr. Hopwood's office taking leave of that official preparatory to sailing for Honolulu.

It had been a week of misery and remorse for Bob. His love and longing for Betty had battled with his anger and his pride. But he would not, no he would not, give in. It had been her fault, she had given him no chance to explain, the quarrel had been of her making, she had said she never wanted to see him again and he would inflict himself on no one. The empty years stretched ahead, Bettyless, but he was firm, let her come and ask his forgiveness. Hereafter, he had played the humble penitent, but hers must be the suppliant role this time.

And so he packed with a heavy heart, all the joy and zest gone out of his trip. It was merely a job to be done as quickly as possible and then he would return and plunge once more into business; hereafter women were to have no part in his life, he knew their ticks and their wiles.

"Well, good-bye, Bob," said Mr. Hopwood, "I'll be glad to see you back again. What time does the Mariana sail?"

How often we read in our Journals that the kitchen should be the most interesting room in the house, also that it should be bright and cheerful.

How often we find in reality that it is the general living room, where the mother does all her work, and at meal times hurriedly clears the table to lay the meal for her family. When she clears the table of dishes, or fruit jars, or sewing, or whatever she has been busy with, where does it go? Usually into the pantry. The pantry in so many houses is such a small compartment, and contains such a beggarly array of half empty and dirty bottles, jars, and tins, hiding behind one another, that the average housewife would sooner go to hospital than spring clean her pantry.

For a long time I had visions of altering my house, and I collected ideas from journals and illustrations which I thought might be useful. When it came to the time that the work was seriously considered my husband said, "Why not do away with the pantry altogether, take in the back veranda and build a new kitchen?" Here was an excellent idea which I had never thought of, and my opportunity to build a kitchen such as I had never seen, or even read about, but which was completed with the help of many useful suggestions from the carpenter who did the work.

The kitchen adjoins the dining room, a swing door being provided between the two rooms. It is ten feet by sixteen feet, and the kitchen door opens into a porch, which is shelved and is large enough to hold a washing machine, and all brushes and general household implements. A door from the porch opens on to the back steps which lead into the garden.

Now to describe the kitchen:—

The length of the kitchen is north and south with the windows on the west side. This is a great advantage in summer time because it is always so nice and cool during the morning, and all the work is finished before the hot sunshine reaches the windows in the afternoon. On the north side is the dining room swing door, and the cooking range, with a clothes dryer fixed to the wall near the stove, but high enough to be out of the way. On the west side, a table is fixed the whole sixteen feet, and covered with white linoleum.

On the table is fixed the sink and drain board. My experience of kitchen sinks has been that they are placed too low, and I instructed the carpenter just where I wanted this one placed. He said that would not be right as they were always placed at such a height, I knew that, I had had one placed at that height before, and it gave me a pain in the back every time I washed the dishes, so I was determined to have the new sink put just high enough for me to reach without any stooping, and it makes all the difference between pain and comfort in doing the work. A large drain board is on the left hand side of the sink and under the drain board is the knife, spoon, and fork drawer. There is just room for a drawer large enough to place all the cutlery and it is a very new and novel idea. Over the sink is hot and cold water with silver plated shut-off taps. This sixteen feet of table, sink and drain board gives me all kinds of room for general work.

Above the table, starting at the north end there is a cupboard which holds all my cooking hardware, then there is a small window with a

Next to the window is a cupboard, known as "the cakery." It is fitted with five loose shelves which slide completely out, so that when I am baking cakes I can take them out of the oven, place them on the shelves and slide them catch and casement adjuster. This window is very useful for opening when the kitchen gets over heated or steamy. Next the small window and over the sink is a cupboard which contains all washing materials such as soaps, soap powders, lux, blue, starch and Old Dutch, also all cooking spices. Then there is the main window, six feet long and two feet six inches high, opening the whole length. This arrangement of windows into the cupboard. I can also take out a shelf containing a large cake, cut it for table use, and place the tray, containing the remainder back in the cupboard without any handling of the cake. Next to this and in the corner of the kitchen is "the cooler". This is a cupboard with three shelves and the bottom acts as another, it has a ventilation window at the bottom and one at the top.

both inserted in the outside wall and covered with fine wire gauze, set back six inches from the outside, so that it cannot get wet and rust. This "cooler" keeps milk, butter, meats etc. in perfect condition, even in the warm summer time. Over the windows and connecting the cooler and cakery at the one end of the kitchen, with the cupboard containing the cooking utensils at the other, is a plate rail, which will hold any pretty plates and vases which are in keeping with the rest of the kitchen.

Under the table, commencing at the north end, there is first an open space, designed to hold wood for the stove, then there is a shelf for a washing up bowl, and space under for the bread mixer. Then there is a narrow space, just large enough to hold two chopping boards. Then a cupboard, with shelves and hooks which holds all the pans, fry pan, porridge pan, stew pans etc. (In some parts it is customary to call these pots.) Adjoining this there are two bins which slide forward, one holds fifty pounds of flour and the other the same amount of sugar, and under the bins are two small lockers which are used for spare papers and the receipt file. Next to this is a cupboard which contains all bread and cake tins and dripping tins, and then at the end of the kitchen is the bread bin. This is lined with linoleum, so as to be cool, slides forward, and will hold a dozen loaves of bread if necessary.

On the south end of the kitchen there is the door leading to the porch, and set in the wall, so as to be flush with the wall, is the cupboard containing the ironing board. The board is shaped, and hinged at the bottom of the cupboard and a leg is hinged to the board. It folds up to the back of the cupboard and when let down is ready for use. A wall plug and "on and off" switch are along side so that an electric iron can be used.

On the east side, commencing at the south end, is a bedroom door and then there is a fall fixture constructed. It is eight feet high and eight feet wide. The top is composed of four cupboards with five shelves in each, and can be used for all dishes and crockery, jams and bottled fruit; under the cupboards is a table top the whole length, but six inches wider than the cupboards; and under the table are three large and useful drawers, for house linen. Also a cupboard, shelved, and used for dry fruits and cereals etc. In the centre, between the drawers and the cupboard is left a space under the table just large enough to hold the sewing machine, and a rod and curtain screens the machine from view. A small corner shelf on a level with the table of this cabinet holds a carbon filter and provides wholesome drinking water all the year round. Close by this and just inside the swing door from the dining room is a switch which controls the electric light which hangs from the ceiling. This completes the built-in features and it will be noticed that there is

The Foolish Martha

By Sarah E. Welch

ILLUSTRATED BY GEOFFREY GRIER

WHEN I received a letter from Hugh reminding me that I had only paid him and Lucia one visit since their marriage I read between the lines, and packed my grip the next day.

Hugh was my favorite nephew, and, since his father's death at the time he was a motherless lad of fourteen, I had stood almost in the place of both parents to him. When he married one of the prettiest and sweetest girls in our little social circle, I did not feel that I had lost him, although a good appointment, offering itself immediately afterwards, took the young couple away from our home town into Toronto, sixty miles away.

I had spent a few weeks with them after they were settled in their new home on the outskirts of the city, and I came away convinced that theirs was one of the Heaven-made marriages. No two people seemed better suited, or more deeply in love with each other. Lucia was a splendid girl, healthy, beautiful, and generous; a capital little housewife, too, who kept their small house as fresh and neat as the proverbial new pin.

When Hugh's rather cryptic letter arrived I dismissed the momentary thought that one of them was sick and needed me, because he wrote, "Toronto and work seem to agree capitally with us both."

His letter was chatty; Hugh was always a good correspondent; but he did not rhapsodise over his matrimonial bliss as he had done on previous occasions.

I am not implying that Hugh wore his heart on his sleeve; there was nothing mawkishly sentimental about him. But he had brought me confidence since he was a lad, and, knowing what I thought of Lucia, he naturally felt no reluctance in talking to me about her. Therefore, I missed the happy note in his letter, although I could not think there was anything seriously wrong. Both Hugh and Lucia had been of a sensible age, and possessed of plenty of common-sense when they anchored on the safe rock of mutual love and trust.

Sometimes, however, cracks and fissures develop in the stoutest foundation after a time; and I did not forget that life in a large city might present problems and difficulties of which small-town dwellers had scarcely conception. Still, I might be making the traditional mountain out of a molehill.

Without sending them word I was coming, I timed my arrival for the supper-hour. Hugh, I knew, reached home shortly after six of the clock.

Their little house was a half hour's street-car ride from the Union Station. As I drew near, I noticed the dainty curtains at the front windows, flowers blooming on the sills; while the door knobs fairly glistened in the August sunshine. Lucia's housewifely activities were, undoubtedly, not of the "new broom" order. In these days of pleasure-loving wives it was refreshing to find a girl to whom the care of the home was of paramount importance.

She opened the door to my knock. She was as pretty as ever, but looked a trifle pale.

"Auntie! Well, this is a pleasant surprise! But why didn't you let us know when you were coming. Hugh would have met you at the train; he has just got in."

As I stepped across the threshold she shut the door behind me. "The dust is frightful" she said, "Just a second, Auntie!"

And, before I realised her intention, a whisk was flicked over my garments, removing a faint coating of grey caused by railway travelling.

I smiled.

"You neat child!" I remarked.

Lucia replaced the brush in a leather case affixed to the lintel of the front door.

"Dust is hard on furniture and things" she said.

Then, Hugh came on the scene, adding his welcome to hers.

He looked just the same as ever. Or—did he look the same? When the smile of greeting faded I thought I detected an added gravity of expression, little lines on his forehead. There was, too, a sort of detachment in his gaze and tone.

"You will like a wash before supper, Auntie" said Lucia, leading the way upstairs.

The room I had previously occupied had a north-east aspect, particularly pleasant at this time of the year. I naturally paused at the familiar door.

"I have made a change of rooms" remarked Lucia, "Our bedroom draperies do not stand strong sunlight."

I followed her into the room which the young married couple had occupied when I last visited them. It was the best bedroom, with a fine view of the Lake from two big windows.

"This is such a lovely room" I murmured.

Lucia was drawing up the dark green shades.

"Yes" she agreed, "But everything fades so quickly here. That is why I have got rid of the chintz. Don't hurry, Auntie, but come downstairs when you're fixed up."

I made a change of garments although, to tell the truth, I should have kept on my cool taffeta travelling suit if I had not sensed her feelings on the subject. As I braided my hair in front of the mirror I caught sight of two little horizontal lines which had only just made their appearance on my forehead. What had brought them there? I liked neatness and order as much as most self-respecting persons; a dirty dwelling was, of course, anathema. But—

I glanced around me. The room was spotless. There might be traffic on the street, destroying sunlight through the windows, but neither disintegrating force was apparent. I could have slid a finger over every edge of floor and furniture and not removed a molecule of dust.

AS I went downstairs, I wondered wherein the little rift lay. It did not have origin in a neglected home, an untidy wife. Yet there was a rift somewhere, and when I entered the dining room and saw Hugh facing the window, hands in pocket, and Lucia fixing something on the sideboard, the distance of the room between them I knew that my imagination had not gone astray this time. And I wanted badly to learn what the trouble was.

It was not money affairs, I felt sure. The state of Hugh's finances was on the ebb tide. When he touched on the business side of life, he was the enthusiastic and light-hearted boy as of old. But I noticed that his glance did not flash from me to his wife as in the past; and that Lucia took no apparent interest in our talk.

Yet there was nothing tangible to commit one to a feeling of apprehension; harmony prevailed. It was twice, however, during the meal that I detected a flicker of irritation on Hugh's face, a flicker of annoyance on Lucia's.

The first occasion was the reference made by Hugh to a business colleague of his whom he called Gordon. Gordon, as he explained to me, was the best of all-round sports; excelling in billiards, gold tennis, baseball.

"And—boxing" supplemented Lucia in a tone of palpable distaste.

The situation might have been tense but for the saving grace of Hugh's light laugh.

"The girlie's too tender-hearted. Auntie. She regards boxing as a brutal sport. I don't care for it, myself" he said.

And Lucia gave him one of her warm enveloping looks that made me feel all was right at bedrock.

Yet I saw that she did not like this Gordon, and I thought Hugh tactless when he said that he must ask Gordon round to meet me. Just as though a young man would want to be bothered talking with an old woman!

The second time this harmony was disturbed occurred when Lucia moved away from the table.

"I'll clear away the dishes presently" said Hugh, lighting his pipe.

Lucia's brows came closely together, but the sweep of long lashes hid the expression of her eyes.

"It will not take me a few minutes, Hugh" she said quietly, deftly packing up the crockery.

Hugh turned to me. "I want to get a maid in. I can afford it—"

"We have threshed out that subject already, dear" she said sweetly, as she went out of the room.

Hugh said no more; he puffed away at his pipe in moody silence, which I did not like to break. But a few minutes afterwards, he was his old self again, and nothing else happened, although I was conscious throughout of a tense atmosphere. For instance, Hugh's laugh was forced at times and Lucia kept up a run of irrelevant chatter which was unnecessary where we other two were concerned.

The following day, happened to be Saturday. At breakfast, Hugh smilingly announced that he should be home for the mid-day meal.

"We'll take Auntie out in the afternoon to see the sights" he said.

Lucia, fresh and dainty, looked up from the coffee tray. "Do you mind if you go alone with Hugh, Auntie?" she asked.

"Why don't you want to come, too?" queried my nephew somewhat sharply. The forehead creases were very much in evidence just then and he cracked an egg in a markedly irritable manner.

Lucia looked perfectly serene.

"I am sorry, but I started some work yesterday and must finish it" she said.

"What work?"

"The pantry—"

Hugh interrupted her with an explosive exclamation, and jumped up from his seat. Then, he gave an embarrassed laugh, suddenly aware of the presence of a third person.

"Please forgive me; I quite forgot myself. Well, if Lucia is busy to-day, suppose we postpone our jaunt?" he said.

He finished breakfast, and nothing more was said. But I could feel the dragging of chains.

After Lucia had performed her dutiful task of seeing him off, she came back to me.

"We are not making a stranger of you, you see. I am sorry I shall have to leave you to entertain your—" self this morning. There is a great deal of work" and she sighed gently, "in keeping even a small house clean."

I looked around me. The place was a shining example of housewifely skill. But I wondered if the Marthas fell short of what the Marys accomplished. I could hear the staccato crackling of an egg shell under a man's nervous fingers.

"You manage wonderfully!" I said. "Single-handed, dear?"

Lucia nodded.

"I began with a char-lady or two, but never again! The price they asked—and were such slatterns, in the bargain! To tell the honest truth, Aunt Minnie, I prefer to do my own housework. An incompetent little maid would drive me crazy. And for the present, we are not rich enough to pay the wages of a really good servant."

I did not see her again for two hours. She rejected my offer of help. But I heard her singing blithely over her task, the sound of her fresh young voice mingling with that of slushing water, vigorous brush strokes. She seemed quite content.

Then there was a 'phone call for her, and the next minute her cold little "Just as you please, of course, Hugh" reached me. She put up the receiver and came towards me, added colour in her cheeks.

"Hugh is going out to lunch with Mr. Gordon and to a ball game afterwards" she said.

"He will be out of the way while you are cleaning house, dear" I suggested.

She laughed. "Of course, there's something in that. Only—"

But she left the rest of her speech unuttered.

Then, to make matters worse there were two women callers later, and they stayed to afternoon tea. All the while, Lucia chatted to them her fingers were itching to go back to her interrupted tasks. So it happened that at supper time she was only just through, and she was flustered and snappy when Hugh returned.

"Gordon is coming round later" he said nonchalantly.

It was like putting a light to a fuse. Lucia said not a word, but her eyes flashed, and Hugh saw.

"Girlie, why do you dislike Gordon? Really, he is no end of a good chap. We have had a rattling good time together this afternoon."

"Apparently" said Lucia cuttingly.

"I asked you to come out with me, dear" Hugh gently reminded her.

I crept away. They could "kiss and be friends" better alone. But when I returned to the room only Hugh was there, and the moody expression was back on his face.

He got up and paced the room. "Lucia's the sweetest girl in the world" he said presently, "But she's all nerves. Oh! this confound—I beg your pardon, Aunt Minnie."

Then, he stopped by my chair, and putting his hands on my shoulder looked earnestly into my face.

"You must not misunderstand me. I'm crazy about my wife. But surely cleaning house is not the sum total of existence! She is tired and worn out at the end of the day."

He looked across at the prettily-arranged room, and gave a short laugh.

"What an old kisser you will think me! I guess I ought to thank my stars I haven't a slovenly wife."

Lucia's return to the room fortunately saved me the necessity of an answer.

Lucia's housewifely activities increased when the heat of this particularly torrid summer let up a little. There was canning, preserving, provision to be made against the exigencies of the coming winter. Frequently, Hugh returned from the office to find me presiding over the supper table, with a fatigued wife unable to leave a precious brew at a critical moment. He grew tired at length, and then he began to laud 'chickens' seen on Yonge Street. The girl who thought only of having a good time, irrespective of others, was the right sort of girl according to him, in these irritating moments.

And Gordon, who was in the habit of dropping in for a game of cards after supper, backed up his friend's sentiments. In Lucia's hearing he called a girl of twenty-four—her age, mind!—a lemon. Could folly go further?

My visit was drawing to a close. I had arranged to leave directly after the Exhibition came to an end.

It was the following Saturday. Lucia palpably lost patience when the hands of the clock pointed to twenty after two and Hugh had not returned. He invariably was punctual for the half past one o'clock meal.

Just as she had decided not to wait any longer, he 'phoned through from the city. He was going out to play outfielder in a baseball game. Gordon had got up all in a hurry, and should not be home until evening.

I think if Lucia's anger had not been of the silent, white-heat kind we could have talked the matter out together. But she paled, bit her lip, looked like a stricken deer, and went out of the room. Half an hour later, she appeared, dressed in outdoor clothes, and carrying a grip.

"Auntie, I'm sorry to leave you" she said, "but as you are going back home on Monday, you will not mind spending the week-end alone with Hugh. I am going back to Mother. I am quite resolved" as I tried to protest, "the situation is intolerable—disastrous to my self-respect—the self-respect of any wife. When Hugh chose between me and his friend—"

"Lucia! Oh! surely, child!—"

But she would not listen, and the next minute the door banged behind her hurrying footsteps.

HUGH could not return until evening. Gordon would, doubtless, accompany him. I meant to take that young man into my confidence, and put his friendship to the test.

Therefore, when I opened the door to him, somewhere about six of the clock, I was so glad to see him that I did not perceive, for the moment, that he was alone.

"Is Mrs. Harvey at home?" he asked, as he stepped across the threshold.

I glimpsed trouble, then.

"Something has happened! To—Hugh?" I gasped.

He put a hand on my shoulder.

"Don't be alarmed. It is not—too bad" he said.

Then, he told me that Hugh had been struck by a ball, and been rushed to hospital. They feared concussion.

I could not tell him that Lucia had left Hugh. I could only stammer out the fact that she was away from home. I fancied he guessed the truth, for while I was waiting for an answer to my long distance call to Peterborough, he said quietly,

"Hugh and I are real chums. But a man's best friend is his wife"

"Yes" I agreed. I wished that Lucia had been present.

I got in touch with her mother, but Lucia was not with her. I told Mrs. Bruce what had happened to Hugh, and the rest had to be left to Fate. But I felt sure that the girl's heart was sound at core, and she would rush to her husband's bedside as soon as she could get back to Toronto.

Hugh was light headed when I reached the hospital. His ravings were all in one strain.

"Lucia, I did wipe my boots! Lucia, for the love of Mike, let the place rip!"

Then, "Of course, if you wish to ruin your health by staying indoors from one week to another" or "Hang the housework, I say. I'll go batching with old Gordon."

That was the crux of the whole matter. Lucia had, doubtless, jumped to the conclusion that Hugh was sick of marital responsibilities and would welcome the chance of a return to bachelor freedom. He had probably said to her the identical words he was now repeating in delirium.

I looked at my watch. The Peterborough train was about due. I gave her half an hour in which to get from the Union Station to the hospital.

Then, there was a long distance call for me, and from the other end of the line Mrs. Bruce said her daughter had not arrived; she had no knowledge of her movements.

I tried to keep calm, but I was torn between anxiety on Hugh's account and Lucia's disappearance. Where had the child gone?

I heard nothing more, and on the morrow Hugh was so much better that permission was given for him to leave the hospital in the course of a day or two if he continued to make improvement. I undertook to nurse him.

I dreaded to tell him that Lucia had left him. He was bitterly disappointed not to find her at his bedside, but he accepted my murmured explanation that she had gone on a short visit to her mother. And Gordon backed me up, went a step further in an unblushing statement that Mrs. Bruce had sent for her daughter.

"Mustn't send his temperature up again" he said.

It was decided that Hugh go home on the Tuesday, and I a day ahead of him in order to fix things, although I knew that that immaculate little house would show no signs of wear and tear if left unoccupied for weeks.

I had carefully locked up before I left. Judge, therefore, of my consternation when I saw the front door standing wide open, windows raised. I thought of officious neighbours,—burglars.

Then, Lucia confronted me, coming from the back of the house, wearing a porch apron and carrying a duster.

"How long have you been here?" I cried.

She reddened. "I did not go to Peterborough, after all. Took a show in, and a meal in town and came back—to find both you and Hugh gone—without a word. I guess I was a fool not to have stayed away."

She felt bitter, felt that she had been dealt an injustice. I could see that she was ignorant of what had actually happened. Lucia seldom read the newspapers—never the sporting news.

I had meant to break the tidings to her; now, I refrained. It was up to me to try to play the part of mentor, if plain speaking would help to straighten out this matrimonial tangle.

"So you don't know where your husband spent the week-end?" I hazarded.

"I can guess. I told you, Aunt Minnie, he preferred his friend to his wife."

"Not without reason" I answered. Here cheeks took flame. "You—think—this, Aunt Minnie?"

"Certainly" I said.

She tossed her adorable little head.

"One would think I was a bad wife; an untidy, neglectful—"

"If you were, Hugh might be happier."

"Aunt Minnie!"

She stared at me as though she thought I had suddenly lost my reason.

I was determined, however, to press my point home; and I told her all the things that had been troubling me since I came on a visit to them. I don't think I spared her in the least.

She listened with commendable patience, a little smile of derision on her lips. It would take more than an elderly maiden aunt to convince a headstrong young wife that she was in the wrong. I saw that she thought it was my viewpoint in error.

Then, I shot the bolt.

"Lucia, your husband is lying in hospital, recovering from the effects of a blow at baseball that might have terminated fatally."

She sprang to her feet.

"Hugh ill! And you have only just told me! Aunt Minnie, I'm going to him at once" she cried.

I caught her arm. "No. You are to stay here. Hugh must not be excited." And, forthwith, I repeated, word by word, the lad's ravings.

It sounds cruel on my part. But I had visioned the future. Now—Now only could she learn her lesson.

"You cannot keep me away from him. I am his wife" she cried.

"You will do him more harm than good" I answered stubbornly. "He is not strong enough yet to be reminded of domestic troubles."

"Aunt Minnie, who are you to order me as though I were a child? What authority—?"

"The doctors" I lied.

My resolution almost failed when I saw her go white. If I had not been honestly attached to her, anxious for her ultimate happiness, I should have weakened, and the end I had in view might not have been accomplished.

She was ready to defy me, but not the power vested in the doctors. Moreover, she loved Hugh, although hers had been a wrong way of loving. She would not do anything to retard his recovery when I made it plain to her that she must wait until the next day before she saw him. Of course, she did not guess that he would be returning home so soon.

At intervals, she was depressed and silent; barely vouchsafing me a word. I read her anguish as she watched the hands of the clock. Time, to her, halted, dragged, wore chains she could not move; and I know that during the night he stood still for her.

Then, she had periods of revolt, of storm. Once, she got as far as the front door, desperate to put authority at naught. After that outburst, she wept until she had no more tears to weep.

But, before we said good night, she tacitly admitted that she had been partly to blame for past misunderstandings; and this was a long way on the right trail.

When I awoke the next morning, I found Lucia absent. But a little folded note beside my plate told me that she had only gone for an early morning walk in High Park. This was a new departure indeed, and promised well for the future, especially as she had not waited to wash up her own breakfast dishes.

Then, before I expected him, Hugh came home.

Gordon had only just got the invalid into the house when I heard Lucia's returning footsteps. I wanted a great scene.

"Hide!" I cried to Hugh as I went to open the door to his wife. He took the cue.

Lucia had been walking fast; there was colour on her cheeks, she breathed hard. But I saw circles beneath her eyes, the tremulous droop of the mouth.

"I went for a long walk" she said. "I had no idea the early morning could be so lovely."

Then, a faint sound from the inner room arrested her attention, and her lips parted.

"Aunt Minnie, who's here? Oh! he's dead!" she cried. And, like any heroine in the Movies, she went down in a heap.

Hugh staggered in. He had been a sick man, but he was very fit and well now as he stooped and put his arms about her.

"Not dead, girlie. Very much alive, in fact. Why, sweetheart," as he turned her face to his, "what is the matter?"

She clung to him, but she looked at me. Aunt Minnie, did you—tell me the truth?"

"Not all" I answered. Her eyes went very round, but a radiant smile made her the Lucia of old.

"You dear old—beautiful—fraud!" she gurgled.

Then, I slipped away.

DON'T let me catch you at this again!" warned Tom, slipping the harness from the panting pup, and stroking the trembling sides." He's only a little fellow, and you'll just ruin him if you hook him up too soon. Fair play, boy; don't you put a heavy load on a baby. That's what he is—a baby, eh, Bingo? Come on, Bingo, out of danger."

Tom made off towards the stable, with the pup ambling at his heels, while Charlie, in a very fury of anger, stamped his feet helplessly and impatiently. "Never mind, Smarty!" he screamed shrilly at his brother's departing back. "I'll get even with you for taking my dog away from me! You'll be sorry!"

"Oh, don't scare me!" mocked Tom, over his shoulder. "I won't sleep a wink to-night, worrying over your dire threats. But in the meantime, let Bingo alone. Time enough next winter for him to draw you in the sleigh. . . So remember!"

Charlie with a frown of anger upon his spoilt young face, stood moodily beside his handsleigh and the pile of dog harness. "I bet I'll make him sorry he meddled with me!" he vowed, giving a spiteful kick. "He's got a tender spot where I can always pinch him—Sylvia! Some way 'nother I'll pay him out, with Sylvia: He'll see—"

That was it—Sylvia. He pondered the idea deeply for days after Tom had forgotten it, so great are the grievances of childhood, and so little do we elders appreciate them. He counted that his brother's action in separating him from his beloved Bingo was not in the least overestimated when he planned to repay it by making trouble between Tom and Sylvia, whom he should more respectfully have named Miss Grey, his teacher. There really are children like this. They happen, with other accidents, in some of the best regulated families, where there is perhaps an older brother, like Tom, or worse still a sister or maiden aunt, who will systematically spoil the baby, and later on, urge strict but highly inconsistent discipline upon the saucy product of their thoughtlessness.

Charlie's resentment was kept aglow by the daily lack of his cherished playmate, for spoilt boy as he was, he knew enough to do what Tom told him. In particularly bad humor he burst into the living room one evening, and came upon Tom making elaborate flourishes and woven scrolls upon the big writing pad. Tom had been at Business College, and could produce wonderful curves and capitals, but he seldom indulged in idle amusement with them.

"Hullo!" said Charlie staring, and instantly suspicious as he saw signs of some confusion in his brother's face. "What's going on, now?"

"Oh—just practising a bit!" Tom hedged, sliding the writing pad over his work and proceeding to change the subject. "How is your home work to-night?"

"Fierce!" returned the youngster with bitter emphasis, while his watchful eyes observed that the suspicious-looking sheet of paper was about to slide to the floor. "I don't see any use in payin' teachers to teach, when they only make a fellow learn it all, himself, with home work. She ain't any good, anyway!" he flung out, for the simple joy of seeing the red rise in Tom's face.

"Sit down and get at it!" commanded the young man, pushing him into a chair with an energy which was sufficient to send the paper down below the table, when Charlie skillfully dropped his geography upon it. "Sit down—don't be a piker. Home work is good for you."

Charlie grumbled a bit, but presently went to work, and of course retrieved the paper at his earliest opportunity, and it made his eyes gleam. "Miss Sylvia Grey" was written in Tom's most elaborate hand. Oh joy! What a find! He laid it away carefully, in his most secret hidie-hole, until opportunity should come for its use.

It Never Did Run Smooth

Next day Tom, driving down the school, caught up with Miss Grey on her way home.

"Won't you have a ride?" he asked her, hopefully and Sylvia, with a shy smile, accepted the invitation, and presently found herself warmly tucked under the heavy robe. By the way, it was somewhat remarkable that Tom never used that robe except on occasions when there was a chance that this same young lady might be induced to share it with him. Infer what you please from that.

They talked lightly, in spite of some constraint which rose partly from the girl's self-defensiveness against mankind, and partly from the young man's dread of being overbold too soon. But nothing could constrain the led questioning eyes met his in surprise.

"I want you to go to it—with me," said Tom rather huskily.

Her hand slid out from his, into the security of her muff, and a flush that was wholly adorable flamed over her face.

"Think it over" he said hurriedly, afraid lest she was about to decline.

"I'll see you again in a day or so, and you can let me know what you think about it."

Drawing back the robe, he helped her carefully down from the buggy, still uncertain whether he had offended her, or whether he had let her understand how very much he cared!

"Thank you," she said in a low tone, and left him like a drifting worshipping light in his eyes which spoke to the wild rose flush in her cheeks! At last, as they neared her boarding place, he halted the horse and jumped down to help her from the buggy.

"There is a concert at Gower's Corners on St. Valentine's night," he said, holding the lines in one hand while the other lay upon the red robe, reluctant to let her out.

"I heard about it," she murmured with lowered eyes. The warm breath hurried from her parted lips, and she laid a small gloved hand upon the edge of the robe as if to indicate that she was but slightly interested in the subject—was in fact, much more concerned about descending from the buggy to the scant snow of the road-side.

For an instant of daring, his swift hand covered hers, so that her start-shadow. She sped into the house and upstairs to her cold little room where, well back from the window, she watched him driving on down the road. "How kind he is to me!" she thought wistfully. "I—I wonder if I might go! I would like to—indeed I would!"

SHE looked down at the hand which his own had covered, and sighed a little. Teaching in the country is sometimes a lonely business—and she was one who made few friends anyway, being sensitive and timid, and miserably conscious of every petty shaft of gossip and criticism aimed in her direction.

The days went, but with no sign of Tom. He was, in fact, deeply occupied with the killing and marketing of two "bunches" of fat pigs, which seems a very commonplace excuse for overlooking the claims of Dan Cupid, but it is not the purpose of this truthful narrative to offer any disguise for such matters.

At last came the day, and still Tom had not appeared to enquire further about Sylvia's wishes concerning the concert at Gower's Corners. Even the least observant scholar knew, before five minutes after nine, that something was amiss with the teacher. Her swiftly altering color, her hasty breathing, and a certain mistiness about her eyes indicated distress of some sort. Yet she had been her usual quiet self when she entered the school and hung up her wraps; had been composed and severe when she sat down at her desk. Then—

Charlie, watching keenly, had seen the lovely color flood her face as she spied the writing on the paper wrapper of the small flat parcel. How did she know the writing so well? He made a mental note of the point, even as he exulted inwardly over the stricken look that curtained her eyes when she removed the outer covering and comprehended the monstrosity within. Her gaze went back to verify the identity of the address upon the wrapper. No mistake. She knew who had written it, as certainly as if she had seen him do it. . . Charlie hugged himself in satisfaction.

No doubt the day was difficult for the pupils—it was one long strain to the teacher. Wearily she dismissed the school at four o'clock, and stood in the doorway listening until the last chattering footfall had ceased to hammer upon the heavy frost-bound silence, and the last shout was swallowed up in the enveloping cedars. Then she closed the door and went back to her desk.

From the drawer she took the cause of her misery—a Valentine crude, to the verge of vulgarity, it roused in her a feeling of hurt, a deep sense of affront. This was what he had seen fit to send her! A rush of hot resentment swept her almost to tears. How could he! How dared he! She had thought so well of him, had admired his manly sincerity and gentle courtesy—and yet he had been capable of this! Any man who could send a girl such a daub as this must indeed be low-bred and coarse. Faugh!

She pushed away the paper in which it had been wrapped. There was no mistaking his handwriting—she had seen it often in Charlie's books. Perhaps he had been pleased with himself as he made those intricate capitals and flowing letters—"Sylvia Grey"—perhaps he had laughed with amusement to think how easy it was to capture her fancy! The girl's head went down upon her arms, and a homesick, helpless sob rose in her throat—the hurt was very keen.

The door opened and closed briskly, and she raised her head, startled, to meet Tom's eager glance as he advanced towards her, towering above the empty desks.

"Sorry I couldn't manage to get a word with you before—" he was beginning, when the sight of her unhappy little face made him forget what he had started out to say. "Why—what's wrong? Are you sick?" he asked in genuine concern.

She turned away silently, twisting her small hands together, furious with herself for letting him see that he had hurt her.

"Sylvia!" he begged, coming close to the desk, and leaning across it to look into her averted face. She pointed to the door with trembling finger.

"Please—shut it after you—when you go out!" she asked in strangled tones.

"You're sick!" he declared, ignoring this. "Let me take you down to Mrs. Garry's in the sleigh—it's right here at the gate."

"No!" she cried out piteously. "Only go away and leave me alone!"

"Not until you tell me what's wrong," he declared, much perturbed. "Some one has been saying things—talking spitefully—"

Blaming It On The Movies

By Jean Graham

THERE is a comfort known to every Daughter of Eve or Son of Adam—and that is: "having someone to blame it on," when life goes wrong. Heredity is the usual excuse, and our grandfather's quick temper, our great-aunt Maria's rheumatism and wretched nervous system are resorted to, when we wish to account for our ailments and irritability. There has been much talk lately about waves of crime, and truly there has seemed to be more than the usual number of bandit attacks in these days of unemployment and general unrest. Such "waves" are decidedly awkward, both for individuals and the police force, and threaten to overwhelm the safety of the community. Then, those who consider it their business to account for everything arise to explain why there should be so many daylight robberies and motor bandits. The cause of this wave of crime, they say, is attendance at the movies.

About a quarter-of-a-century ago, when a boy stole from a till or committed a burglary, his crime was attributed to devotion to the dime novel. No allowance was made for individual perversity or human tendency to err. The dime novel and the writer thereof were all that was needed to make highwaymen, pirates and thugs of decently-bred youngsters.

In spite of this policy of "blaming it on the movies," the theatres where the stars of superlative loveliness are shining, where the heroes of superhuman strength are performing feats of daring, are crowded, afternoon and evening—and the game of watching the movies goes merrily on.

There is no question about it:—a bad movie does more harm than a bad book. The reason is that a "picture" leaves on imagination and memory an impression more vivid than the printed page can convey. The psychologist and the physician assure us of this—and the poet, Tennyson, puts the fact tersely in the line:—"Things seen are mightier than things heard."

The discussion recently going on in the United States, regarding the morals of the movies, seems to take it for granted that the producers are determined to give the public what it wants—or what it thinks it wants. If we may judge from some of the productions, those who send them forth have a very low estimate of public taste and ethical standards. There are companies, however, that may be regarded as "almost authoritative" in the class and manner of their productions. These companies stand for clean and wholesome plays and mean, in the movie world, what certain manufacturers do in the realm of industry.

When the public professes to be shocked by any particular performance, there is one consistent action—and that is protest. Let the theatrical manager, the producer and everyone else concerned know that you do not demand mud pies in the movies. It is all very well to say with a shrug: "Who cares for a protest? They think the public want that kind of thing." This attitude is not in accordance with the facts, for most managers or producers would heed a host of protests from those who want clean diversion. Censorship has not, as yet, proved highly successful, but it is an attempt to eliminate what is generally deemed objectionable.

There is a great difficulty in the way of censorship, as revealed in the United States, where what is approved by one set of censors may be wholly condemned by another. In the course of this diversity and in the expedients which some censors have resorted to, in order to "moralize" scenes to which objection has been made, there has arisen enough absurdity to make a whole series of Gilbert-and-Sullivan operas. To quote Tennyson again, "the common-sense of most" will undoubtedly save the censor situation.

THIS fact must be remembered that we have just begun to realize what can be done with the moving picture. Twenty years from now, I believe, we shall look back on this year as a comparatively crude period in movie development. The appeal of the movie is great and irresistible. If we may be Irish and paradoxical, the movie has come to stay. It satisfies the human craving for entertainment;—and it remains for the public to say what kind of movie it wants.

In educational work it can be of incalculable value. Do you remember how dry-as-dust some of the old geography lessons were? I was fortunate enough to have for several years a teacher who had a great gift for making history and geography live. I remember we had a lesson one day on the coal areas and the teacher brought with him to the class-room some pictures he had colored himself, showing the work in the mines. It was an easy step (geologically) from coal to diamonds and we had a wonderful illustrated lesson on the scenes of diamond industry which I do not think any member of that class forgot. I do not say that the picture can take the place of the text-book, but it will hardly be questioned that the picture can enforce and illuminate the teaching which otherwise would be difficult to grasp and remember. There is no royal road to learning; but the way which is brightened by pictures is more easily trod and will be remembered longer than that which is unnecessarily stony. The use of the moving picture in the class-room has just begun. Its development will mean a saving of time and attention and an increased appreciation of certain subjects that should make for better-educated citizens. Some of those who think that school should not be regarded as anything but a scene of discipline may see danger in making the lessons really attractive; but only those who are of the stern class described as those extreme Puritans who objected to bear-baiting, (not because it hurt the bear, but because it pleased the spectator) will be disposed to doubt the place of the movie in the classroom.

The movie has also been found acceptable in the Sunday School halls and in the church entertainment. It has familiarized the pupils, as no other agency could, with scenes in the Holy Land and in other Eastern realms. The East of to-day has changed little in some respects from the East of nineteen centuries ago. Hence the student may learn a great deal in picture of conditions which make plain many a parable. The picture play or exhibition cannot take the place of the teacher; but it can help pictorially in making the lesson real and appealing. The wise instructor will know how to use the movie or cinema element in the day's exercises and will not let it overshadow other features—for the Sunday School is something more than a movie show—or it has no reason for existence.

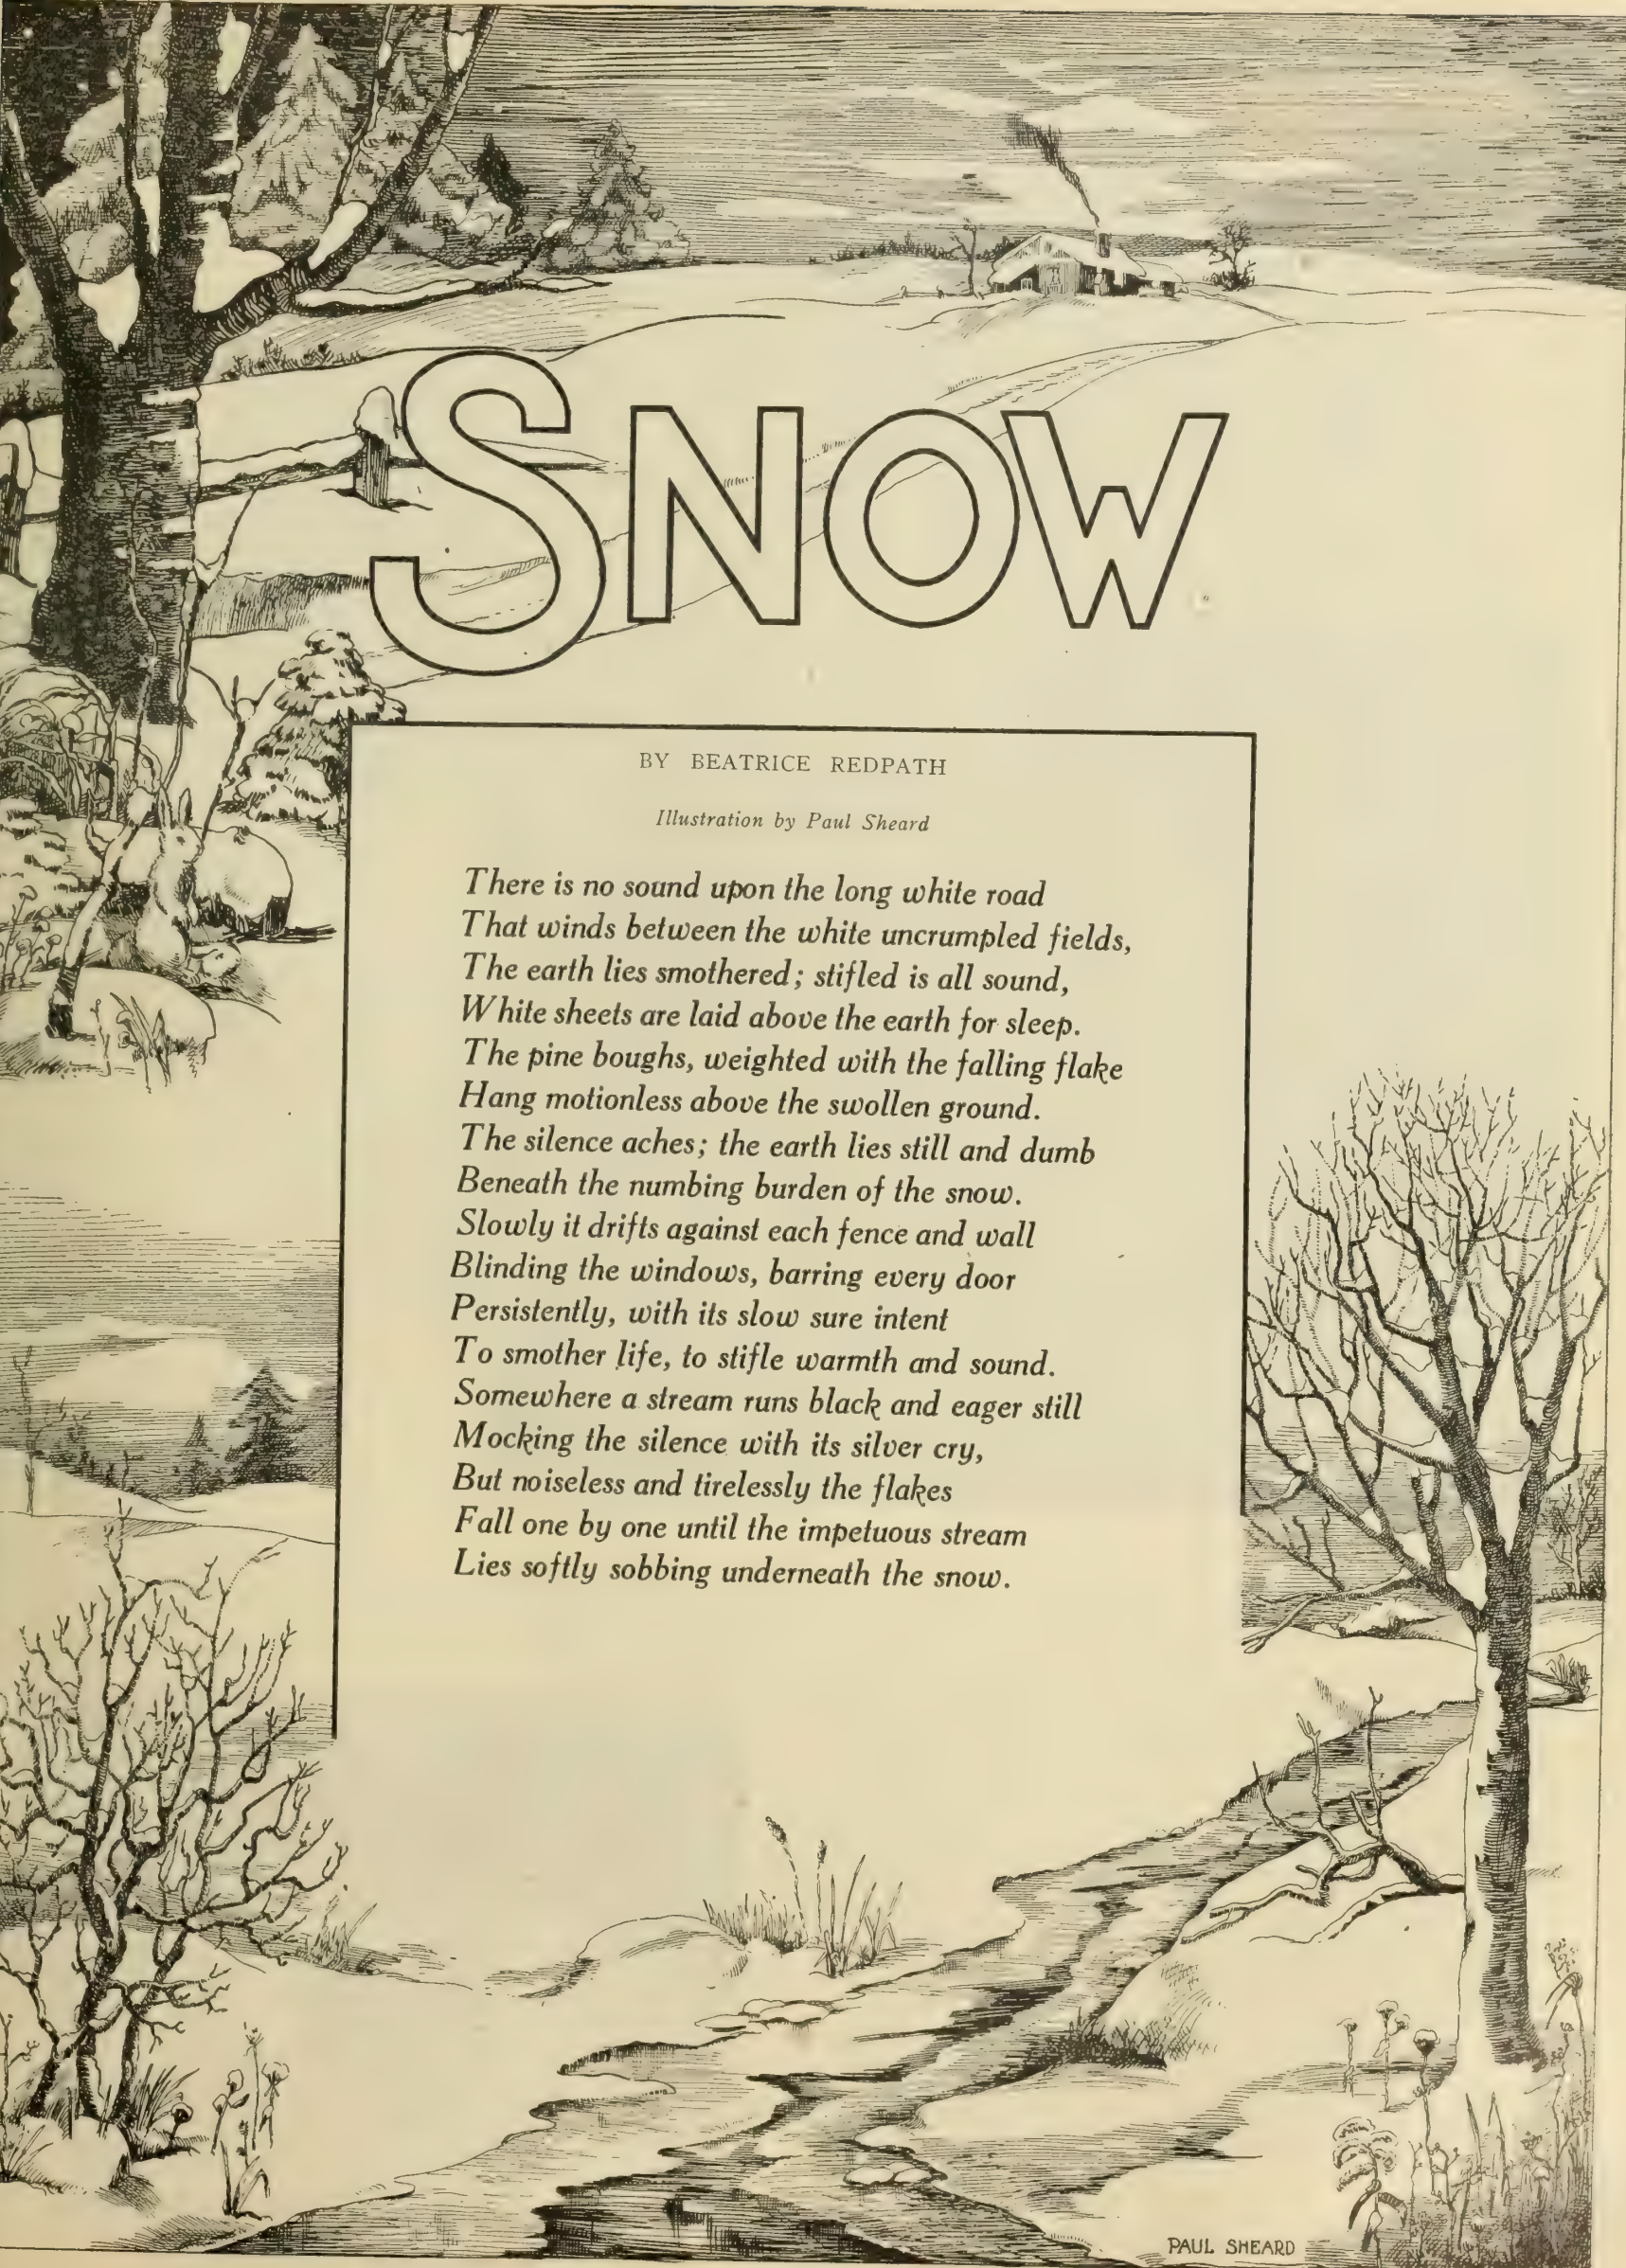

If the interest in the "pictures" has sometimes seemed excessive, let us remind ourselves that the cinema is, as yet, very young. It has made enormous strides already, by way of "growing up." In fact, there is no other modern alliance of art and industry that can show such rapid growth or such an increase in use of the finest means of attaining its ends. There is, to be sure, the "cheap and vulgar" movie—and, until the public shows a taste for better things, this class of production will be with us. However, there has always been the "cheap and vulgar" drama, and there has been the vulgar music, also. Wherefore, let not a nation that spends millions a year in chewing-gum have much to say about the third-rate movie. The

BY BEATRICE REDPATH

Illustration by Paul Sheard

*There is no sound upon the long white road
That winds between the white uncrumpled fields,
The earth lies smothered; stifled is all sound,
White sheets are laid above the earth for sleep.
The pine boughs, weighted with the falling flake
Hang motionless above the swollen ground.
The silence aches; the earth lies still and dumb
Beneath the numbing burden of the snow.
Slowly it drifts against each fence and wall
Blinding the windows, barring every door
Persistently, with its slow sure intent
To smother life, to stifle warmth and sound.
Somewhere a stream runs black and eager still Mocking the silence with its silver cry,
But noiseless and tirelessly the flakes
Fall one by one until the impetuous stream
Lies softly sobbing underneath the snow.*

THE SHERWOOD FORESTER

SUMMER times were meant to wander through, summer hedges to rest beside, and the forest to be a summer playground. There was a clear sky over the English countryside, and a cool freshness here at the edge of the forest that once was "merry Sherwood."

Stretched out in the shade of a great beech lay a fair-haired boy of nine or ten, with hands clasped behind his head. A little girl sat near, with chestnut curls, but the same eyes of deep blue as those of her brother, to whom she was explaining:

"And, Hugh, their suits were all of Lincoln green; and Little John was the tallest, and Friar Tuck was the funniest of them all."

But here in Sherwood forest, The first gleam of the morn, Are heard the merry shouting, The call of hunting-horn.

Who fares abroad so early, Through leafy glade and glen? 'Tis Robin Hood of Sherwood, And all his merry men.

Beyond, and in front of the children was a space, clear of trees excepting one giant oak, near which was a camp fire. There were men about the fire, a dozen or more, and the one who had just been singing now rose and said:

"'Tis hard indeed, to have to be a stay-at-home, even though that home be under the greenwood-tree."

"You may as well be content," them. The arrow of Little John was forgotten, and, back under the great oak, time passed quickly for Ruth and Hugh. There were stories of the greenwood, of the deer, and best of all, tales of Robin Hood himself. The men of Sherwood sang their songs for the children, and they learned of the fairies who made their home in Sherwood, and the gnomes who lived beneath the great oak.

It drew near sunset, and Little John said that he would take the children back to the wood's edge, but first, here where it was safe, Hugh might blow his hunting-horn. A clear full note sounded through the forest, and to the surprise of all, there was an answer. Soon there was a shout, and the tall, bearded figure of Robin Hood himself appeared. It seemed shining, and the branches of the beech-tree gently swaying above them. Little Ruth's blue eyes were still dreamy as she looked at her brother and said:

"And Little John is the tallest, and Friar Tuck is the merriest."

"And, listen, listen, Ruth," said Hugh, "it is the wind of the arrow."

And above them the wind of Sherwood sang:

I'll sing a song of Sherwood,
Of Robin and his men,
Of baron, king, and castle,
Of olden days again.

I'll sing a song of Sherwood,
Of brook, and branch, and breeze,
Of dancing forest-fairies,
At night amongst the trees.

I'll sing a song of Sherwood,
While leafy branches stir
To listen to the singer,
The Sherwood Forester.

GRIMMER GOES TO BED AGAIN.

THE snow was deep around the trunk of the old elm, gray clouds hung dense and low, and there was no wind. It was not the cheeriest of mornings, but a most important one for Grimmer the woodchuck.

The smooth surface of the snow-drift was broken, Grimmer's nose appeared, followed by the rest of him in his brown bristly coat. He sat up, stretched himself, and blinked sleepily, then, remembering what day it was, he put his nose up in the air and said to himself:

"Why it's Candlemas, and I had nearly forgotten about it. It's as cloudy as can be just now, and if the sun does not shine to-day so that I can see my shadow, I am supposed to go back to bed and sleep for another six weeks."

"But I'm not going to do it continued the woodchuck "I'm up and out of bed now, and I'm going to stay up whether the sun shines or not."

The sun did not shine this candlemas, the woodchuck did not see his shadow, but Grimmer did stay out of bed. For eleven days he wandered around sleepily, for the weather was cold and often stormy. That night the bristly fellow went to bed as determined as ever to pay no attention to the shadowless Candlemas.

Others of the woodland people had been watching the woodchuck, teasing him for his sleepiness, and joking among themselves. The next morning was that of Saint Valentines Day, and when Grimmer looked out of his doorway he found that the postman, Snuffler, the cottontail, had called and left him a fine lot of valentines. Grimmer was as pleased as could be to get them all, until he opened the last and largest valentine. Then Grimmer snorted, for on a broad, white sheet was a funny picture of himself, and underneath it these words:

The tall, bearded figure of Robin Hood himself appeared

"Oh, it must have been grand, Ruth, for Robin Hood and all his merry men to have the forest for their home."

Little Ruth moved over to the tree, resting against the crook of one of the gnarled roots. It had been quite a walk from the farm house that was their home, and here in the shade there was nothing to disturb the quiet save the soft singing of the breeze as it played amongst the leaves of Sherwood. So, there in the summer afternoon, from day-dreams Hugh and little Ruth fell asleep.

It may have been the land of dreams, but it was still Sherwood forest. Ruth and Hugh walked, hand in hand, beneath great oaks and along forest paths roofed over with leafy branches. Squirrels were everywhere about, the birds sang, and a doe, with a white-spotted fawn by her side, watched them, unafraid.

As they walked onward they could hear voices, then, as they came to the top of a little rise in the path, they heard the clear, deep voice of some one singing:

The king within his castle,
The baron in his keep,
The sheriff—he of Nottingham—
They still are fast asleep.

said a comrade "none may stir abroad to-day, for Robin Hood will have it so."

"Idleness ever brings grumbling," said the deep voice, that of a tall man, whom the children somehow knew to be Little John. "Listen," he continued, "he who can speed an arrow farthest shall have a journey to the border of the wood and back."

"There was a stringing of bows, and a choosing of arrows. Then came a twanging of bow-strings, the whistle of sped shafts, and shouts of surprise. Each arrow which had been shot had flown just the same distance as the others. It was the same three times; then Little John, who had not picked up his bow, laughed and said:

"Good bowmen all, and no one wins because none thought to wet a finger to the wind." So saying, Little John drew his long-bow, and pointing half-upward, let his arrow fly to where the wind was tossing the tree-tops. Here the breeze caught the feathered shaft, and carried it on and on, until, before it fell, it was beyond the sight of the archers.

There was a rush to see how far the arrow had flown, and so it was that the men of Sherwood found the children who had been watching to Hugh and little Ruth that, long past sunset, Little John took them both, one on each arm, and journeyed back to the wood's edge.

Hugh awoke to find the sun still

Whenever soap comes in contact with the skin—use Ivory.

Ivory Soap comes in a convenient size for every purpose

Small Cake

For toilet, bath, nursery, shampoo, fine laundry. Can be divided in two for individual toilet use.

Large Cake

Especially for laundry use. Also preferred by many for the bath.

PEOPLE of refinement have much the same ideas no matter where they live. It is not surprising, therefore, to find Ivory Soap all over this country in homes where good taste and good sense prevail—from the most luxurious households to the simplest.

No better soap can be made, because Ivory includes every one of the seven essentials that soap can have. Its abundant lather cleanses thoroughly. It is so pure and mild that it cannot harm anything it touches. It rinses so completely and easily that the first dash of clear water carries away soap and dirt and leaves the skin feeling smooth and soft. It is white and fragrant, therefore pleasant to use. For economy and convenience "it floats."

For all these reasons Ivory is not only ideal for the toilet, the daily bath, the shampoo and the nursery, but is also completely satisfactory for fine laundry and for all housework where soap comes in contact with the skin.

Table talks

By Mrs. Knox

If you're tired of the same old things

SOMEONE remarked to me at the tea table that she was tired of canned fruits and did not know how to give them an original touch. I was sure I could help her, and together we went through my booklet, "Dainty Desserts."

"Why, Mrs. Knox," she exclaimed, "I never knew there were so many different desserts in the world. I had no idea you could combine canned fruits with Knox Sparkling Gelatine in so many unusual ways—not only in desserts but in salads as well! I'm going to try this Cherry Sponge Dessert for dinner."

I learned afterwards that she and her family were so pleased with it that I am publishing the recipe here.

CHERRY SPONGE

$\frac{1}{2}$ Envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cup cold water. $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups canned cherries.
1 tablespoonful lemon juice $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar.
1 cup canned cherry juice Whites of 2 eggs

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in hot cherry juice. Add cherries, stoned and cut in halves, sugar, and lemon juice. When mixture begins to set, add whites of eggs, beaten until stiff. Turn into mold, first dipped in cold water, and chill. Garnish with whipped cream, sweetened, and flavored with vanilla, and chopped cherries.

Other canned, "put up" or dried fruits may be substituted for the cherries.

There is something very sociable about the chafing dish. It is to be recommended for those who live in rooms or elsewhere, where it is difficult to get tasty dishes. It is also invaluable for cooking special dishes for the sick and convalescent.

A chafing dish generally consists of four parts, the framework in which the lamp is set, the lamp, the hot water pan with side handles which rests on the framework, and the blazer in which the food is cooked. Cheap alcohol should not be used in the lamp, the best is none too good, for it will not smoke or smut.

For Onion Rarebit

The hot water pan must be always used where slow cooking is required for creams, sauces and rarebits. Fill the pan one-fourth full of hot water, if handy, otherwise with cold, covering closely until hot. For frying and broiling remove the hot water pan and place the pan near the blaze.

The chafing dish is generally used on the table on which the meal is served, and the food is helped directly from it. Garnishing has little or no part.

There is nearly always a certain amount of preparation required for chafing dish cookery. All the different ingredients should be measured and prepared as much as possible beforehand, then put into small cups or bowls in readiness.

Following are recipes which are adapted to different occasions.

Onion Rarebit. Boil two large onions in the hot water pan, drain and chop them, then put them in the blazer with one tablespoonful of butter, one-half cupful of milk, salt and paprika to taste, one teaspoonful of made mustard and one-half cupful of grated cheese. When creamy, pour it over thin crackers and serve.

Mushrooms With Bacon. Wash and peel fourteen mushrooms, and cut them in pieces, or use the canned product. Remove the rind from one-fourth pound of bacon, and cut it in small pieces. Heat the blazer of the chafing dish, put in the bacon and cook it for two minutes, then add seasoning of salt, pepper and paprika, one-half cupful of stock or water and one tablespoonful of flour, stir and cook until thick, then add the mushrooms, and cook for a few minutes longer. Another Method. Prepare one-half pound of mushrooms and cut them in pieces. Melt one-fourth pound of bacon cut in small dice in the chafing dish, put in the mushrooms, and pour over one-half cupful of boiling water, season with pepper, salt, and a pinch of powdered nutmeg, cover, and cook slowly for fifteen minutes. Then add one-half teaspoonful of lemon juice and one-half cupful more of boiling water, make thoroughly hot, and serve with croutons of fried bread, or fingers of toast.

Cold Meat Mince In Chafing Dish. Chop one cupful of cold meat, add two cupfuls of cold mashed potatoes, season to taste with salt and pepper and add stock or milk to moisten. Make into neat balls with floured hands, brush over with beaten egg, toss in fine bread crumbs and fry in hot butter in the chafing dish. Drain and serve hot. Or, put one cupful of thick sauce into the blazer over the hot water pan, add one cupful of chopped cooked meat, season to taste, and then cover until all is thoroughly hot. Serve with fingers of toast.

Cheese Fondue. Melt one tablespoonful of butter in the blazer and add one-half pound of broken or grated cheese, and stir until melted, serve them very hot, sprinkled with sugar and a few drops of orange or lemon juice.

Pass round sweet wafers with the bananas.

Omelette. Beat together four eggs, then add one cupful of milk, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of sugar and one-half teaspoonful of vanilla extract. Melt four tablespoonfuls of butter in the blazer, pour in the egg mixture and cook until set. To prevent it sticking slip a knife under the edge occasionally. Spread over with jam, or jelly, or marmalade and double it over carefully and serve hot.

Rechauffé Of Fish. Remove all the skin and bones from one pound of cooked or canned fish, and flake it into good sized pieces. Put these pieces on a plate, pour over them one tablespoonful of salad oil and one tablespoonful of vinegar or lemon juice, sprinkle over with one teaspoonful of chopped onion, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, salt and pepper to taste, and allow to stand for thirty minutes, turning occasionally. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in the chafing dish, add one-half cupful of tomato sauce bring to the boil, add the fish, and baste it with the liquid until thoroughly heated. Serve at once.

Chicken Livers on Toast. Wash and trim four chicken livers, dry them and cut them in small pieces, then toss them in flour, seasoning with pepper, salt and paprika. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in the blazer, put in the prepared liver, and cook it over the flame, stirring constantly until well browned. Then add one and one-half cupfuls of stock and mix well. Now place the blazer over the hot water pan, cover, and cook for fifteen minutes. Serve on toast or on croutons of fried bread. A few chopped olives may be added if desired.

Apple Rings. Choose four good cooking apples, peel, core and cut them in rings about one-third of an inch in thickness. Lay these rings on a deep plate, sprinkle them with sugar and powdered ginger or nutmeg, pour over the strained juice of one lemon, and allow to stand for thirty or forty minutes. Then drain the apples, and coat each ring with sifted flour. Melt one-fourth cupful of butter in the blazer and when smoking hot put in the apple rings and fry them until browned on both sides. Sprinkle with sugar and serve at once.

Fried Bananas. Peel four bananas, split them lengthwise, and cut them across in four pieces. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in the blazer of the chafing dish, put in the bananas, and fry them over a gentle flame until sufficiently cooked. Then Every kitchen shelf should have its package of Gold Dust ready for helpful, every-day use. Look for the Twins on the package. Be sure it is the real Gold Dust you buy.

Shining, Spotless Kitchens

FOR Big Kitchens. For Little Kitchens. For every Kitchen—Gold Dust! Gold Dust—soft and soapy—and oh, so “sweet-cleansing!”

Here's what the matron of a Children's Home—a Home noted for its shining Kitchen and fresh, clean Dormitories—has to say about Gold Dust:

“Every Monday morning we make a soft soap of Gold Dust, using four heaping tablespoonfuls to every quart of boiling water. When cool, the ‘soap’ is ready for use. And it is so cleansing. So quick in sanitary results. So easy to clean with. With this Gold Dust soft soap every corner of our ‘Home’ is kept sweet and sanitary—and our big Kitchen spotless and shining.”

Gold Dust contains more soap than ordinary washing powders—makes the quickest, soapiest, most cleansing “soap jelly” you can use!

See! Gold Dust dissolves completely. That is why Gold Dust rinses away perfectly and leaves only wholesome cleanliness.

The Origin, Activities, and Possibilities of Women's Institutes in Ontario

By George A. Putnam, Superintendent, Toronto.

IN addressing the World Disarmament Conference, President Harding's message to civilization was: "We are met for a service to mankind. In all simplicity, in all honesty and all honor, there may be written here the avowals of a world conscience refined by the consuming fires of war and made more sensitive by the anxious aftermath." These words will be classed among the most important historic utterances for all time to come; but let us consider for a moment what the leaders of the Nations met for,—to determine upon a policy of ceasing to destroy and ceasing to kill. The task which lies before the Women's Institutes, however, and which has been their objective for many years,—conservation of life and service to humanity, in the home, in the community, and in the Nation,—is a still more important responsibility. To cease to kill, and to determine not to destroy is but one step removed from barbarity, while the task of the Women's Institutes is the highest ideal of organized civilization.

In the "eighties," some few years after the Agricultural College and Experimental Farm had been established at Guelph, the Ontario Government were seeking a means whereby publicity could be given the excellent work undertaken at that Institution; so the officials made a generous offer to the farmers whereby lecturers would be sent to them to give information on farming. The organizations formed in the various countries to co-operate in carrying on this work were known as Farmers' Institutes. Our legislators and our educators did not offer a similar service to the women, for their duties consisted only in caring for human beings. The clothing, the housing, the feeding of the boys and girls, men and women, did not directly increase the monetary returns, therefore were not considered as a responsibility of the Government. The women were permitted to attend the meetings planned for the farmers, for they had been doing their bit and were desirous of getting information bearing upon butter-making, bee-keeping, poultry raising, small fruit growing, etc., work that women can do, and in the great majority of cases do so well.

Interest in some of the things considered at the Farmers' Institute meetings resulted in a group of women in Saltfleet Township, Wentworth County, asking themselves why they should not form an organization for the discussion of their own particular responsibilities and their own work. When the suggestion was made at a Farmers' Institute meeting held on February 19th, 1897, to which the women had been specially invited, there was no hesitation in organizing a Women's Institute, and the men were most anxious to assist in whatever way they could. The objects of Women's Institutes as set forth at that time were:—"The Dissemination of knowledge relating to domestic economy, including household architecture, with special attention to home sanitation; a better understanding of the economic and hygienic value of foods, clothing and fuels, a more scientific care and training of children with a view to raising the general standard of health and morale of our people." This was added to in later years, as follows:—"or the carrying on of any line of work, which has for its object the uplifting of the home, or the betterment of conditions surrounding community life." The Motto of Ontario Women's Institutes is "For Home and Country."

We cannot overestimate the importance of the fact that from the beginning The Women's Institute followed a most effective method,—the utilization of local talent and resources at nearly all of their meetings, and secured specialists through the Department of Agriculture and from other sources for occasional meetings. The system of giving assistance to those who make an honest effort to help themselves was a wise proviso on the part of the Government in offering assistance to the Women's Institutes.

those in close touch with their activities as a most forceful factor in the development of the individual, in making for home efficiency, introducing co-operative methods, establishing high standards for community activities and providing facilities for education, amusement and social intercourse.

In addition to our public and high schools and colleges for the rising generation, we have a school for adults, the Women's Institute, a very broad, a very elastic and very effective Institution, throughout rural Ontario, which is something more than a teacher of facts to girls and women. It is an organization through which recommended methods are given the test of practical application under varying conditions by those who have everyday responsibility in the home and in the community. It is some-various departments of government service.

(2) Who are the teachers? The teachers consist of not only the members and other local talent, but also persons from outside who have had special training along lines of value to the Institute membership.

The discovery, utilization and development of local talent is one of the strongest features of the work.

In addition, the Department of Agriculture through the "Institutes Branch" furnishes lecturers and demonstrators on most liberal terms to instruct and direct in Domestic Science, in all its branches; Health; Agriculture; for Women, etc.

(3) Who are the pupils of this wonderful school? The first to be attracted are the women of responsibility in the home, and it is usually the efficient who are most anxious to gain additional knowledge. Then, we have the young women who are beginning to feel a sense of responsibility which will come to them in later years. Young girls, over fourteen, find that there is much that they can get and give in the Institute. One most pleasing feature and an evidence of the practicability of the programmes, is that the pupils never graduate. The longer one is identified with Women's Institute work, the wider the vision and the keener the interest, the greater the desire for knowledge and the opportunity for service.

(4) What is the course of study? While in the early days of the organization, food problems, clothing and the general welfare of the family in the home practically covered the field of activity, it was not long until the members recognized the fact that there was community housekeeping as well as the housekeeping and mothering in the individual home. So the programme of activity soon included a survey of local resources, needs and possibilities, embracing the schools, libraries, civic improvement, public health, social and recreational opportunities, local relief work, etc. No two branches necessarily follow the same programme; so the activities can be made very attractive and helpful, for there is elasticity sufficient to meet the needs, desires and ideals of any body of women.

The programme of activity extends from the minutest detail in women's work to grappling with the biggest community problems of the district. A programme to result in the greatest good must be adjusted to local resources, talents, needs and possibilities.

(5) What are the text books? The most important text book utilized by all the Institutes is that unwritten book of practical experience. Knowledge gained through practical experience by successful homemakers is much prized by the members. The Institutes, in their saneness make practical application of information and suggestions, whether in print, or by word of mouth, to the resources, capabilities and possibilities of the individual family and community. The printed textbooks consist of standard works of recognized worth along a variety of lines, including health, foods, methods of government, municipal, provincial and Dominion-

These are prominent workers in Institute circles, who will readily be recognized. Top row, left to right, Mrs. D. M. Sutherland, Toronto; Superintendent for Ontario, Mr. G. A. Putnam, Toronto; Mrs. George Edwards, Komoka, the recently-elected President for Ontario. Second row, left to right, Mrs. Alfred Watt, M.B.E., organizer in England; Mrs. W. T. Meade, Blenheim; Miss Emily Guest, Toronto; and Mrs. William Todd, Orillia, President for the Dominion.

The Institute was purely a home-makers' organization, but it was not long before the women of vision and earnestness saw that they had a community responsibility and opportunity as well as that relating to their own homes. There was another branch of house-keeping, community house-keeping, which needed their attention. The readiness with which the practical, efficient, experienced women of Ontario deal with problems of common interest, with unnecessary frills eliminated, is an example of efficiency which I have not seen duplicated; and my observation, based upon eighteen years' experience in co-operation with men's and women's organizations, is that women have the greater capability for organizing the resources of a community,—planning work, and effectively carrying out the plans made.

We have in Ontario an organization embracing at the present time nine hundred and thirty branches, with about twenty-nine thousand members, which is recognized by thing more than an academic and a technical school. It is a propagandist, an administrator, and a safeguard of saneness in community activities.

Let us ask and answer a few questions regarding this school for grown-ups:—

1. What is the governing body?
2. Who are the teachers?
3. Who are the pupils?
4. What is the curriculum?
5. What are the text books?
6. What are the methods of teaching?

(1) The governing body in the Institute consists of the officers, chosen by the members, who should be representative of all homes in the community. Each branch is in absolute control of its own activities, and the branches in a district, sometimes a whole county, sometimes part of a county, join forces for their mutual benefit, and to extend the work to new localities. Consolidation of the branches of a district, also facilitates their co-operation with the

Modern Ballads and Old Folk Songs

The Movement to Arrive at More Sincere Ideals in Popular Music

By Hector Charlesworth

From time to time I have alluded to the deep interest all musical scholars have been taking in the ancient songs and dance tunes of the British Isles; and to the treasures that have been unearthed by investigators. These enthusiasts have gone to the remote parts of England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales, to discover and copy down the folk ballads that have been handed down by word of mouth by peasant singers from generation to generation, for hundreds of years back. The reason these discoveries attract so much attention is that they have a human touch which modern machine-made balladry lacks. Moreover they reveal a traditional musical science among the British peoples, the origin of which no one knows. The modes and intervals employed in many instances are so different from those that have been in use in sophisticated circles for three hundred years, as to indicate a very ancient origin. It has been surmised by some that they come from ancient Greece and gradually penetrated to what used to be known as "The Western World" before America was discovered.

These are questions for the musical antiquary. What makes the old folk songs of vital interest to the ordinary music-lover of to-day is the raciness, color and sincerity that they reveal, both in humor and pathos; as well as the wonderfully quaint fancies they embody. In this they furnish a unique contrast to modern songs whether of the polite, sentimental variety or of the more vulgar, jazzy type, in which the thought and the wording is of the most commonplace description. The output of songs from the presses of music publishers both in London and New York is literally enormous, but it is a sad commentary on the inspiration of their authors, that not more than one lyric in a thousand attains more than a few months popularity and most of them are still-born. But there are numerous songs which have clung to existence for several decades by virtue of their touching or inspiring melodies, the words of which are commonplace and stupid. "Ballad concerts" and "ballad collections" are still a feature of English musical life, but it is clear that the ludicrous and artificial side of some of the most popular and enduring pieces is getting hold of the public mind. The serious composer of to-day who wishes to establish fame and popularity for himself, strives to get hold of real poetry worthy of a musical setting. The type of sentimental "ballad" dear to our grandmothers seems to be doomed as serious entertainment.

I recently read an article by a well known English critic, Percy A. Scholes, on "How to Kill the 'Ballad'." He held that one way was by ridicule. Its absurdity of words and its cheap conventionality of music invite laughter. One trouble of popular musical life to-day, he argued, was that the comic songs were so often sad, and the sentimental songs so often comic. The average "ballad" that issues from the press to-day is usually a sentimental rubbish song. But conditions are no worse to-day than they were forty or fifty years ago;—probably better, because the modern public of the cultivated order is taking the art of song more seriously than did that of the mid-nineteenth century. Our grandparents and great-grandparents had a few songs that are eternally beautiful, Beethoven's "Adelaide" and Mendelssohn's "On Wings of Song" for instance; but for one song like these, a thousand examples of trash passed current as good music; while the words, though intended to be taken seriously, look queer in cold type. Mr. Scholes, in the article I have referred to, mentioned an old popular ballad "The Pilot" which a good many readers must have heard. A nervous passenger is represented as breaking in on a pilot who is concerned with steering a ship through a storm. Most of us know what a real pilot would say to anyone who intruded upon the bridge under such circumstances but this was a very exceptional mariner, as the lines show:—

Oh, Pilot, 'tis a fearful night,
There's danger on the deep
I'll come and pace the deck with thee
I dare not go to sleep.
"Go down," the sailor said, "Go down;

This is no place for thee;
Fear not; but trust in Providence,
Wherever thou may'st be."
But the passenger became more importunate and apparently the Pilot decided to give him a real scare with these words:

"On such a night the sea engulfed
My father's lifeless form;
My only brother's boat went down
In just so wild a storm;
And such, perhaps, may be my fate
But still I say to thee
Fear not; but trust in Providence
Wherever thou may'st be."

The Pilot's assurances under the circumstances seem hardly logical; they seem to cast doubt on Providence as a guarantor of safety, but in days gone by this ballad used to be accepted at semi-sacred concerts as one of serious import.

A singular factor in the once-popular ballads of comparatively recent date was their constant allusion to tears. The word "tears" seemed to convey a superior claim to attention. Thus there is an old song with a really plaintive melody:

I cannot sing the old songs,
I sung long years ago
For heart and voice would fail me,
And foolish tears would flow.
But this sad lady went on to hope for a future time when she might venture upon them. Thus:
Perhaps when earthly fetters shall Have set my spirit free
My voice may know the old songs
For all eternity

It was a pious wish; but it would make a gloomy place of the hereafter; a heaven where everyone was free to chant the old songs of the period alluded to would indeed be a dismal place, even though comic selections were permitted.

THIS curious deluge of sentimentalism came over British song in the nineteenth century and we have hardly as yet lived it down. The popular ditties of the preceding century had more character and vigor. "The Lass with the Delicate Air" is for instance, a charming sketch of a dainty and ravishing miss; and "Sally in Our Alley" if you read it in its entirety, is a complete picture of the life and hopes of a London apprentice in 1750. Even a martial song like "The British Grenadiers" has no platitude or fustian, but is a straightforward, unvarnished description of how the soldiers who used the hand grenade went about their work. To put it roundly, the older ballads were real, not artificial, and in touch with humanity, even when they were excursions in quaint fancy; and the farther back we go the more of these warming qualities we discover. That is why world famous foreign composers like Brahms, Richard Strauss and Grieg evinced so much interest in British folk-song.

The latter held that such wonderful lyrics of Robert Burns were written for long existing tunes.

In England a field of astonishing richness was left untillied until the forties when Rev. Walter Broadwood, Rector of Lyne, Sussex, took down the words and music of a number of the songs that his parishioners had inherited from their ancestors.
Since his day the work has been carried on very systematically and it has been found that nearly every county in England and every section of the other parts of the British Isles has its own characteristic songs.
The variety of the English song is greater, owing to the remarkable clear that it was intended to voice the grievances of the poor against the oppressive rich, and their confidence that the balance would be altered in the hereafter. Lazarus is not merely depicted as neglected by the rich Dives or Diverus, but as persecuted with dogs and whips.

Angels minister to Lazarus at his death and bear him to heaven, and serpents come to torture Diverus. It must have been a favorite with Wat Tyler's band. Songs of love and courting were naturally very frequent, and they are all rich in natural touches that suggest reality. An old Somersetshire ballad which has become widely known of late years describes the wooing of "Young Herchard (Richard)." The inducements he makes to Jeeun (Jean) are very much on the plane of common sense.
I translate the last two verses from the dialect form:

For I've a pig poked in a sty,
As'll come to us when Granny do die,
And if you'll content to marry me
now,
Why father he'll give us his fine fat sow."

Dick's compliments were so polite
He won Miss Jean afore it was right
And when he'd no more for to say,
Why he gave her a kass and he comed away.

It is impossible to convey the jollity of this song as sung to the merry jig tune for which it was written.
There is one other very notable song from the same county "Hoein Tur-mits" in which the unknown author makes irresistible humor out of the troubles of the farm boy trying to keep the flies off the turnips. One of the notable of old sentimental songs is "A Bold Young Farmer," which seems to have gone through many forms. In fact one verse of it beginning "Go dig my grave both wide and deep" is part of a song which has been a favorite with cowboys in the West for fifty years, and it must have been brought to America by some wanderer who knew nothing about the folk song revival.

STRANGE refrains both dramatic and nonsensical are characteristic of all the old folk ditties. Young Richard's song for instance, has
"With my doombledum dollykin doombledum day" at the end of each verse. Very characteristic is the old song "Robin-a-Thrush" of which the first verse runs:

Robin he married a wife in the West
(Moppety, moppety, mono)

And she turned out to be none of the best.

(With a high jig jiggety, tops and petticoats.

Robin-a-thrush cries mono)

Mr. McInnes sings a very ancient and tragic Scottish harper's song describing the case of a girl murdered by her sister through jealousy and it has a double refrain, a lamenting wail "Edinbro, Edinbro" with the alternative line "Bonny St. Johnston stands on Tay." These refrains seem to have been used for musical pause and emphasis, to save resorting to meaningless repetitions of narrative lines.

The general characteristics of Scottish folk songs are better known than that of any other country, and

MR. CAMPBELL MCINNES

songs could only emanate from a very wonderful people.

In Eastern Canada of late the public has been indebted to a renowned British song-interpretater, J. Campbell McInnes for efforts to stimulate interest in the ancient songs of the British peoples. Mr. McInnes is one of many eminent musicians from abroad who have come to America since the war made things difficult for their profession in a financial sense, and in his earlier days was very closely in touch with the movement for the re-discovery of traditional song. During the past two years and especially this autumn he has given the public of Toronto and other cities many examples from an almost unlimited repertoire. The movement for the recovery of ancient balladry began in the eighteenth century with Rev. Dr. Percy, editor of the famous "Reliques" and Sir Walter Scott. The task of collecting and putting down in modern notation the tunes to which they were sung is of later date; although it should be said that the Scottish people have always conserved their national folk music and many of the mixture of ancestry, due to Roman, Danish, Saxon and Norman occupations. In one programme a few months ago, Mr. McInnes gave a long series of the old madrigals and lyrics of the time of Elizabeth and her immediate successors when music was a polite accomplishment, most of which were written for accompaniment by the lute. They showed much elegance and refined sentiment, and among the most interesting was a dirgelike composition on the subject of death said to have been written and composed by Queen Anne Boleyn, shortly before her execution. There was also a rollicking hunting song known to have been the work of Henry VIII. This courtly music has certain characteristics in common with the peasant songs:

—the aptness and sincerity and a truly individual character, since it resembles that of no European country of the time.

For real color the actual songs of the people untouched by the refinements of the court are remarkable.
There is one ballad, many hundred years old which Mr. McInnes sings, entitled "Lazarus" and it is quite they were speaking to. This was a patented safety invention of Mrs. Brown's.

But in any case, Vanessa would have been able to understand Mr. Mahoney. He wasn't painting her picture. It was Maud's. People had often wanted to talk to her before. That wasn't anything; they did the talking.

Mr. Mahoney, and Maud in the arbor, hadn't made anything clear to Vanessa. She would have to go farther; but this time she was going to find out.

* * *

WHEN she reached home she was informed by Martha that Miss Jane had come to see her mother; and she sat down in the dining room to wait until Mrs. Brown should be quite disengaged. Vanessa was perfectly hardened to the passage of conversations through the air over her head. Sometimes they were interesting; and as a rule she remembered them a long time just because she couldn't understand the connection and she wanted to. If she waited long enough generally she did. Mrs. Brown wouldn't have minded Vanessa's coming to speak to Miss Jane; but Vanessa avoided that lady whenever it was possible. Her devotion to Vanessa was too excessive to be borne. And it was all because she was the youngest. Miss Jane had been the youngest of her own family. She said that the youngest had the worst time of anybody. Vanessa was quite satisfied to wait in the dining room; and this is what she heard:

"Miss Eliza Hutchison says that already there is the most striking likeness."

"Extremely kind of Miss Eliza to be interested. I hope that Maud hasn't been troublesome to Miss Eliza or her sister."

"Oh no indeed! To look at Maud is pleasure enough for me, and should be for anyone. Her profile in church—dear me, it's very touching."

Mrs. Brown didn't say anything. Probably she looked at Miss Jane and smiled. Mrs. Brown was very sympathetic when she smiled; she didn't need to say anything.

"And little Vanessa. I take the deepest interest in little Vanessa on account of her being the youngest. Have you ever wondered what little Vanessa will be like when she is grown up? She has a look sometimes that I have thought quite sweet; what one might almost call promising?"

There was a gentle rustle of silk. Mrs. Brown was rising to take Miss Jane's tea cup from her hand. "If Vanessa is a good girl," said Mrs. Brown, "her mother will always be satisfied with her." One could never tell how much Mrs. Brown saw on the other side of a door!

Yet there had been more in Mrs. Brown's voice than that. She was an excessively peaceable woman; but no one could be allowed to discuss her children as if they might have been better than they were. "Vanessa," said Mrs. Brown, almost severely, "may possibly please more people than her mother when she is grown up, if they have taste." Then recollecting suddenly how frail a point of view this was for a mother, she repeated with greater emphasis than before that if Vanessa was good it was all she would ask. Miss Jane ached from the decision with which Mrs. Brown had shown her where she was wrong; but no one who was listening on the other side of the door could have told that.

"It's the only important thing, of course," said Miss Jane sadly, "but it does seem a little hard that the youngest should have to put up with just being good." So after all she did not need to ask her mother, and the listener wandered out into the garden to play a game with the waiting Benny's Pride.

Vanessa had found out. Oh my! Oh my! Maud was pretty, but she was the only one in the family. The matter would have to be dismissed from one's mind.

the examples which have been unearthed by the investigators, though they enrich song literature, conform to the well known modes of the Scottish war song or the Scottish love song always touched by an inimitable note of sincerity. It is perhaps Ireland that has benefitted most by the folk song movement. To the average person thirty years ago an Irish song, save in the case of some patriotic lyrics comparatively modern in origin, was a deliberately "comic" affair of no real significance. But research by Sir Charles Stanford and others revealed much beautiful music sung by peasants in lonely places and marked by a lovely feeling for nature. The popular poets of ancient Ireland assuredly knew the language of love, and their musicians had learned to give longing its most exquisite form. They were also rich in the most quaint conceits. Certainly the queerest and also in a musical sense one of the most charming songs I ever listened to runs precisely as follows:

Monday,

Tuesday,

Monday, Tuesday,

Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

Nothing more; but attend to the legend that it illustrates. A little man with a hump on his back was passing through a wood and heard the fairies singing "Monday, Tuesday" in sweet faint voices. Emboldened he joined in with them and to improve the song taught them another word "Wednesday." The fairies were so delighted at the lesson that they took away his hump. That is the story and as rendered by Mr. McInnes you first hear the fairies, and then the stranger's voice coming in, and then the fairies picking up the final word. The melody is of the most delicately suggestive character.

Indeed it is the appropriateness of the music to the text in all these ancient ditties that constitutes their greatest charm; and it is there that they put the modern commercial composer with his mechanical effects of emotion, to shame. No one knows just where they came from, but an old Sussex bell-ringer, who had more than a thousand songs in his repertory, which he sang solely from memory, when asked that question said: "Oh, give us the words, and God Almighty sends the tunes."

The Strange Story of an Arab Merchant

There is a tale in the Arabian Nights of an Arab merchant who, returning from a pilgrimage, seats himself by a spring in the desert to eat dates, the stones of which he throws in the air.

It so happens that one of these stones kills the son of a genie, and when the poor merchant is charged with the crime, he is overwhelmed. He had not imagined one could do so much harm with a date stone. This story, weird as it is, illustrates an every-day truth.

How few of us give sufficient thought to the consequences of our acts.

For instance, how many housewives realize the danger there may eventually be for husbands, children and themselves in the tea or coffee they serve at meal-time?

Any doctor can tell you that tea and coffee contain drug properties whose influence is to stimulate nerves, often producing sleeplessness, nervous irritation, and a general slowing down of efficiency.

Yet people are not dependent on tea or coffee for their meal-time drink. Thousands of former tea and coffee drinkers now use Instant Postum. They like the rich, full-bodied flavor of this pure cereal beverage and its freedom from harm, and they can make it in a moment in the cup by simply adding boiling water.

SEVERAL books of especial Christmas interest came to us too late for review mention in the December issue. Among these was "The Trail-Makers' Boys' Annual," (published by the Musson Book Company, Toronto, price $2.50). This is an exclusively Canadian publication, of interest to any boy, at any season of the year. Wherefore, if you know of a boy whose birthday demands a book gift, you cannot do better than invest in this chronicle of sport, adventure and all such activities as the young citizen would find of interest.

There is a tale with a touch of mystery in "The Old Mine's Secret," by Edna Turpin. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto.) This is a war-time story of young persons who do their "bit" in garden and Red Cross efforts during the great struggle. The scene of activity is The Village in Southern Virginia and the youngsters who play their adventurous parts are attractive sunnynatured little folk, who take a keen interest in the strife over seas. Of course, to the Canadian (whose country was in the war from August 1914) there is a note that jars in the occasional assumption that "America" did everything. When one considers the long tale of warfare from Mons to the close, the part of Belgium, France and the British forces would seem deserving of, at least, honorable mention. However, apart from this complacency, the story is highly enjoyable, and the reader is prepared to rejoice with Dick over the final discovery in the old mine.

Another tale of adventure is "Diantha's Quest," by Emilie Benson Knipe and Alden Arthur Knipe. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price $1.75.) This is a story of the Argonauts of '49 and is naturally liberally sprinkled with gold-dust. The account of the journey is highly entertaining and Diantha, herself, is a pleasing young heroine.

"Mary in New Mexico" is the title of an entertaining account of a young girl's experiences in a State which is full of historic and prehistoric attractions. The author, Constance Johnson, has a gift in writing about and for young people, and the present volume is another attractive picture of life in a rather unconventional course of travel, which includes an adventure with bandits and a golden reward. Mary and Dave are youngsters quite worth meeting. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price $1.75).

"Beggars' Gold," by Ernest Poole, (published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price, $2.00,) is an unusual story of a young New Englander, Peter Wills, who is possessed by a desire to go to China. He betakes himself to New York, becomes a school teacher and marries a girl, Katherine Blake, who had been born in Peking. Peter is a plodder with a dream behind all his toiling, and again and again the vision of China comes to him. He and his wife had befriended long ago a wonderful little Chinese boy called Moon Chao, who had gone back to the Orient. Just as Peter's career as teacher has met with disaster, Moon Chao comes back and urges them to return with him to Peking. There is a new life waiting for Peter and Kate in the East and we hope that Peking will fulfil their dreams. "Beggars' gold" is a piquant title,—and the moral of it may be found in the philosophy of William James or in an older teaching which says: "The Kingdom of Heaven is within you."

A book entitled "Sunny Ducrow," written about two years ago, became immediately popular, since the heroine was one of those persistently "glad" persons who are extremely stimulating—unless you are a reader who wearies of the perpetual smile. The author, Henry St. John Cooper, has written another book, "The Garden of Memories," (published by the Musson Book Company, Toronto, price $2.00.) The garden is in Sussex, the magic county of England, where ghosts of garden-lovers may easily walk, without making one afraid. This story is a most pleasing tale, with a touch of the supernatural which does not become melodrama, and a group of varied characters which play their modern parts in the ancient garden. The narrative, itself, never lags in interest and the reader finds many an unexpected turn to the romance of Allan and Kathleen—not to mention Betty. There is a gruesome touch in the grim crazy creature, Abram Lestwick, which gives the due thrill of horror to the story. But, pervading all, is the glory of that old garden where "there was no sound save the steady 'clip, clip' of old Markabee's shears and the rustle of the falling glossy green leaves from the ivied wall."

Padraic Colum is known as a poet and a writer of fantastic tales, far removed from the scene of everyday doings. If you are tired of stories of "temperamental" heroes, of the fiction of New York and Chicago, then you may find relief and refreshment in "The King of Ireland's Son," (published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price, $2.75.) This is a delightful book, beautifully illustrated and printed, with a befitting green cover. The narrative, which takes many a twist and turn, has, for its hero, a prince, who is the eldest son of King Connal of Ireland. Dear me, Ireland has fallen on evil days, when one considers her picturesque past and the kings who wore collars of gold. An Irish Free State sounds very dull, and that Spanish-American agitator, De Valera, is a poor thing, in comparison with King Connal and the land over which he ruled. Such adventures as befell the wayward Prince belongs to the realm of fabulous narration and are the source of infinite entertainment to all who have not lost the key which opens the ivory gate. Fedelma, the Enchanter's Daughter, is a delightful creature, the King of the Cats, is a fearsome ruler and what happens to Gilly of the Goatskin in the Town of Mischance is well worth learning. As for the wedding feast which closes the tale;—well, it is not every bride who has Greek honey, apples from Emain and venison from the Hunting Hill at the banquet. Also there is a charming book, by the same author, (published by the Macmillan Company, price, $2.25), "The Golden Fleece—and the Heroes who Lived before Achilles." The style is simple and picturesque, and the great men of old, walk the earth again as we

The Prince, the Pauper and the Golden Mean

By Walter A. Dyer

ONCE upon a time there lived a Prince who was very fortunate and very unhappy. He was the son of a King who, when he himself was a king's son, had married a goose-girl after a romantic wooing, and the Prince inherited certain tastes and mental twists from his mother that proved to be most upsetting. The Prince was heir to a great kingdom and vast riches. One day he would don the ermine, grasp the sceptre and mount the golden throne, where he would sit in state, surrounded by his counsellors, and receive the homage of subjects and ambassadors. But he had a ploughboy's heart in his breast, and he was unhappy.

The Prince was young and strong and handsome. His people loved him. In prowess with arms and skill in horsemanship he surpassed all the young men of the realm. But he liked not the royal forest and the jousting field. He had a gypsy heart in him, and he longed for the open road and the wide world. The Prince was betrothed to a Princess of a neighboring kingdom. She was tall and fair as a lily, and her hair was like spun gold. She was so virtuous that the witch under the hill had never discovered a flaw in her character. The two Kings had arranged the match, and the Prince had no rival. But he had a troubadour's heart in him, and he was unhappy.

At length he became so dissatisfied with his lot that he determined to set forth alone to see the world. Saddling his white mare one night, he muffled her feet and stole from the city. When the morning sun struck the plume on his hat he was far from the gates, and the dew was glistening on strange fields.

As he rode along he heard singing, and soon he overtook a ragged Vagabond.

"Why do you sing?" asked the Prince.

"Why does the lark sing?" responded the Vagabond. "I have no care resting on my heart, and so the songs must needs come forth."

"How did you lose your care?" asked the Prince, dismounting from his white mare and walking by the Vagabond's side.

"I never had any," he replied. "I have no home, no wife, no money, no duties, no destiny. Nothing is expected of me. No one loves me, and no one hates me. I have no thought but for one day at a time, and all night I sleep because I am tired. What is care?"

"I don't know," replied the Prince, thoughtfully, "but I have it. You are wise, I see. How can I get rid of my care?"

"Change places with me," replied the Vagabond. "Give me your horse, and your plumed hat and your silken doublet and your well-filled purse, and take my shirt and staff and old shoes. Take my joy, and give me your care. I would like to know how it seems; I will make a rare adventure of it." And he laughed heartily.

So the Prince gave him his horse and sword and doublet and purse, and set out on the road afoot, seeking happiness.

When the Prince's absence was discovered at the palace, a great hue and cry were set up, but the Prince could not be found. The King ordered his royal charger, and with his trusted knights set out in search of his son, but to no avail. After forty days they gave him up for lost.

When a year had rolled by, the Prince returned, footsore and battered, a sorry-looking beggar, and applied for admission at the palace gates. They drove him away thrice, but he persisted. Then they brought the dogs to set them on him. But the Prince's faithful hound knew him, leaped joyfully upon him, licking his hands.

Then the Prince showed the old gatekeeper the birthmark on his left shoulder, just the size and shape and color of a ripe strawberry, and desired that the Queen be told of it. Doubtfully, the gatekeeper sent a messenger to tell the Queen mother, who came rushing out in all her purple robes and threw herself weeping on the Prince's neck.

So they made a great feast, for the Prince had come back to his own.

But soon the Prince was unhappy again, and one day he summoned his father's oldest and wisest counsellor.

"Why am I unhappy?" he asked. "I gave away my purse and my sword and my good white mare, but I got no joy in return. The stones hurt my feet, and the food I got sickened me. I met with dirty people who drove me from their low doors. And so I came back again. Now I am as I was before; why am I not happy?"

The wisacre thought a long time, and then he answered.

"You are half prince and half peasant," quoth he. "If you are very rich the peasant in you is unhappy; if you are very poor the prince in you suffers. You must seek a golden mean. Your father loves you, and will give you whatever you wish. Ask him for a hill and a valley in the outskirts of his kingdom. Ask him for flocks and herds, and honest peasants to tend them. Go there to live as the ruler of a little kingdom. Ask not for gold or for a court, only for those necessities which the royal part of you must have, and not for the things which a shepherd is happier without."

But the Prince scorned this advice. Such a life was too tame for his young blood. He was loath to give up again the luxuries to which he had been born. He did not know that they and care were the same. So, shaking his head sadly, he turned away.

LET us give heed to the parable.

Most of us either are princes or are trying to be. We are working to heap up for ourselves treasures on earth, and the labor of it is killing us. We become so entangled in the process that we even forget what we are working for. We think we are working for a future happiness; we believe we are climbing toward a heaven of joy and repose, and we are only piling an Ossa on a Pelion of care. Sooner or later we realize this, every one of us. To some the realization comes too late. We have grown too old, or have become too inalienably devoted to the false quest. We have formed a habit that we think we cannot break.

But for most of us it is never too late, if we will but think so. Don't you believe it? Have you despaired of ever finding release from the enthrallment that you have cast about yourself? Listen.

We must brush away the cobwebs and get down to first principles. In this world we must work to live. Even if we are born to the purple, we must work to live adequately. A workless life is a desecration. Nature abhors a drone.

Now, then, what are we living and working for? To gain happiness? To

IN the month of February, a certain pre-spring shabbiness comes over us. Unless we are so foolish as to try and rush the season, we are still wearing a winter hat and the velvet seems worn and the metallic lace sadly tarnished. The heavy suit begins to look rubbed and "used" and we do not approve of either gloves or shoes. Although the shortest, February is the most trying month of the year, save for the young and extra-strong who are fairly revelling in winter sports by the time St. Valentine sends his yearly card.

This general unkindness of the last month of winter extends to the face and the "tone" of the system. Before spring comes at all, we are ready to declare that we have the low fever which belongs to that season and are counting the weeks until the Easter holidays. We are willing to take a tonic and even regard dandelion tea—if we can get it—with favor. A doctor who was speaking the other day about the need in February for extra precautions against run-downness, said: "Our houses are not properly aired. Most Canadian women do not get enough out-door exercise in winter and, consequently, their faces are yellow or sallow before March comes."

The doctor was probably right about the lack of proper exercise for the Canadian woman. A woman who is a successful osteopath said the other day that she would lose many of her patients if they could be persuaded to take good walks. "Nevertheless," she remarked, "I continue to advise out-door exercise, even though I have little hope of the advice being followed."

This authority was of the opinion that most women are lazy in the matter of exercise and would prefer playing bridge for the afternoon to taking a good tramp over the snow. The country girl, on the contrary, is usually so busy that she does not get time for the winter out-doors that she should have. In this matter of exercise, the girl of the British Isles is far wiser than we in Canada, and that is one reason why freshness of color—a natural rose, too—lingers so much longer with the English, Irish or Scottish girl than with us. To this freshness of color, however, it must be remembered that the salt air contributes.

The woman who wishes to keep a "February face" which is not spoiled by the attention of Jack Frost needs to remember that, before going out into the cold air of out-doors, she should protect her skin, by a judicious touch of cream, from the tricks which the thermometer may be disposed to play. The woman who is indifferent as to whether she presents a weather-beaten aspect is hardly to be found these days. Woman may be dressing in more mannish style—especially for sports and out-door life—but she is more assiduous than ever in the care she bestows upon her countenance. There is nothing more ageing to the skin than a touch of frost, unless it be a severe sun-burn. So, if we are going to wage war on the February forces which would destroy whatever of roseleaf complexion we have left, it would be well to keep the cream jar well-filled with whatever "first aid" suits us best. Don't use glycerine if you find it darkening to the skin. There are many women, however, who find that they get through the winter beautifully with the old-fashioned mixture of glycerine and rose water and a few drops of carbolic.

A busy housewife has written to ask if there is not some "simple little thing she can use after she has washed the dishes to keep one's hands from getting that shrunken look." The invaluable lemon may come in here, and have a bracing and astringent effect on the skin. Then there is plain, common vinegar, which may be kept in a bottle on the sink and which will give a reviving touch to the "dishy" hand.

THE LETTER BOX

An Easterner. So you wish to know what colors will suit you best. Of course, the most minute description—and even the photographs which you thoughtfully sent—are not quite the same as actual knowledge of the person who makes the inquiry. However, I should say that light grey, Belgian blue, a deep red or old gold would be becoming shades for you. The way in which you have your hair arranged in the "indoors" photograph should be becoming. You may wear it, if you wish, in the "bunches" over the ear which have been so popular in recent months. Do not draw the hair back tightly. You will discover that loosely-arranged hair is more becoming to your features. And, by the way, you should find white, or rather, cream color very becoming.

W. L. D. If the eruption is as distressing as you say, I think you need medical, rather than Vanity Box advice. Your description of the affliction makes me think that it may be traced to a disturbance of the digestion, rather than a skin "trouble." Care in the matter of diet is essential if you are going to be rid of such unpleasant spots. If they continue to be an annoyance, I should certainly have the advice of a physician concerning them. I have sent you the names of several creams, each of which has a softening and refreshing effect, but think that you will find the excess of acid in the system has much to answer for, in the matter of the blotches.

How to Make Your Hair Look Its Very Best

THE beauty of your hair depends upon the care you give it. And in caring for the hair shampooing it properly is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soap. The free alkali in ordinary soap soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why, everywhere you go, you find more and more women now using Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure and it does not dry the scalp, or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

It is astonishing how really beautiful you can make your hair look, by regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified.

The method is simple: First, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Rub the Lather Well In

TWO or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

When you have done this, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly, using clear, fresh water. Then use another application of Mulsified.

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair; but sometimes the third is necessary. You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean, it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean, it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

After all particles of dirt, dust and foreign matter have been loosened by the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, the next step should always be a very careful rinsing using only clear, fresh, warm water.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good, warm water, and followed with a rinsing in cold water. When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified Shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want always to be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage, and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

Mulsified is also splendid for children. Get them early into the habit of weekly shampooing with Mulsified and they will thank you for it in later years. For a luxurious head of hair is something every one is mighty proud of.

You can get Mulsified Coconut Oil shampoo at any drug store or toilet goods counter. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

When thoroughly clean, wet hair fairly squeaks when you pull it through your fingers

The final rinsing should leave the hair soft and silky in the water

Shampooing made a pleasure

Proper care of the hair made easy. Mulsified makes washing the hair both delightful and beneficial.

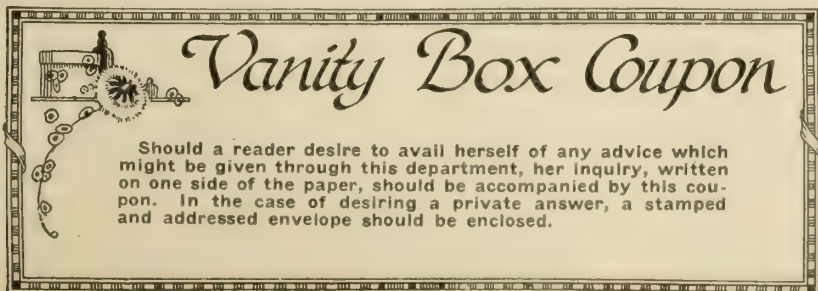

Won't make the hair brittle. Keeps it looking its very best.

Effective and Economical.

The Bridge-Keeper

By Frank H. Sweet

"NO, we have no work for you. We're only taking on fresh, young blood. I'm sorry, but you're too old," and with a half glance toward the white hair of the applicant, the speaker swung his chair back to the desk from which he had turned at the man's entrance.

"Do you know of any place where I can find a job?" the man asked, hesitatingly.

"No," curtly, "our company controls everything on both banks of the river. Still, there are a few cheap concerns on the other side where you might find a temporary job. What's your line?"

"Nothin', only to do odd jobs, sir. I've been on the sea most o' my life, an' never learned any trade exceptin' sailin'. But I'm handy."

"So they all say. Well, you can try over there; though, frankly, I do not think you stand much chance."

"No," gravely, "there don't seem much chance anywhere. I was on the other side before I came here, an' they said I was too old. Everything seems to hinge on one company, an' they want only young men and boys. I tried to tell 'em I'm not quite so old as my hair shows for, an' that I was ready to put myself up against as hard work as the strongest man they hired did; but no, 't wa'n't no use, they didn't want me. I've been off the sea sixty days now, an' ain't found a chance yet. I'd like to stay on shore the balance o' of my life, though," a little wistfully, "on account o' my grand-daughter. There ain't only me an' she. But it don't seem as if I can. I guess I'll have to go back to the water."

"I guess you will," abstractedly. "That seems your line."

The old man left the office and walked slowly down to the long bridge that spanned the river. He had come across on the train after stopping a day on the other side, for his ticket had read to this point and he had saved the bridge coupon. Now he would have to walk back over the bridge and on to his seaport home, twenty miles across the country to the coast. He had only taken just money enough to pay for the ticket, leaving the rest of their small hoard with his grand-daughter, for he had confidently expected to find a job in one of these busy towns and be able to send for her to join him. There was nothing left but to go back and remain with her a few days, and then seek a berth on some vessel.

But as he approached the centre of the bridge, he suddenly paused. There was a bar across and a turn-gate, and he understood what that meant. Before he could pass he would have to pay toll, and he did not have a cent. Beyond the gate and leaning against it was a boy of seventeen or eighteen, with his eyes fixed eagerly on a gesticulating crowd in an open field on the opposite shore. Evidently a ball-game was in progress there, and the youthful bridge tender was very much excited over it, for often his hands rose into the air and sometimes his hat, and once his voice echoed an enthusiastic cheer which came across the water.

THE old man hesitated, and then went to one of the bridge benches, very close to the gate. He had a right to come this far, and he would stay until night. Perhaps the bridge would not have a tender then, and he could pass; if it did, he would try to slip by. He had never tried to evade any obligation before, but he must cross the bridge and reach home as soon as possible.

Meanwhile the bridge tender was becoming more and more excited, and several times he started forward as though half inclined to forsake his post. Suddenly he noticed the old man sitting by the gate.

"Hello," he called eagerly, "going to stay here long?"

"Why, yes, quite a while, I think."

"Then you look out for my place a few minutes. I'll be awfully obliged," and without waiting for consent or comment the boy sped away toward the farther shore and the yelling crowd.

"Wait! Hold a minute!" called the old man after him; but the boy did not hear. His head was down, with his arms pressed closely to his sides; he was sprinting and oblivious of everything he was leaving behind. The old man went through the gate, his face anxious and perturbed.

"Whatever's to be done, I wonder," he muttered aloud. "I don't know the toll, and—good land!" as he noticed water through a narrow open space in the bridge and extending entirely across from side to side, "if it ain't a draw. How d' they open it? I hope no boat'll come till the boy gets back. He's crazy."

But he did not even think of deserting the post. That would not have been the man's nature. Keenly the eyes under the shaggy brows swept about in search of means of opening the draw in case of necessity; then a bicycle coursed swiftly across the bridge, and he turned to the gate.

"Good morning. A new man, I see," exclaimed the bicyclist as he passed through, and the old man felt a nickel slipping into his hand. That settled one problem. The toll was five cents. Then his gaze went back in search of the key to the bridge opening.

But he was a "handy man," who had lived on shipboard most of his life, and was accustomed to windlasses and screws and various means of shifting heavy weights. Soon the keen eyes discovered what they were after, and none too soon, for almost at the very moment came a vigorous "Ahoy, draw!" from up the river. A schooner was sweeping straight down upon him, under a full head of canvas. But though he had found the means, his hands lacked the dexterity of experience, and they fumbled with hurried unfamiliarity until there came a second hail, this time sharp and impatient. Then the bridge swung open and the boat shot through.

"Thank you, keeper," came a relieved voice from below. "I was afraid you didn't see me, and was on the point of tacking off to avoid smashing things. But I see you know your business."

The old man's face grew more tranquil. There were no people in sight on the bridge now, and no boats very near. He opened and shut the draw several times, allowing it to swing a few yards either way, until he felt that he had it under control; then he went to the tiny building which was the bridge tender's home and office, and found a broom. With this he went vigorously to work clearing away the litter that the boy's neglect had allowed to accumulate.

TWO hours went by, and in that time four boats had gone through and perhaps fifty people passed over the bridge; and at the end of that time the gate and draw and benches were as clean and neat as broom and brush could make them.

There were no signs of the boy, but the old man had scarcely given him a thought. He was at work now, and at just the work that was peculiarly congenial. The anxiety for the time being was gone from his eyes, and he went about the self-sought duties with cheery little snatches of sea songs breaking occasionally from his lips. Only once did he pause suddenly, in the midst of a breezy refrain, and that was when he glanced into the tiny house and realized what a cozy home it would make for himself and his grand-daughter.

The breeze was now refreshing, and there were several boats coming down the river together under full sail. He was in the very act of turning the draw when a carriage dashed upon the bridge, with another scarcely twenty yards behind it, and both evidently in a great hurry. The first would reach him considerably in advance of the first boat, with ample time to open the draw; so he waited, though he could hear the sharp "Ahoy!" of the boatmen.

It was now that his experience of winds and tides stood him in good stead. A swift glance, and he could have told to almost a second when the boats would reach the draw. He waited until the first carriage had swept across, and then, with a warning call to the other coachman, swung the draw open to the leading boat which was less than twenty yards away. After they had passed through he shut the draw for the second carriage.

The coachman was red and angry. "Look here, you bridge man," he cried, "what'd you shut us back for? We're in a big hurry, an' could 'a' got through in another minute, an' there was plenty o'time. D'ye know who I'm a carryin'?"

"James! James!" came a stern voice from the carriage, "that is enough. The man did just right. I was watching. It was as fine a bit of calculation as I ever saw." Then, as the carriage came opposite the old man, "Let me—But hello! where is the regular keeper?"

"Why, sir, I—think he's gone over to the ball game, for just a few minutes," hesitated the old man.

"And left you to fill his place?"

"Yes, sir."

"You are an experienced bridge keeper, I see."

"N—no, sir, I never tried the work before this."

"U'm! Then you are quick to pick it up. The young man showed you about it, I suppose?"

"No, he—he was in quite a good deal of a hurry, an' just asked me to look out for the work. But I'm handy about pickin' up things. I've been on board ship most o' my life, sir."

"Oh, a sailor. That accounts for your quick judging of the boat's speed. You're a friend, or perhaps a relative of the young man?"

"No, I'm a stranger to everybody here. I've been looking for work, but couldn't find any. I was just—sittin' down here a while when the boy spoke to me."

"U'm, a stranger, and he asked you to look out for his job, and did not wait to tell you what to do. You said for just a few minutes I believe. Can you tell me exactly how long he has been gone?"

The old man hesitated—

"Well, ye see, sir," he apologized, "there was a ball game, an' ye know how boys are about such things. Ye mustn't be hard on him. I've done

THE new commander in chief of India, Lord Rawlinson, tells an amusing story of an experiment he once made to test the accuracy of oral messages.

Two hundred men, he says, I strung out at intervals of two paces. Then I gave a message to my adjutant, telling him to give it orally to the man at the head to be repeated from man to man down the line until it came to me at the other end of it. This was the message: "We are going to advance. Can you send us reinforcements?"

When it came back to me some minutes later it had turned to this: "We are going to dance. Can you send us three and fourpence?"

The children had an old-fashioned music box. Their music was the airs of all nations; and mother, in the room below the nursery, was shocked to hear "The Watch on the Rhine" played at frequent intervals. So she called the little ones down. "Helen," she said to the eldest, aged nine, "do you know what that tune you are playing so much is?" Before Helen could answer, up piped Billy, a lad of five. "Why, of course, mother, we know it's the Germans' song, but you see we play it when we're tired and want to sit down."

AN UNWISE SAW

"E don't never stop to think, Mrs. Pipsqueak; 'e was sawing a branch off a tree the other day, and he sawed 'isself off."
—The Tatler.

"It is so long ago," she says, "that I recall neither the player nor the play—only the part wherein the scene was spoiled. The hero said to me, 'Do you object to this cigar?' which he had already lighted and was puffing vigorously. 'No, no, no!' I answered, which was the cue for him to tell me the story of his life. He looked at me instead and said, rolling the cigar between his fingers, 'That, madam, is because you do not have to smoke it!' The audience appreciated the fact that he was smoking a cigar furnished by the property-man and roared with laughter; but this interference made him forget his lines. He could not recollect a word, so, taking my arm, he said, 'Come with me for a walk, and I will tell you the story of my life.' We walked off the stage and on at the next entrance, which required no more

I know a young Frenchwoman who called a friend up on the telephone the other day and said: 'I'm sorry to trouble you, dear madame, but can you give me a good recipe for cooking clay pigeons? Jacques has just sent me word that he is going out to shoot some, and he is sure to bring a lot home, and I can't find a single word about them in the cook-book.'"

The London Times digs up a bunch of "humor evasive" in answers to questionnaires, as, for instance: A person whose father had been hanged by the neck until useless answered the question:

"Is your father dead? If so, how did he die?"

"My father was taking the principal part in a public function, when the platform gave way."

Our Children's Hobbies

By W. H. Gray

WHAT are you doing to keep your boys and girls from growing into poolroom sharks and jazz babies?

"I'm at the office all day, so I don't see enough of the children to influence them," says the father.

"And I'm so tied up with house-keeping and the younger children that I really don't know what Mabel and Jack do to amuse themselves. But I know they wouldn't do anything really bad," murmurs the tired and overworked mother.

Such is often the case in average households; and Mabel and Jack, left to themselves, find ways and means of amusing themselves that, while not actually wrong, may lead in an undesirable direction.

Or again, the parents say: "Oh well, they don't mind anything I say now, and they are too big to spank." What is that but putting it off, or as Kipling calls it: "Abby-nay, kul an' hazar-ho"—a policy that would not be tolerated in any business or profession?

Now, how would you like them to spend their spare time? Or do you simply want them to keep out of your way, and not get into any more mischief than they can help?

There are all sorts of ways of getting young people into the right groove, and most of them are based on interest. At present Mabel's chief delight may be driving round with the grocer's delivery man after school. You may not think it a suitable vocation, and the easiest way may be to say, "Mabel cut it out altogether," and hope she will. But the better way is to create a counter attraction that will have more charm for Mabel. "When I was her age I collected stamps, did photography, and kept rabbits, none of which interest Mabel." But, mother of Mabel, you forget that at her exact age today you may not have been interested in any of those things. The young mind flits about from one thing to another—it is natural that it should.

You, who are neat and careful, must not scold and discourage the children because their books of pressed flowers and stamps are smudgy, and not so well done as you would like. If you bought them a better book and helped them all you could, even to the extent of reading up the subject after they are in bed, then indeed would you feel that you were a real influence. And in the companionship that will grow up between parent and child there will be that confidence which hides nothing. Very often their collections may be entered in local fairs and exhibitions where they will be set out side by side with the work of other collectors. Thus will the student know where he really stands. The prizes given are by no means to be despised, apart from the honour of winning them.

There are many splendid young people's magazines that will suggest hobbies for the children. Then when something makes a special appeal it can be followed up, first, say, in an encyclopædia which generally refers one to books, then through the library. There is another very important source of knowledge that yields perhaps as much information as any other; and that is the catalogues of firms dealing in the desired subject, whether it be wireless telegraphy, pigeons, fancy fowl, geology, conchology, bees, firearms or chemicals. These catalogues are written and illustrated in a way that attract attention and give information—they have to be so in the competitive business world of to-day.

When it comes to holiday time, why not make a trip that will give new zest to the latest hobby? Perhaps a museum where all the implements of war from the flint spear head to the latest machine gun or aerial bomb may be seen. Or to the seashore where shrimps and crabs, sea-anemones and beautiful shells may be found in profusion. Or even to a limestone quarry where fossils of fauna and flora may be found that lived on this old earth millions of years ago.

Your son or daughter may be the out-door type, intensely interested in sport and games of all kinds, and though you may have no inclination in that direction yourself, you may, when the time comes, win their everlasting gratitude by getting them a really good tennis racquet or baseball bat. And, who knows, you may be rewarded by having in the family the champion of the town or perhaps the state, whereas without the racquet Mabel might have given up tennis and taken to something else that did not require such expensive tools.

Jack and Mabel must have friends of their own age; and if they, too, become interested in the same things, it will create healthy rivalry; and most likely add months, if not years, to the lives of the hobbies as each spurs the other on. Jack is just beginning to get sick of wireless telegraphy, when his chum, George, gets a new detector for a birthday present. So instead of selling his wireless set and buying rabbits, he saves up for a similar detector, by the aid of which he will be enabled to hear stations the other side of the Continent.

Happy, indeed, is the home where the children's friends are welcome, and though it may be trying at times to have so many high spirits under one roof, yet it is well worth it to know intimately the companions that your boys and girls like best, for they naturally will be the ones they invite home.

There is another aspect to this question of hobbies. Many boys and girls have no very decided opinions as to what profession or trade they wish to make their career, and so they grow up and go into an office, and perhaps stay there for the rest of their lives at uncongenial and unremunerative work, because it was too late to change when they discovered what they really liked best. If they had run the gamut of all the hobbies in their youth they would probably have found out what appealed to them most. Their education might then have been shaped in that direction, with great subsequent benefit.

It is most important that the health of our boys and girls be considered in connection with their games and pastimes; and if they are not up to standard a competent medical man should be consulted before they go in for strenuous and tiring games. It is not easy to tell what the result of hard manual exercise will be on an undeveloped boy or girl. It may put a chest on them like a prize fighter, or it may be very bad for them if their lungs are at all weak.

Many parents say to their children: "Make the best of your school days, for they are the happiest time of your life." In a very large number of cases this is not the case. And when the children grow up they find that riches do not bring happiness either. A king of old, was told that to gain happiness he must wear for one day the shirt of a happy man. When the kingdom had been searched and the happy man at last found, he did not possess a shirt!

Happy indeed is he whose work is his hobby.

My Lingerie, 'Tis of Thee

By Charlotte M. Storey

The relation of undergarments to outer ones is very definite. If skirts are long and voluminous, then undergarments are correspondingly long and voluminous, plentifully ruffled and starched stiff as a sentry. When the silhouette is straight and slender, undergarments are reduced to the minimum of weight and quantity; not a superfluous inch of cloth is left in them, and ruffles are nil. The blushing bride of ten years ago who had sufficient lingerie in her trousseau to last her a score of years, has had a bad time making it over to conform with present requirements.

It is also to be noted that the fashioning of outer garments has to do with the vogue of colored undergarments. We can talk of this now when Fashion has decreed that skirts are to be an inch or two longer and the ors in the spring time. If anything, our robe-de-nuit and undergarments are to be more gloriously colored than for winter wear.

Besides habutai, satin, crepe de chine and radium, there will be a wonderful array of cotton fabrics, many of which will be dyed in pastel shades as well as some of the stronger colors such as orange, jade, wedgewood and others. Batistes, dimities, crepes and voiles are to be used for undergarments and night gowns. If they happen to be left white, one may still have a delicate touch of color in the bit of dainty hand embroidery, the colored binding or piping; and don't allow yourself to be shocked when you hear that gingham, chintz or print may be the thing used for these bindings and pipings, as well as plain chambrays.

Perhaps it will be as well to say unfashionables (?) who will persist in wearing these articles.

The soft crepes and woollens, now so much in evidence in every fashionable gathering, have brought taffeta back into fashion because these materials do not cling to each other. The silky surface of the taffeta lets the folds of the clinging crepe or twill fall naturally into place when the wearer changes her position, therefore taffeta is the thing to wear with either. They have very scant flounces with tucking or an inconsequential ruffle just to give them a finish around the bottom or a little extra weight to keep them down. Colored ribbon edges or pleated insets are introduced to add a little brightness if the color happens to be brown, black or navy.

Step-in bloomers and short chemise vests are taking the place of the envelope combination to a very great extent and are very practical. The bloomers shown for next season are wide in the leg and open at the knee with trimming on the outside; while the vest should be a little more than half way between hip and knee. It has a straight top and shoulder straps of ribbon. On account of the plain bodices which next spring's frocks have, many of the new underwear models have a tailored finish or else a very narrow edging which lies flat. Drawn-work and imitation and French hand embroidery and Irish crochet decorate some of the more expensive numbers. The pressed pleats or tucks, although not new, are still used.

A "step-in" combination that is still used and likely to be very popular this season, has the lower part shaped under the body and a wide gore or flounce set in on the outside, which gives the effect of a petticoat. Bloomers, pantalettes and combinations are cut much fuller than a little while ago, so that they may serve the purpose of a petticoat as well. There is a novelty undergarment which, in spite of its novelty, is quite a practical garment. To describe it in plain terms, it is simply a pair of bloomers with a back and front panel of the same material joined at the waist and the sides connected with a lattice work of ribbon. This is a delightful garment to wear under either a silk or cloth dress and takes up just a little less room than bloomers and petticoat.

Light-colored silk and sateen petticoats for summer wear, are cut long enough to allow for a hem three-quarters the length of the skirt, which insures their shadow proofness.

Princess slips are in again, as the logical accompaniment to the sheer one-piece summer frock. It is generally accepted that the top of any garment such as a vest, camisole, brassiere or slip, shall have a straight top with shoulder straps of some kind, so most of the slips shown will have this style of top, the variation occurring at the waist line. Quite a number are gathered in at the waist with an elastic but others, and these are among the newer ones, have the long waist line to conform with the outline of the dress, and have gathers at the side under the arms.

From lingerie to corsets is only a step and to have been chronologically correct, perhaps one should have started with corsets, but it is really brassieres which we wish to discuss in connection with lingerie, for many of them are nothing more nor less than camisoles, an article which belongs to the lingerie department.

Nearly all bandeaux and brassieres fasten in the back now, because fashion would like to do away with curves and make the figure look flat, in which cause the back fastening is supposed to help. There are some models that fasten under the arm-trend is towards opaque materials; but when they were so very short, and when blouses were so very sheer, one's underwear could hardly be considered one's own affair. So it became fashionable to have it the same shade, or at least a shade that harmonized with the costume, the evening gown, or to whatever class the outer garments belonged. This established the vogue of the camisole, bloomers and petticoat, which comes in sets, all of the same color and fabric.

When one says bloomers, pantalettes and pettibockers are included, for they all belong to the same family. Those that have several rows of shirring below the knee are a little newer just now than those with just one. There's another type made like riding breeches and laced over the knee. Satin and colored habutai silk are the materials of which these costume garments are chiefly made, but for spring, we must look to other materials and lighter colors, for by no means, shall we be discarding col-here, that the coming season we are to see more chintz and printed fabrics worn than ever before, so it is not surprising to find that the lingerie designers are taking advantage of the opportunity to use them too. You may have seen the charming house dresses and aprons which the stores are showing, and there are more to follow. One heartily subscribes to these gaily colored, cheerful morning dresses as an antidote for a bad night or getting out of the wrong side of the bed in the morning.

After this slight digression into the realm of glorified morning dresses we shall return to the original subject of this article—lingerie as it is worn.

"Tempestuous" petticoats are no more. In fact, one has heard merchants lamenting that petticoats of any kind are worn no more. But this cannot be the case, for one knows of several healthy petticoat factories, thriving on the trade of the

Bovril

Saves Your Housekeeping Money

It may be pretty safely said that Bovril pays its own cost by the extra nourishment you get out of the other foods you buy. For Bovril has a remarkable power of enabling you to extract nourishment which would otherwise not be absorbed by the body, and so would be wasted.

But there is an even bigger gain than the money one. The very fact that you are getting more nourishment from your food means that you are stronger, more full of vitality, better in health in every way. There is no better food economy than to use Bovril.

ion; the lighter forms of agriculture, parliamentary procedure, and a great variety of topics of interest to women and girls, not only as housekeepers and home-makers, but as citizens of a Democratic country. Reports and bulletins from the various departments of the government, both provincial and Dominion, of interest to women and girls, are furnished by the Institutes.

There is no restriction so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned as to subjects to be considered.

The material and practical do not occupy the whole time of the members, for we find literature, debates, social activities, including entertainment of an instructive and recreative character; and games, are not overlooked.

(6) The methods of teaching are varied. In the early days it was very difficult in many branches to get the members to prepare papers or addresses or to give demonstrations; so exchange of recipes, reading of selections from books, reports, bulletins, etc., with occasional papers by the members and other local talent, and assistance from outside by way of addresses from speakers furnished by the government characterized the work of the Institutes. It was not long, however, until nearly every Institute discovered that it had local talent, both within and without the Institute, with the result that addresses and papers presented at the regular monthly meetings were soon of a high character. The Institutes are now asking for lecturers and demonstrators who have had special training along definite lines; and the demand is increasing, not for single lectures, but for courses of instruction. During the past year we have given in Ontario courses of two weeks, in "Home Nursing and First Aid," "Domestic Science" and "Sewing," to 5,844 girls and women at one hundred and fifty-five centres. Many Institutes have libraries of their own, consisting of a number of standard works, and, of course, copies of bulletins and leaflets furnished by the provincial and Dominion governments. Travelling libraries are also utilized to a considerable extent and the women of the Institutes are co-operating with the local library boards in providing books of special interest and value to girls and women.

The number of girls who must look to the Women's Institute for educational opportunities after they leave the public school will remain greatly in excess of those from the rural districts who can attend high school and colleges. It becomes the responsibility of the whole people to see that the service to these is efficient and adequate.

The Institute an Advisor and Administrator.

While the Institute is an important factor as an educator and developer of talent, it has also come to be something more, an advisor and administrator in a variety of undertakings. True, these advisors and administrators have no legal standing and are seldom clothed with official authority. Nevertheless, the advice and co-operation of women chosen by the members of an organization representing all classes and interests in the community is being sought more and more in all community undertakings.

Many lines of interest to the whole people are receiving valuable support both in management and contributions from the Women's Institutes. Among these we may mention the securing of travelling libraries for many rural centres, reclaiming libraries which were not being utilized, cooperating with local Library Boards in securing books and periodicals of special value to the women, girls and boys of the community; establishing rest-rooms, civic improvement, care of cemeteries, establishing parks, athletic fields, skating rinks, etc.

The tactful way in which the leaders in the Institute have discouraged excess in social life, without being considered cranks or faddists, is a compliment to the good judgment of the leaders in community organization.

In the Women's Institutes, we have an organization for the education of the grown-ups and a medium through which many lines of government service can be carried on most effectively. This organization does not ask Government support in securing buildings, equipment or providing local teachers. Full equipment and local assistance are supplied free. Whatever department of the Government or approved organization or institution may wish to co-operate with the people of the rural districts, the women of the Institute are ready to place their machinery at the disposal of the same. Departments of Health, Education and Agriculture are particularly desirous of this co-operation, and much of what they have to offer to the rural districts can be made effective only by co-operation with an organization, and not with the individual.

This women's organization can be made of as much importance and value to the grown-ups as the public schools and colleges are to the youth of the land. The amount spent annually by the Government, in grants, literature, lecturers, demonstrators, administration, etc., is less than $1.00 per member, per year, while the Institutes themselves devote six to seven times this amount of money to the work.

While it is true that the members appreciate the Institute for the information gained and the advantages enjoyed, one of the chief attractions in this Democratic organization is that it provides opportunity for service. The biggest asset of the Institutes, in so far as national strength and development is concerned, is the spirit of service which it has engendered.

Here we have an organization which values very much the assistance received from the Government and is utilizing available funds most effectively. The future success of the work depends upon an enlarged and more efficient Government service along a variety of lines, and the accepting of greater responsibility on the part of the women of the Institute, in so far as the extension of the work to new centres and stimulating interest in the activities of the Institute in all communities is concerned.

There is no good reason why the Women's Institutes should not be the educator, the administrator, the advisor, and the safeguard of the best interest of the whole people in every community.

Discussions at Institute Meetings.

MUCH value is placed on discussions at Institute meetings and rightly so. While some lectures and talks are quite unsuitable for after-discussion, many gain immeasurably by this.

Those responsible should consider carefully whether the topic desired by the members for a programme is suitable for a discussion or for a roll call or a talk or a debate. If it is deemed suitable for a discussion then the next question is whether it would be dealt with better by a discussion after a lecture or a paper on the topic or if it can be an item by itself.

If it is an item without an introductory paper, then a leader to open the discussion and a supporter must be found. A time limit should be set and observed. No one should be allowed to speak twice unless the meeting expresses a wish to hear some one again or to have questions answered by some speaker.

Let us take for example a discussion as held in Nelson, B. C. "What can we do as an Institute to assist new-comers?"

This is plain sailing. The member who opens the discussion should suggest in a general way, the directions towards which help could be given, such as welcoming, making feel at home, offering services, inviting to Institutes meeting and so forth. She should point out that the discussion is on "how to help as an Institute, not individually," and she should end with an appeal to carry out our Institute ideals in extending a welcoming hand.

Other speakers should each offer a practical suggestion and the Chairman should then sum all up. She should ask if any resolutions were to be brought forward or if it was desired she should name committees in order to put on foot any plan proposed which seemed to meet the wishes of the members.

Let us take the other case when the discussion follows a talk or paper. Suppose the subject is on the ever useful "How to get rid of Flies." The paper should be an authoritative one by some one who has studied the subject and got the scientific basis clear in her own mind. Speakers should give personal experiences and known and tested expedients. Note books should be freely used. All the useful suggestions made should be summarized by the Secretary and placed later on the Notice Board.

Again suppose there are several short discussions, such as the following from a British Columbia programme.

(a) What alteration has the war made in the running expenses of our households?

(b) Have we added anything to the Producers' list since the war?

(c) The new attitude of Patriotism, Economy.

Such discussions not only bring out useful information, but make the members think. To have these carried on successfully means skilful chairmanship, keeping speakers strictly to the point and yet encouraging frank statements. The chairman should be ready beforehand when such discussions are coming up, should plan in her own mind what warnings and advice she is going to give, what time she will allow to each speaker, and each subject, and should take careful notes herself in order to sum up intelligently after each discussion.

A frequent discussion is "What I should like my girl to learn at school." One wonders why the splendid and original answers to this query do not find their way into print. When there is a subject of this nature up for discussion arrangements should be made for getting the sure-to-be-valuable suggestions to the right authorities.

Humorous Discussions such as "How to manage a Husband" always increase the attendance. One can almost hear the chorus, "Feed the Brute!"

Discussions on matters of public interest such as Community Laundries, Public Baths, Public Nuisances, What does the Village need? etc., can be left if wished for meetings at which men are present, where community action can be secured if needed.

As will be seen, discussions serve a double purpose, to bring out the members and to achieve some useful purpose. The Institute Committee will do well to keep both ends in view and to make every provision that the benefits are not lost to the community and to the Institute.

A Visit to the Chelmsford Women's Institute Stall.

A successful Institute Stall in the Chelmsford Market, England has been Rest Room serves tea and lunch, and is in fact a W. I. Club, surplus is usually sold there. In fact club and stall work in together very well.

The stall is a pretty sight. The English W. I. colors are red and green, and they are used to great advantage. The awning is of a bright green, the helpers wear green overalls with red rosettes as badges; altogether with the many colored articles, it is a delight to the eye. As every attention is paid to cleanliness and neatness, careful housekeepers prefer to shop there. The tables are arranged in the form of three sides of a square. There are flowers everywhere and these find a ready sale. Bunches of sweet peas, antirrhinum, asters are sold for 3d a bunch. Clear honey fetches 2/6 a pound, and is usually gone as soon as the stall is opened. Baskets, toys, rush mats, gloves, all home-made, cheese, eggs, vegetables, fruits, needlework, bottled and canned fruits, meats, live rabbits and poultry live or according to the record she has made. She makes a humorous suggestion in this regard. "One way of keeping these records is to draw a thermometer and mark off the degrees. The mercury will climb up as the member makes points and a competition can be arranged as to who reaches boiling point first." She further suggests that for the Baking Club of the Girls' Institute points might be assigned as follows:—Bread 10 credits, Buns 7, Biscuits 5, Muffins 4, Cake 5, Cookies 5.

It is reasonable that the work at home should be counted as part of the club work. In scattered districts the club may not meet often, but if each girl knows that the others are doing the same thing in their homes, the club spirit will be kept, and the club meeting all the more enjoyed when the meeting is possible.

Institute Organization and What it Stands for.

The Institute stands for Fellowship. The Group or District Institute for Mutual Help.

The County stands for Co-Partnership.

The Province for Co-Operation.

The National Federation for Union.

The International will stand for Concord.

The Question Drawer.

Question. In a printed programme is it well to have quotations and Club colors as Motto?

Answer. Yes. A reproduction for the Club Badge also adds distinction. The most beautiful Badge I have seen on a programme is that of the Pennsylvania Farm Women, a pink holly-work on a gray ground.

Question. Should the financial or annual Report, if brief, be printed on programmes of next year?

Answer. It is not usual, but it has been done both in Canada and abroad. There is no objection if funds permit.

Question. What other information about institutes can be profitably put on printed programme?

Answer. Date, time and place of meeting, notices about classes, the library, magazine exchange, stall for sale of members' work, reminders about members' enterprises, about the Girls' Club or Institute meetings, rules about visitors, membership fees, &c.

Question. What does "nem. con." mean?

Answer. It is the abbreviation of "nemine contradicente" that is, no one contradicting. It means that no one has voted against the resolution, motion or proposition, although some may not have voted at all.

Question. Should Minutes begin with a list of those present?

Answer. Yes. If any one is present (other than members) by invitation or permission, this should be stated.

Question. How is it known what a quorum should be?

Answer. The Rules or Bylaws usually provide for the number necessary to form a quorum. If not so stated, then a majority of the members of the committee or the body itself is necessary to form a quorum. A motion naming a committee may also name its quorum.

Question. When can a resolution be properly withdrawn?

Answer. At any time before the question is put to the meeting. The consent of the meeting is necessary to the withdrawal. It is withdrawn

More than 125,000 women and girls, in city, town and country, have learned, through the Woman's Institute, how to make their own clothes and hats and be better dressed at far less cost.

Learn Dressmaking at Home

By our fascinating new method of teaching by mail, you, too, can quickly learn in spare time, in the comfort and quiet of your own home, to make dresses, skirts, blouses, suits, wraps, lingerie, children's clothes, hats—in fact, garments of every kind. With this training you will not only be able to make all your own clothes, but to take up Dressmaking or Millinery as a business—secure a good paying position or open a shop of your own.

Write for 64-page Booklet

It costs you nothing to find out all about the Woman's Institute and what it can do for you. Just send a letter, post card, or the convenient coupon and you will receive, without obligation, the full story of this great school that is bringing to women and girls all over the world the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business.

INDIAN MOTHER AND CHILD

carried on for some years. It was organized at the request of the Institutes in the county of Essex. The County Rest Room and Club is its headquarters, that is: produce and articles for sale are sent and sorted there and all the necessary preliminaries arranged. Any Institute member may send home or farm produce, plain needlework, products of any home or village industry, anything which will not be injured by being sold out of doors. A penny in the shilling commission is charged which pays usually for the expense of the stall. If there is a surplus over it goes to the Rest Room. All the helpers, including the member who manages it, are voluntary workers and the only paid assistance is that of the man who puts up the stalls and awning every market day and puts them away at night. Members sending articles get all the price paid less only the commission. Many of the members who are in town for the day bring their own produce and take away what is not sold. As the dressed. Vegetables and so forth are sold at market prices which are listed on a slate and hung above tables. The name Essex Women's Institutes Stall extends across front.

The turnover from this stall in 1921 was over £1,000 and the expenses £70. We should think very well of ourselves in Canada if we took in $5,000 at a W. I. booth open once a week, should we not? Yet it is quite possible.

Home Credits.

Several questions about Home Credits are interesting our members especially those who are helping with Girls' Institutes and Clubs. The idea simply is to give credit for work done at home in lines of work for which points or marks are given in competitions, team work, projects, and so forth. Miss Edith Gray, of Manitoba says there should be some way of keeping track of what each girl does at home. So each girl should keep a register and count so many points by the mover with the consent of the seconder.

Question. May the President or Chairman "take sides" in a discussion on a motion?

Answer. The Chairman, strictly speaking, if she wants to speak for or against a motion, should leave the chair, first asking some one to preside in her place while she speaks.

Question. Where can we get the new Federation W. I. pin?

Answer. The coat-of-arms is now complete on pin and this can be obtained in all its beauty from Miss Eliza Campbell, Treasurer, National Federated W. I., of Canada, Fredericton, N. B.

Question. Are there Women's Institutes anywhere, without Government supervision?

Answer. All governments which give financial assistance to Institutes make conditions and require information, chiefly in regard to expenditure of funds. The English Institutes are not supervised in any sense of the word.

Question. What is a Gift Stall?

Answer. Members bring anything they can spare, to be sold for the benefit of the Institute. It is held usually once a year.

School Exhibitions in Nova Scotia.

Any movement which has for its object the welfare of the children or the betterment of the school is sure to receive most hearty support from the Women's Institutes. The School Exhibition has shown itself to be in the interest of both child and school and the institutes are active in lending their assistance.

The teacher, wishing to hold an exhibition can with surety count on the co-operation of the Institute members, and if no one else is interested, the Institute is apt to take matters in its own hands and see that an exhibition is held.

The part played by the Institute varies according to the necessity. There seems to be always room for the offering of more prizes and in this connection, the Institutes have been generousity itself. In addition to the prizes actually given from the funds of the organization, the members have done excellent work in interesting outside individuals and firms in the Exhibition. Through their efforts in this direction, the number of special prizes have been materially increased. It is beginning also to be taken for granted that Institute members will be acting as judges at these fairs.

Many exhibitions would never be carried on, were it not for the Institute members who conceive the idea, make all arrangements and carry on the exhibition in all its details.

At the July meeting of one of the branches, the idea of a School Exhibition was suggested. The matter met with approval and in October a very successful exhibition was held. The women interested the teacher and pupils in the project and the results were highly pleasing to all concerned. The prizes were given by the Institute.

The first School Fair in another community was carried on under the direction of the Institutes. This proved so successful that next year, five other schools will join in holding one central fair. This centralizing idea has been carried on in other sections and, under the direction of the Institutes, has proved immensely successful.

The carrying on of these fairs meant a lot of hard work, as prize lists must be prepared, prizes solicited, money secured and a vast number of details attended to. Nevertheless, the institutes not only cheerfully assume this responsibility, but in many instances they further prompt the work by encouraging the children in growing vegetables for the fair and have committees who inspect the work.

Classes for instruction in sewing have also been conducted by the Institutes, in order that the girls may receive some assistance in preparing articles for exhibition.

FROM PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Prince Edward Island held its annual convention recently at Charlottetown, sessions being held in the Institute rooms, Kindergarten Hall and in the Prince of Wales College Hall.

The report of the supervisor, Miss Bessie Carruthers, showed that during the year, eleven new institutes had been organized, New Perth, Cardigan, Roseneath, Cavendish, Rustico, Hunt River, Cherry Grove, Springton, Stanchel, Sherbrook, Victoria, South Lane and Darnley, making a total of forty-three institutes in all and an increase of two hundred in membership.

Seventy-six visits were made to the clubs by the supervisor and her two assistants, when demonstrations were given in millinery, first aid, hot school lunch and various phases of cooking as well as talks on institute work.

Judging was done at the school fairs and exhibitions during the month of September.

In all, some six thousand dollars has been raised as compared with $4,200 of the previous years. Of this $1,500 has been spent on schools, $675 on community work, $600.00 on patriotic work, as well as large sums for war memorials, this being kept apart from the general funds so there is an accurate way of keeping account of it.

Greater interest has been taken in the work and there are more calls for organization.

Miss Nellie Green, Graham's Road, was elected delegate to attend and represent Prince Edward Island on the Board of Directors of the Federated Institutes.

Many interesting addresses were given, these being as follows: Mrs. Walter Simpson, Bay View, gave an excellent paper on "The Duties of a Delegate," emphasizing the points of being punctual, present at every session, co-operating with all members present and securing a good report to take back.

Miss Amy MacMahon, Red Cross nurse, spoke on the work of medical inspection in schools, this being carried out in the province.

Mr. H. N. Rogers, superintendent of Education, spoke on "School Needs," emphasizing the importance of cleanliness, attractive surroundings and equipment.

Mrs. W. S. Louson of Charlottetown was a much enjoyed speaker, her topic being "The Need of a Traveling Library." Her talk was listened to with great interest and the W. I. members hope that in the near future P. E. I. will be able to have a travelling library of its own. Many of the institutes make use of that supplied by McGill University.

Miss Harper gave a very interesting demonstration on salads and their making. Following this was an address on "What do we mean by education?" by Miss Carrie Holman of Summerside. She spoke of the poor condition of many of the rural schools and what might be accomplished by the women's institutes working for their betterment.

One of the best addresses of the convention was given by Mrs. W. W. Baird of Nappan, Nova Scotia, on "What is Home Economics?" She stated that the homes were the corner stones of the world and therefore the world should receive more knowledge of its homes.

At the conclusion of Mrs. Baird's address a petition was drawn up and signed by the delegates that women be given the right to vote in the next provincial elections, this to be presented at the next meeting of the House.

The delegates were welcomed by Mr. Wilfred Boulter, director of Elementary education for the province in behalf of Hon. Walter Lea, Commissioner of Agriculture, to whom Miss Nellie Green replied.

Another feature of the convention was a drive to the Experimental Farm by the members of the Motor League and Rotary Club, where a most enjoyable picnic was held. An excellent Red Cross moving picture slide was shown by Mr. Burke and enjoyed very much by all.

NEW BRUNSWICK CONVENTION

The Women's Institutes of New Brunswick held their ninth annual convention at Woodstock in November.

Mrs. C. J. Osman, president of the advisory board, gave the address of welcome, supplemented by one from Mayor Moir of Woodstock, Mrs. F. D. Thompson of Sackville, replying.

From the supervisor's report, read by Miss Elizabeth Nutter, the following facts of W. I. work were gleaned:

In 1921 short courses were held in Household Science, under the joint auspices of the Department of Agriculture and the Health Department, in the French districts of Madawaska, Restigouche, Gloucester, Northumberland and Westmoreland.

Summer extension courses were held in the Eastern sections of the province, Miss Landry conducting the Child Welfare and First Aid and Miss Nutter and Miss LeBlanc the Cooking Demonstrations.

In June, 20th to 25th, the second convention of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada was held in Edmonton, Alberta.

At this convention Miss Eliza Campbell, our splendid treasurer, was chosen for a second term of office—a worthy tribute to a worthy representative.

The exhibits from the various Institutes of N. B. to the exhibitions held in St. John, Fredericton and Chatham were most creditable and pleasing.

Mention might be made here of a Handicraft Association with headquarters at Montreal, which is subsidized by the Dominion Government and is now in a position to greatly encourage and assist such work among Institutes.

The matter of a grant to branch Institutes has been taken up with our Minister of Agriculture resulting in an increase from $5.00 to $10.00.

On April 6th, the second meeting of the Board, an Act to incorporate the Women's Institutes of N. B. was presented by the Superintendent and endorsed by the Board, such an Act being essential to the placing of our organization on a proper business basis.

This Act was to be brought before the Legislature of our province at its last session, but unfortunately the House closed early and this had to be left over until 1922.

render service? Both, I submit. Carlyle called blessedness the chief end of man, and he meant that highest form of happiness that comes indirectly through service rather than through self-seeking. It is self-realization brought about through the enlargement and outspreading of self to include those things one loves and cares for. And the happiest man is he who has the largest circle of loves and interests all intimately connected with himself. You will find all that in the Spencerian philosophy.

But it is a sort of selfishness, after all. If we are candid we must admit that. History is the record of the human attempt to become happier, with a constant increase and elevation in the requirements of happiness.

Let us say, then, that we are living and working to become happier, and let us not lose sight of it. Then we are not living and working for money, are we? Of course not! Perish the thought! We are not of that sordid clan, you and I! We work for money simply as a means to an end. We earn money for its power to purchase happiness in the form in which we desire it most. Money is but a medium of exchange. Work, money, happiness; that is the cycle.

And that is just where we are prone to go astray. Simple as the formula is, we become mired before we wallow through it. The more money we can earn, we say, the more happiness we can get. So, fixing our eyes on the nearer goal, we work for money, and for the visible indications of its possession. We err here, every mother's son and daughter of us, to a greater or less extent. "Just a little more money," we say, "and then, ho! for happiness." And we seldom get beyond the first step.

Now the point I want to make is this. We have built up this three-part cycle logically enough, and then we set it up as a graven image and worship it, forgetful of its true significance. And in so doing, we have complicated life and enthroned the complication. What we must do, sooner or later, is to simplify life. And the only way to do that is to eliminate as far as possible the middle member of the cycle, and work directly for happiness—the highest form of happiness that our natures will permit. Money is but a medium of exchange, and the less we make of the medium, the simpler life will become.

I need not argue that we want life simpler. I think we have all come to feel that. The way the public, a few years ago, bought and read Charles Wagner's book was evidence of it. A thousand pities that he was so academic and so vague in his practical applications. The question is, how can we reduce life to simpler terms, and so give our souls the chance to contemplate the beauty of life for a little space before we go?

Now that the high cost of living has become such a vital question, especially to those of us who live in cities, I find more and more people turning their faces countryward. There the cost of living is less. There life is simpler. There the medium of exchange dominates life less completely. Every fifth man I meet is talking more or less definitely of buying a farm, and some of them really mean it. And heaven knows this country needs more and better farmers.

And they are on the right track, too. Until some of us get out of town, the town will be too full. We can't all go, but some of us must, and I believe we who go will be the lucky ones. Something must be done to relieve the tension. Young men are filling the agricultural colleges, which are spreading education and uplift throughout the rural districts. It is a sign of the times, and one of the things that make me optimistic in the face of imminent sociological and industrial upheaval. When the storm breaks, these educated farmers are going to be the ballast in the ship of state. You'll see!

But for us it is an individual question, and it is the individual, here and there, that is leaving the slavery of the shop and the office for the liberty of the farm. "Back to the land" has become a fixed phrase in our language.

Now comes the danger. The Prince steals forth from his palace, and takes up his life of vagabondage. Whither will it lead him? Through mountain waste and deep morass, unquestionably. We must not be too hasty. We must seek a golden mean.

I have heard lately of several people who have steered their hearts and cut loose from the city, and they have come to regret it. They have embarked on a new enterprise ill prepared. No man would be so foolish as to open a drug store or start a newspaper with so little training and capital. So these would-be farmers, and their poor wives, pass through a period of real hardship, for which they are not at all fitted, and they are glad enough to get back again to the old bondage of the palace.

I find that the back-to-the-land movement has already received a setback from this cause, and the wisest of us hesitate to give away our swords and our purses and our good white mares. We have seen farms and farmers. We dislike the barnyard. Noisome boots and overalls in the dining room spoil our appetite for breakfast. We dislike to wash at the kitchen sink. Better five rooms and a bath in the city, say we, than a cold and lonely farmhouse. And so we give up the dream and go back to our more or less suicidal jobs in town.

I contend that these hardships are not necessary, and that is the burden of my song. Whatsoever is good, whatsoever is uplifting, whatsoever is sanitary in city life, you can take these with you to the farm. In seeking the simple life, you must cast off the artificialities of life, but you need not abandon its refinements. There is nothing complex or complicating about culture. A stable and a bathroom are not inherently incompatible. By taking thought, you can save yourself and your city-bred wife much suffering, and perhaps avoid a failure of the whole plan.

I know people who have gone back to the farm, and who have degenerated. I know some who are passing through a purgatory of discomfort and hardship. I know some who have utterly failed with the whole thing. But I know some, too, who are succeeding, and I mean, some day, to be one of them. They have been prudent. They have not set forth without a loaf in their knapsacks. They have not expected too much. They have been prepared to work—not for money, but for happiness, appetite and blessed sleep. They have not mistaken a new kind of bondage for freedom.

If you have no money at all, you must fight it out somehow, whether 9801—Girls' Cape Dress. Designed for 6 to 14 years. Size 12 requires 2 1/4 yards 54-inch wool Jersey—1/2 yard 54-inch check velours for trimming—5 yards ribbon. There is a piquant charm to these little cape frocks that appeals decidedly to little girls. The fashion is a reflection of grown-up modes which feature the dress and matching coat or cape. Wool Jersey is used a lot for these cape frocks, as is light-weight velours. The dress is in drop-shoulder style closed at left side-front, and the jaunty cape swings from a deep yoke.

9010—Boys' Sports Suit. Designed for 4 to 14 years. Size requires 1 1/2 yards 54-inch serge.

9790—Girls' One-piece Dress. Designed for 6 to 14 years. Size 8 requires 1 1/2 yards 54-inch serge — 1/2 yard 36-inch linen for collar and cuffs — 2 1/4 yards ribbon for sash. Braiding in design 12615 forms a border on the skirt, and soutache braid may be used in carrying out the design. If preferred wool, rope silk, chenille, or metallic threads may be used.

Nos. 236 and 237—Novelties in Knitted Dresses for Little Maids.

The Pictorial Review Company's Crochet Directions No. 239, 20 cents (1/-). Rose and gold silk were used in the original model, the gold outlining the round neck, the kimono sleeves, and square scalloped hemline and being used in the design of the skirt and the belt.

Fashion Notes

By C. M. S.

IN our anxiety to tell you about the fans we almost forgot to mention the lovely little bandeaux which are so pretty in a fluffy coiffure, especially if it surmounts a pretty young face. One that a Toronto debutante has worn at her coming out dance early in the New Year is flexible with diamond settings; another that one saw a few evenings ago was a wreath of small gold leaves studded with pearls. Ribbons and flowers are also used for bandeaux, a band of tiny rose buds made of silk is bound across the forehead with satin ribbon attached to either end of the wreath; or, it may be reversed with the wreath worn under the coil in the back with the ribbon brought over the top and around again under the hair at the back.

Of no less interest to her who is planning an evening gown is the manner of its floral decoration in the way of a corsage. Almost every really smart gown that came over from Paris this season had a trail of fruit or flowers hanging down from the low waist line at the side, and now one finds them for sale in the shops in all the most acceptable colors such as fuchsia, violet, ruby, scarlet, flame, peacock, iris and many others. But, if you prefer it, a large flat velvet rose will do as well for it would be hard to find anything much prettier after all.

There are many pretty little conceits for carrying one's powder puff which has become such an essential part of the ensemble, for one never knows when it may be wanted on an instant's notice. Little silk or feather bags have mirrors in the bottom, but one of the cleverest things one has seen is a combination of fan and vanity case. The part of the fan one holds it by, in this case was a purse with ivory frame with all but the frame concealed by the ends of the long ostrich feathers with which one fanned one's self. The vanities were safely stowed away inside the purse.

After wearing one's "crowning glory" quite plain for some time, it is an agreeable change to find that hair ornaments have come back in many beautiful forms. It may not be in the best of taste, but you will be in the fashion if you wear an ornamental comb even in the day time. But for the evening is reserved the triumph of the comb-maker's art. The tortoise shell Spanish comb is pre-eminent—the larger the better and they are stuck in the side of the coil or puff coiffure. They too, glisten with brilliants, emeralds and sapphire, or imitations thereof. Another style is French ivory decorated with hand painted roses and referred to as Florentine. For balls and dances, feather combs are worn a great deal; that is, combs with ostrich or coq feathers matching in color the gown of some accessory, as for instance the fan, which, by the way, is very likely to be composed of feathers also, although from the foreign fashion centres comes the news that the gauzy, painted and much smaller fan of two generations back, is coming into prominence again. If any of you have your grandmother's fan stowed away in a cedar chest, get it out by all means for the next social function to which you are invited, and you will be envied to your heart's content. The lovely big ostrich feather fans have been used very extensively ever since the autumn of 1918 when society broke loose in rapture over the ending of the war; but they are now giving way somewhat to those made of coq feathers of uneven length. These were carried by the elite at the smartest affairs given in Washington for the "Armaments" visitors.

Gowns made of the new cotton materials are very pretty. The printed crepes are ideal for summer wear and so are the cross-barred dimities with their pipings of chambray in some pretty pastel shade and bit of hand embroidery. The sleeves are short or do not exist at all, and the Empire styles continue to be as popular as any other.

Brassieres and bandeaux, primarily answer the same purpose, but whether intentionally or not, it has worked out so that the former is a trimmed up and sometimes quite an ornamental article, while the other is unornamental, its sole virtue being its practicability. Some of the new models for spring are called brassiere camisoles and are made of lace and silk on a foundation of net, with a fancy vest simulated in the centre front. If one says nothing about it, it may be worn as a vest with a tuxedo sweater or bodice cut low in front, and no one will be any the wiser.

Many of the brassieres and bandeaux shown for spring, are cut much deeper which is really an advantage, for many people found the old style too shallow. The new ones hold the top of the corset in shape and some even have elastic bands around the bottom of the bandeau and some have elastic sections in the sides. There is a model which is designed for the sheer over-blouse which is to be worn with a dark skirt. It, too, is worn over the skirt and conceals the band, which many will consider an advantage. One is just reminded of seeing a very charming front lace corset made of a fancy pink satin with brassiere to match. This was a happy idea—why shouldn't they match? There is little space left to discuss corsets so they will have to be left for another time, but one would like to use what space is left to mention the corselettes, girdlettes, or whatever name one wishes to call them by. There are many different interpretations of them, but the sum and substance is an elongated brassiere with suspenders, which may be worn for negligee, for athletic exercise, or any occasion when one wants to be strictly at ease, but at the same time corseted. This was introduced last year and was tremendously successful, and comes to us again much improved.

Perhaps it could not be otherwise, but everybody is talking about how lucky Lord Lascelles is, and hardly anybody about how lucky Princess Mary is. In these days of strenuous social competition, one does not like to admit one has not met everybody, but I have not met Lord Lascelles. Nevertheless, if all they say be true, we may assume that Princess Mary has not done so badly.

The first marriage of a princess of the reigning house with a man not of Royal birth was between Queen Victoria's daughter, Princess Louise, and the Marquis of Lorne, son of the Duke of Argyll. When the engagement was announced, it created a great stir on the Argyllshire estates, and one of the gillies, whose reverence for the family he served was deep, remarked seriously:

"Ah the Queen maun be a proud woman the day!"

Suddenly She Realized Why MARJORIE WAS SO POPULAR

POOR little Esther . . . ! She had saved and saved to buy her dress and she had gone to the dance with eager heart, hoping that this time at least, it might be different.

But no—it was not to be. Somehow or other, Esther didn't seem to fit in at all. Her dance card was only half-filled. When she did not sit out the odd dances, she hid herself away in the cloak room—too miserable for words.

And when she did have a dance, particularly the one she had dreamed of with Bob Adams, she could not think of anything to say. She felt ill at ease—there were awkward pauses—minutes (they seemed almost hours) of embarrassed silence.

But Marjorie—clever little Marjorie—was the center of attraction as usual. Somehow—the men could always think of something to say to her! And as she flitted gayly from group to group—well-poised, graceful—a happy, smiling yellow butterfly—Esther heard one of the men call her "the best-dressed girl in the room."

"She shouldn't be," said Esther to herself, with just a trace of envy. "She didn't pay nearly as much for her dress as I did for mine. And I know I'm prettier than she is. And didn't the gym teacher tell me my figure was more nearly perfect?"

WHAT was it, then, that made the difference? What was the mysterious something that made Marjorie so charming—so popular? "She hadn't always been so popular—so well-poised," thought Esther. Where, then, had she acquired it?

Esther stood by herself for a minute thinking. Then suddenly there came to her mind the story of a wonderful book—a story of a book and a girl just like herself that she had read in her favorite magazine.

"Could it be?" she mused. "That book . . . ? Personality . . . charm . . . exquisite taste . . . ! I wonder if . . . ? I'm going to find out anyway!"

That night when Esther got home she mailed a letter. "The next dance will be different," she told her pillow. And then she dozed off to pleasant dreams.

FROM then on there was an almost magic change in Esther. The old bashfulness seemed to disappear. She dressed her hair more becomingly—seemed to select her clothes with better taste.

"Exquisite taste," her mother called it. Soon her friends noticed it and commented about it first to each other and then to Esther.

But the little lady simply smiled mysteriously, until—

One night Bob came over the way he was coming over rather often now) and as he sat close beside her, Esther told him of a wonderful book that had brought her more happiness than she ever dreamed possible.

"Is it purple and gold, and was it written by Mary Brooks Picken?" he asked. "And is it called 'The Secrets of Distinctive Dress'?"

"Why—why, yes," gasped Esther. "Where did you hear about it?"

Bob smiled. "Why, that's the book that Marjorie was always reading."

"THE Secrets of Distinctive Dress" holds a message for you just as it did for Marjorie and Esther. If you have been specially favored with natural grace and beauty of feature, this book will show you how to enhance your attractiveness. Or if you feel that you are, perhaps, a little "plain looking," if you have some defects of figure, feature or complexion, if you realize that you do not make friends as rapidly as you should, if you are inclined to be backward, ill at ease in company and less popular than you would like to be, you can learn from "The Secrets of Distinctive Dress" just how to overcome these handicaps.

From cover to cover it is filled with intimate facts about the style, design and harmony of fashionable dress—little knacks of faultless taste—and the principles underlying the development of social ease, grace, beauty and personal charm!

With the knowledge this book imparts so clearly, concisely and completely, any woman or girl, no matter where she lives, can learn the fundamental principles of compelling admiration, attracting friends and developing a charming personality. For in this remarkable book all these things have been reduced to simple, practical rules that any woman can understand and apply.

"The Secrets of Distinctive Dress" is a handsome volume of generous size. 220 pages beautifully printed and bound in cloth with gold-stamped covers, a book you will be proud to have in your library or for daily reference and use in your boudoir. It is safe to say that never before has a book so vitally important and so beautifully published, been offered to women.

As a matter of fact, this book is so important, it can mean so much in helping every woman and girl to always appear charming and attractive that the publishers want every woman to see and examine it for herself in her own home.

So this special offer is being made, for a limited time only, to the readers of this magazine—

BRUSHES

Bristles Must Be Glossy

Brilliance is a keynote to bristle quality. If you expect service, do not buy a brush with dull white bristles.

The exquisite Keystone Brushes, of solid French Ivory and Solid Ebony, wear and keep their shape so well because they are filled with stiff, gleaming pure white Russian bristles.

Canadian craftsmen make the Keystone line—the most beautiful brushes and mirrors in the world.

in country or in town. But if you have a little—just a very little—you can make it amount to something in the country. An income of five hundred dollars a year is a drop in the bucket in the city, it is a fortune in the village. You can buy a farm that will give you a living, and your sons after you, for the price of an automobile that will be scrap-iron in six years.

And I for one prefer the farm. To stand on your own hilltop, looking across your own orchard and meadow, with your own grain greening in the July sun, with your own cattle standing knee-deep in your own brook, with your wife singing in the kitchen of the little farmhouse that is your home—that is the simple life that satisfies! Joy-riding isn't to be compared with the rattle of the buggy wheels, when Old Dobbin goes to town.

And when winter comes, and the stubble-fields lie sleeping beneath their white mantle, there is time for books, and talk, and dear old friends. And best of all, you needn't be marooned among a lot of ignorant, hard-shelled, vulgar hayseeds. The city is sending its best back to the land, and you'll find others like yourself at Farmington. Time and room to think, to enjoy, to live. Don't you you hunger and thirst for it?

An old chap, named Abraham Cowley, away back in the time of Cromwell and Milton, said some very sensible things on this very subject. He cut loose from the city and found the simple life, and for those who, like Cowley, long for time and room to cultivate their own minds as well as their own fields, a quotation may be permissible.

Says the genial sage: "Since Nature denies to most men the capacity or appetite, and Fortune allows but to a very few the opportunities or possibility, of applying themselves wholly to philosophy, the best mixture of human affairs that we can make are the employments of a country life."

And yet I know that many, like the Prince in the parable, will read these words and turn sadly or scornfully away.

the best I could, an' don't think anything's gone amiss. The money's in on the table there, every cent. The boy means all right, I'm sure."

"Can you tell me how long he has been gone?"

"Two hours, mebbe," reluctantly.

"You could not find a job, you say. How would you like this one of bridge keeping?"

THE old man caught his breath and a look came to his face that momentarily transfigured it. The man in the carriage saw, as he had seen everything, even to the work of the broom and brush and the unusual polish of the foot passenger's gate. But the old man shook his head.

"Thank ye kindly, sir," he said, "but I can't do it. I don't want to get the job away from the boy."

"He has lost it already. If you do not take the place, some one else will. I think we have made a mistake about young blood—what do you say?"

"Why—I—I—yes, an' thank ye," huskily.

"Very well. Here," writing a few words upon a slip of paper and passing it out, "give this to the boy when he returns."

Half an hour later the boy came, breathless.

"Everything all right?" he asked.

Then, as he looked around, "Yes, I see it is. I'm awfully obliged. Why, what's up?" for the old man was looking at him with perturbed face.

"A man stopped here in a carriage an'—an' let me have this paper for ye."

The boy took the slip and read it, his face changing.

"It's from the owner," he gasped, "and says I must come to his office. Well, my jig's up here."

"I'm sorry," the old man said, his face full of genuine sympathy. "I didn't want to tell anything, but he made me."

"Oh, that's all right; if he asked questions of course you had to answer. I guess the trouble's up to me."

An hour later the boy came back, walking very straight, with square shoulders and with a new look on his face.

"I—I hope it wa'n't so bad as ye feared," said the old man anxiously.

"Bad? Well, it couldn't 'a' been worse, exceptin' he's given me another show."

The Book Corner

EVERYONE is talking houses and "back to the land," with only a vague idea of what is desirable in a habitation. "City Homes on Country Lanes," is the alluring title of a book by William E. Smythe, which tells of how a garden home may be ultimately made our own, and achieves the difficult task of uniting inspiration with the toil which comes out of the true vision. It is a book which should be read by all who are interested in modern living conditions. The ideal of the writer is found in the concluding lines:—

"It has been well said that leadership is never conferred; it is assumed. Happy is the community where it is assumed by the right men and women—by those who deeply realize that the New Earth is to be a holy place and that the opportunities to assist in its evolution, in a capacity however humble, is a call to holy service." (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price, $2.75.)

"The Golden Windmill, and other stories," by Stacy Aumonier, (published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price $2.00,) is a collection of short stories deserving of a better fate than usually befalls the volume of short tales. The public, for some mysterious reason, will not take the book of short stories to its heart. Perhaps laziness is the reason for this reluctance—for there is no question about it, the short story in a collection requires a mental readjusting more frequently than the reader is inclined to make. "The Golden Wind-Mill," the first story in the present production, is a tale of a Frenchman's memory of a first and foolish love and is told with a delicacy and sprightliness thoroughly Gallic. Mr. Aumonier is one of the younger writers and his style, in grace and clarity, is a welcome contrast to the slovenliness of the average "best seller."

"Gray Wolf Stories," Indian Mystery tales by Bernard Sexton, illustrated by Wwenyth Waugh (published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto,) makes a delightful addition to the library of the young person and is true to the "mystery" of the sub-title. You are quite willing to believe in lake spirits and wood spirits after you have read the tales which Owl Man and the other worthies are persuaded to tell. The illustrations are stimulating in their piquant intimacy with Indian lore.

What 112 Doctors Told us About caring for a Baby's Skin

By the Head of the Research Laboratories of Bauer & Black

MODERN science has perfected a new and radically different way in infant hygiene.

Its object is to overcome diaper rash and skin irritations, and thus, by relieving discomfort, to make baby's days happier—and mother's days less trying.

It embodies new principles—principles now combined in a remarkable new Bauer & Black requisite—B & B Baby Talc. Note coupon below for liberal test package free.

Supplants Old Methods

Many months were spent perfecting this new way. Old methods were inadequate.

We consulted famous children's specialists, dermatologists, heads of maternity homes—112 in all. We sought a new way—a scientific way—of combating the irritant acids which obtain in perspiration and in urine.

Extensive laboratory experiments were made. Numerous tests effected under the personal direction of a famous baby specialist. Now we believe we have attained the ideal. And highest authorities agree.

Combats the Cause of Irritation

The pores of the skin constantly exude moisture. It is nature expelling impurities from the body. Upon exposure, this perspiration becomes a semi-acid irritant. So does urine. But more intensely so.

These acids make the skin raw, tender—susceptible to rash. Infection often follows. Hence, you must combat them.

B&B Baby Talc
B&B Baby Soap

"A Bauer & Black Product"

It is well to consider the maker behind the product you use. For twenty-eight years Bauer & Black have held the esteem of the medical profession; of druggists and the public; and it jealously guards this standing.

Druggists everywhere sell all B & B Products.

© B & B 1922

Old methods attempted merely to dry the moisture, thus affording but indifferent relief.

B & B Baby Talc combats the irritant body acids—makes them harmless to the skin. It strikes at the cause of irritation. It marks a new era in infant hygiene.

Use it after baby's bath. Sprinkle it on diaper cloths. It is cooling, soothing, gently healing—scientific protection in the charming guise of a soft, white talc.

Try it for two days. Results are quick—and amazing. Note how much smoother baby's skin—how much more restful and happy—for comfortable babies are happy babies.

B & B Baby Soap
"Tempered to the Infant's Skin"

A mother's zeal in keeping her baby sweet and clean, as every doctor knows, frequently finds expression in an unfortunate choice of soap. B & B Baby Soap is made of edible fats. It lathers freely, dries slowly, and rinses off readily. It contains a slight percentage of zinc oxide, hence is mildly healing. Bland and soothing, it provides a safe soap for your baby.

MORE than a score of years ago, a young Canadian poet passed away in Boulder, Colorado, leaving behind her various literary achievements which have been held in remembrance by many friends. Those who knew Evelyn Durand have frequently wished that the work she wrought, during a life which was all too brief, might be collected and given to the world in a volume. In 1921, Miss Laura B. Durand of Toronto fulfilled this wish and has prepared and edited a beautiful memorial edition, "Elsie Le Beau, a Dramatic Idyll and Lyrics and Sonnets," the work of her gifted sister. The writer of these rare poems was a woman of striking personality, with a certain shining quality of intellect, which made her a friend to be remembered and an inspiration in the round of everyday toil. Evelyn Durand was a graduate of the University of Toronto and loved her Alma Mater with a fervor which was that of the true student. She was possessed of a charm and gentleness of manner which made friends of all whom she met and which gave a grace all too rare to any social life in which she had a part. Now, like an echo from a past which was full of music, come these poems, the product of her heart and mind. These lines, written in the hours of weakness, when the "black minute" was drawing very near, may well be the wish of everyone who reads them:

'Remain with me, O Hope, until the last.

That my trained, tranquil eyes may see

Undimmed, whatever there may be Beyond me, when life's border line is past."

THE carnival should be given a more prominent place than it usually has in our winter festivities. Of course the word has an utterly different meaning in Canada to that which it has in New Orleans or in Southern Europe. The carnival in our country means a fancy dress party at the rink:—and it once enjoyed a great vogue. A carnival is really one of the most stimulating affairs imaginable, for it has all the bracing vivacity which comes from out-doors and it has the added piquancy of "being someone else" — which is always the lure of private theatricals. Don't you remember the old-time carnival when you went as "Night," dressed in navy-blue flannel, all sewn with silver stars, and a silvery moon gleaming from the front of your blue Tam-o'-Shanter? There was always a Gypsy Queen and also a Mary, Queen of Scots:—and sometimes there was a Mephisto—a fearsome creature in scarlet and black with a wicked twist to his moustache. There was a troubadour, also a Robin Hood and once there was a burly Henry VIII., who tumbled on his head in the course of a waltz:—much to the delight of Little Bo-Peep. They were quite worth while, those carnivals of long ago, and those who played their fancy parts have been staid and sober citizens these many years.

THERE was a man who was discussing the recent Dominion elections.

"Don't tell me," he said scornfully, "that women are going to purify politics and scrub out the polling booths. They're going to be quite as keen for graft as their brothers. The woman who gets in will have to spend money or be defeated."

A Westclox for $2.00

THE entire Westclox family started the new year with new price tags. Pocket Ben, the husky, double-back watch, has changed his six-cornered, orange-bordered tag to read $2.00.

America, the founder of the Westclox family, now sports a tag which says $2.00 on the price side.

Big Ben and Baby Ben, the best-known Westclox, have set the price of their services at $5.00 each, provided they are not asked to tell time in the dark. With this extra service they ask $7.00.

In between $2.00 and $7.00 are nine styles and prices of Westclox, but only one quality, and that is Westclox.

A heavier case, a larger gong, a special alarm feature, a luminous dial, may make the difference in price.

A timepiece, to earn the right to wear the name Westclox, on its dial, must prove its ability to tell time accurately.

If it has an alarm it must show that it can ring on time as well as run on time.

"Sharp at six. I'm on my way down now. All my things are on board so I might as well be in good time and have a chance to get settled before we start. Good-bye, sir. You may rest assured I shall do my best and I certainly appreciate all you have done for me and this opportunity you've given me.

"Good-bye, my boy."

"Good-bye."

Bob walked along the hall and signalled for an elevator. After a moment's wait it came and, when he had stepped in, sank swiftly downward.

At the tenth floor it paused for a second to admit a small rather elderly gentleman in gray tweeds whose bag of golf sticks betrayed his destination. Bob did not even glance at this arrival so preoccupied was he in his gloomy thoughts.

Again they descended and again halted at the eighth floor. A girl stepped briskly in, a tall girl in a smart, tailored suit, whose black hair waved jauntily out from beneath the flowery brim of the most modish of little hats. Catching sight of Bob she gave a little gasp and the blood drained slowly from her cheeks; partly turning, she made as though to escape before he saw her, but it was too late, already the door was closed and they were going down.

Halfway between the sixth and seventh floors the car stopped abruptly, its door facing a blank wall, and there it stayed.

For the first time Bob looked up and, meeting the eyes of the girl, in his turn gasped and, as she appeared to be about to speak, bowed stiffly and gazed coldly over her head.

The girl (need I say it was Betty), flushed, and her lips trembled, but following his example she ignored his presence and turned abruptly to the elevator operator.

"What is the matter," she demanded imperiously.

"Shure and that's phwat Oi'd like to know, Miss," that individual, who had the map of Ireland plainly displayed in his features, replied imperturbably.

"Hey," he bellowed down the shaft, "phwat the divil's the matter wid yez down there."

They all listened eagerly and then faintly from below came the answer.

"Ah's mighty sorry, Mistuh Flanigan, but dah's somepun gone wrong wid dis hyah ingine. She don' gib no juice somehow. We'lls trying to fix her."

"Howly Saints!" said Flanigan resignedly, "Thot idjit's gummed the workks agin. Such a felly I never see. Tis his thordd week here and 'tis the second time somethin's gone wrong. He's a jinx for sure!"

"But how long is this to continue?" cried Bob. "I've got to catch a boat sailing at six and I can't stay cooped up here all evening!"

"Hey, you Johnson!" bawled Flanigan, stentorianly as before, "How long will it take yez to fix it? There's a gentleman here's in a hurry."

"Mebbe half an houah, Mistah Flanigan. Mebbe mo'. Ah suttently will hustle but ah caint jus' see what is de mattah. Ah's pouahful sorry."

"Ye heard phwat he said," Flanigan jerked his head in the direction of the sorrowful Mr. Johnson. "But you're all right, sorr, we're safe enough here."

"Good Lord! I know we're safe," groaned Bob. "That's not the trouble. If I miss that steamer—" He broke off and gazed moodily at the floor.

The individual in grey tweeds seated himself on the cushioned bench which ran along the side of the car and was soon absorbed in the intricacies of "The Golfer's Manual," which volume he extracted from his pocket.

Betty, following his example, also sat down and looked sadly at the tip of her brown shoe.

Flanigan drew out a copy of the evening paper and, turning to the so-called comic section was soon following the antics of Mutt and Jeff with great gusto, now and then slapping his knee when moved in appreciation of some particularly humorous situation.

Silence reigned.

Presently Bob became aware that someone was standing at his elbow and turning, he encountered the wistful gaze of his ex-fiancee.

"Bob."

"Yes." He dared not trust himself to more than the syllable. Her pleading eyes were unbearable, if he didn't look out he would make a fool of himself again.

"I wanted to say that I'm sorry for what happened last week." Her voice was tremulous but she went on bravely.

"It was my fault. I should have known you would never deceive me. But I was angry at being put off again and so I 'phoned up that miserable little beast. Truly I don't like Dicky Forsyte, Bob, I only did it to make you jealous. I was a p—perfect pig and I've been wretched ever since, so when I heard you say you were going away I wanted to tell you how sorry I was and—and—" her eyes were misty but the soft voice stumbled on, "I hope some day you'll meet a nicer girl, Bob, who'll be a better wife to you than I ever could have been." Here she stopped and fumbled for her handkerchief, that elusive article, never to be found when most needed.

She had spoken softly but every word was clearly audible to Flanigan who, having finished reading of the domestic difficulties of Jiggs and Maggie, had laid down his paper and was surveying the couple with growing interest.

"Shure, and the young felly needn't look so glum," he thought, "A more winsome little colleen t'would be hard to find."

One by one Bob's defences were crumbling, his resolutions were wavering, who was he to stand against the appeal in those pansy eyes, to remain adamant before the piteous quiver of those lovely lips. The barriers went down with a crash.

"Oh, Betty!" he drew closer. "I shall never love another girl, you know that—" and he plunged into eager explanations.

Flanigan watched approvingly.

"Thot's right, young-felly-me-lad," he murmured, "Make a clean breast of it. Why don't you take the young leddy's hand? Shure thot's right! What a tale 'twill be to tell Maria the night!"

"And so," Bob was saying, "you see it was business after all; but when you took it for granted that I was lying to you and wouldn't give me a chance to explain, I got angry and wouldn't tell you about the promotion and the partnership and everything."

"Oh, I'm so ashamed!" She was, indeed, the humble penitent now. "I've been so unhappy all week; I just couldn't bear to stay in town and so I'm going away. I'm sailing at six to-night for Honolulu to join Mother and Dad."

"Begorra, she's as pretty as Mary Pickford," thought Flanigan. "Shure, and it's as good as the movies, so it is!"

Going Down

"To Honolulu!" exclaimed Bob. "Why so am I, on the 'Mariana,' on that trip for the firm that I was telling you about."

"I'm sailing on the 'Mariana too!'" cried Betty.

"Darling," said Bob swiftly, "Will you give me another chance, will you marry me?"

"Yes," Betty answered simply.

And then Flanigan, who had, in his life, beheld five hundred and ninety-seven clinches at the end of the picture, saw one that beat them all to a frazzle.

"Begob, 'tis as handsome as Wallie Reid he is, and he kisses just like him," he reflected admiringly.

At this moment Bob caught his eye fixed on them in unblushing interest and figuratively came to earth, not literally as they were still suspended some hundreds of feet above it.

"Betty," he said determinedly, "Will you marry me before the boat sails, if we get out of this place in time?"

"Yes," said Betty.

"If only we could get a clergyman here!" he broke out, half joking, half despairingly, "It would save so much time."

The gentleman in grey tweeds laid down the "Golfer's Manual" and, seeming to perceive for the first time that he was not alone, said politely, "Did I hear you mention clergymen, my dear sir?"

"I said I wished we had a clergyman here," explained Bob.

"Well," he smiled on them blandly, "I myself am a member of the clerical—er—shall we say profession? If I can be of any service?"

"What," Bob and Betty cried simultaneously.

"Why, yes," he assured them, "I am the pastor of St. James'. You have perhaps heard of my name," and he drew a card from his pocket.

"Mr. Richards," said Bob solemnly, glancing at the card, "Will you marry me here and now to this young lady?"

"My dear sir," the Rev. Mr. Richards was plainly taken aback, "How could I? You are surely joking!"

"No, indeed," Bob was emphatic, "Never was more serious in my life. Come on, be a sport!"

"But one has to have a license and a ring and," the clergyman murmured confusedly, "and as you haven't got them—" he ended triumphantly.

"Haven't I just!" exulted Bob, as he drew a flat package from his pocket. "Here's the license and here's the ring."

"How in the world?" gasped Betty.

"I got them the same day Mr. Hopwood told me of the promotion, intending to ask you to marry me before I sailed and to come with me on my trip. After—that night—I couldn't bear to throw away the ring or to tear up the license and so I was taking them with me like this and when we'd got to the deepest part of the ocean I was going to drop them overboard, but now" he laughed joyously, "now I won't!"

"Bedad, and 'twas the far-sighted young felly you was," remarked Flanigan.

"You," Bob whirled on him, "can be the witness, and you," he shot at the somewhat dazed Mr. Richards, "will marry us."

"Oh, my dear children!" he began again, "You can't really—"

But Bob cut all his protestations short and having convinced him as to the validity of the license and explained the circumstances, obtained his consent.

So they were married, hanging between heaven and earth, with the admiring Flanigan as witness, best man and bridesmaid all in one, and seventeen minutes to go.

Just as the benediction was pronounced the voice of the luckless Johnson came up the shaft.

"Say, whut's de mattuh wid you-all up dah. De pouah's been on fo' ten minutes!"

"Going down!" shouted the delighted Flanigan; wouldn't Maria take a fit when she heard of these goings on! But wait till she saw the fine new hat he'd be after buying her with the crisp bill that had just found its way into his hand.

"Going down!" murmured the Rev. John Richards, smiling as he thought of that long coveted new mashie which he would now be able to afford.

"Going down!" echoed Betty and Bob jubilantly, as, at fourteen minutes to six they dashed out of the building, hailed a taxi and sped boatwards, man and wife.

At exactly one half minute to six, as the gang planks began to rattle, a tall young man and a flushed and pretty young girl raced hand in hand down the pier, just in time.

Late that night two people could have been seen standing, very close together, at the side of the ship, gazing at the twinkling stars overhead. It was dark and the outlines were misty, in fact sometimes it would almost seem as though there was only one outline instead of two.

"Betty," whispered the man.

"Yes, dear."

"Do you know what I am going to do, the very first thing when we get home?"

"No, what is it?"

"I'm going to send the biggest, juiciest water-melon I can find to Mr. Johnson!"

After all, I believe there was only one outline!

The Red of Wintertime

What is the prettiest winter red there is? The red of a winter sunset, edged with purple or gold? The red of young cheeks, fresh with the frosty air? You have so many to choose from, and yet so few have thought of the red winter velvet.

The snow is deep in the clearings, and at the woods' edge, and the white drifts make a background against which the pompons of the velvet sumach glow in their rich warmth. The leaves of the sumach have gone with the autumn, but the cone-shaped seed-clusters, covered with a wine-colored fuzz, seem to tell you that each sumach, although a winter-sleeping plant, is snug and cosy beneath its rich, red velvet cap.

They Have Found

A better way to clean teeth

Dental science has found a better way to clean teeth. Modern authorities approve it. Leading dentists everywhere advise it. Millions of people already employ it.

A ten-day test is offered to anyone who asks. Get it and see the delightful effects. Learn what this new way means.

Combats the Film

You feel on your teeth a viscous film. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. The tooth brush, used in old ways, does not end it. So nearly everyone has suffered from some film attack.

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film.

New-day Methods

After diligent research, methods have been found to fight film. Careful tests have amply proved them. Now they are being very widely adopted, largely by dental advice.

Made in Canada

Pepsodent CANADA

The New-Day Dentifrice

A scientific film combatant, whose every application brings five desired effects. Approved by highest authorities, and now advised by leading dentists everywhere. All druggists supply the large tubes.

The methods are embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. They can thus be twice daily applied. And to millions they are bringing a new dental era.

Important effects

Pepsodent combats the film in two effective ways. It also aids Nature in three ways which faulty diet makes essential.

It stimulates the salivary flow—Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

These things should be daily done for better tooth protection.

See the benefits

Send the coupon for a 10-day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear. Watch the other good effects.

The Little Gray Clock

By Winifred Scott

IN the dim long ago when one of the old kings sat on the throne of England there was a nobleman who loved a lady. Nothing strange 'tis true, but it had an effect on two other lives many years afterwards. This nobleman—his name was Robert, Earl of Surrey—wished to make his lady-love a present, something out of the ordinary. Suddenly he be-thought himself of a clock, a little gray clock to match "my lady's boudoir." And so the clock was made, a quaint fragile thing of a delicate gray with the words engraved on it "Ye little gray clock to bring my Ladye happiness." What the lady thought of the clock, and what hap-pened, is another story—but long af-terwards in a little antique shop in 1914 the clock appeared and seven years after that—But that is where the story begins.

It was a large room—a room meant to be filled with beautiful things. Perhaps it had been once and that made it seem all the more bare now, for there was but a chair and a table in it—and on the mantle-piece a little gray clock. A girl sat in the room looking pensively into the fire that burned in the grate. The little clock ticked on "tick-tock," then chimed the hour of seven. The girl started and looked at the paper that she held in her hand. It was an advertisement her eyes rested on: "For sale—antique gray clock with inscription 'Ye little gray clock to bring my Ladye happiness' on it. Apply—Miss Marjorie Winterburn, 208 Maple Avenue."

Her eyes grew misty, "Little gray clock," she murmured "where did my happiness go?"

The fire was burning low. There was not a sound in the room but the ticking of the clock.

The girl in the chair sat still look-ing into the glowing coals. Memori-es crowded back upon her.

It was a little antique shop she saw before her and a man and a girl poking here and there amongst the counters. The girl was herself, a radiant joyous creature, excitedly pointing out treasures to her com-panion. Suddenly the man spied something on a back shelf, and bring-ing it out, discovered it to be a clock, a little, gray clock—the same clock that ticked above the mantle-piece.

"Marjorie," he cried, "the very thing! It seems to have been made specially. Wouldn't you like it for an engagement present, darling? To bring my Ladye happiness." He turned to the shop-keeper, "I will take it," he announced.

"Marjorie, it's yours. And it will bring you happiness, I'm sure of that."

The scene changed. She was in the same room she sat in now—the same yet different. Beautiful old fur-niture filled it, a gorgeous carpet was on the floor and almost priceless pic-tures covered the walls.

But she had no eyes for any of it. Her attention was fixed on a khaki-clad figure in the middle of the room.

"Marjorie," he said, "I have come to say good-bye. We sail for France to-night."

"Jim, Jim," she cried, and was in his arms.

"Dear one," he comforted "don't cry and don't, don't worry. You know I'll come back to you — a 'bloomin' 'ero 'neverthing."

She forced a smile through her tears.

"Listen to the clock, Marjorie. It's ticking away as cheerfully as ever. Don't forget it is your happiness clock. Dear, dear, little girl!"

The fire was getting lower. The far-away look was still in Marjorie's eyes as the memories crowded one af-ter another.

The scenes were darker now. It was winter. There had been no word from Jim for several weeks. He had been over there almost two years. They should have been married by now. What dreams they had dream-ed together! If he would only come home! A knock at the door—a tele-gram, "Lieutenant James Dennisor reported missing."

The agony of those days of waiting and no word! They had tried in vain to find trace of him.

And that was five years ago—five whole years. She had been eighteen, in the first happy days of her en-gagement, now she was twenty-five. "Twenty-five and an old maid" she thought.

"Tick-tock, tick-tock. Non-sense Non-sense, non-sense," said the clock.

She glanced again around the room. What changes those last five years had brought!

Her father and mother had died within a week of each other and she had been left alone in the world:—alone with no business experience. Her money had dwindled away and for the last six months she had been forced to sell her belongings, one by

How I Make $18 to $20 a Week -Right at Home - Without "Going to Work"

"I have now given up all idea of going back into an office to work," writes Miss Cummings. "I often wonder why more girls do not stay at home and do this pleasant, profitable work instead of going to business." Read Miss Cummings' remarkable story in her own words.

By Amy D. Cummings

AS the train slowed down and stopped at our little country station, I found that I lacked my usual happiness in coming home.

I loathed myself for ever getting sick and having to give up my business position in the city.

Two years' work in an office had changed me, and when I got home everyone said,

"Why, Amy, how thin you are!"

My purse was thin too, but I didn't care—at least I tried to make myself believe I didn't.

Country air and rest soon did their work—built me up and made me well and strong again—but my purse was still very empty. It was necessary for me to earn money, for my father is a farmer and the prices of farm products had dropped very low, leaving other prices still soaring.

I was entertaining very serious intentions of returning to the city and getting another office position.

Then, on coming in one day, I found my mother all smiles. She was absorbed in a magazine article, and as I entered the room she read these words aloud,

"How I Make Money at Home"

"By hunting eggs and milking cows," I answered flippantly.

She only smiled and said:

"Read this, Amy!"

I took the magazine and read the page. It gave the experience of a woman whose husband's income was insufficient. She felt she just had to make extra money but could not leave her home and children to work outside. Finally she heard of a hand-knitting machine called the "Auto-Knitter." The company that manufactured it offered to make a contract with each owner of a machine to pay for all the woolen socks made with it—and to replace the yarn. The rest of the article told how the "Auto Knitter" helped this woman make the money she needed.

Well, this sounded as good to me as it had to mother, and the result was that we wrote to the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company for the particulars, and later secured one of the hand-knitting machines.

"The Auto Knitter" justifies the saying, "good goods are done up in small parcels" for it is small and light, easy to clamp on any table and equally easy to run. Many of our neighbors soon called to see it, and the "Auto Knitter" was quite the topic of conversation for a while.

When we had learned to run the machine, and people saw the splendid socks it made, two or three of our friends began seriously to consider getting Auto Knitters themselves.

The company is always ready to accept and pay for socks made according to their directions and their wage checks come back very promptly, together with the replacement yarn.

I have now given up all idea of going back into a city office to work, for I am making from eighteen to twenty dollars a week with the Auto Knitter, and I do it without leaving the protection of my home. I have earned all my spring clothes, and a very coveted wrist watch, too. Besides I have a fund that is to pay for a trip this summer.

I often wonder why more girls do not stay at home and do this pleasant profitable work instead of going to business. Some girls think, of course, that there is no fun in the country. This idea is largely based on the fact that milking cows and other farm work doesn't appeal very strongly to most girls. At least it didn't to me.

But give those same girls a way to make money and have nice clothes, minus the slavish work, and they would probably think the same as I do—that a home in the country is the best place in the world.

It takes me ten minutes to make a sock, on the average, and my younger sister can knit with the machine almost as well as I can.

Mamma has never regretted getting the Auto Knitter for me, and I am delighted to have this way of making money at home, for now I am my own manager.

Instead of more than half my wages going for board and carfare, as they used to in the city, I have the cash I make for home comforts and many other things I have longed and wished for. Mamma is writing too. She wants to tell you what she thinks of the Knitter.

Miss A. D. Cummings, Ontario.

* * *

The following letter was received from Miss Cummings' mother. It gives additional interesting news about what the Auto Knitter means to the Ontario farm home.

This is certainly a strenuous time we are living in, especially for those who have daughters who are obliged to enter city life to earn their own living in business offices, factories, or stores—at salaries of $10.00 to $15.00 a week. Out of this a girl has to pay $8.00 a week for board and $2.00 for carfare.

The old saying, "working life out to keep life in" surely came true in the experience of our girl in business, and to make matters worse, she contracted the "flu." This left her rundown in health and she was obliged to come home in the fall for a rest.

How we longed for a way to keep our dear girl at home with us all the time.

Finally, as my daughter has written, we found out about the "Auto Knitter" and the company's offer to buy socks made on the machine.

We sent for one and our girl was very much pleased with it. With the aid of the splendid instruction book knit a pair she could of socks in an hour the next day after receiving the machine. Of course practice made her more speedy, for now she finds no difficulty in making a pair in twenty minutes.

This means an average of $3.00 a day, or $18.00 to $20.00 a week and that only by working the same hours as required in a city business office.

Instead of paying out all her money for board she can dress nicely, and take her holidays when she wishes. Besides earning clothes our former business girl and her sister have helped to make the home more beautiful by adding some new articles of furniture, a new rug for the parlor and new window hangings.

Our girls tell their papa they are planning on having a moist-air pipeless furnace installed in our home this coming winter—and that the Auto Knitter will pay for it.

My husband says a knitting machine like the "Auto Knitter" is more necessary in a home than a sewing machine—and we all know what a sewing machine means to a family.

Just to think—the only expense we had was for the machine and the first supply of yarn, as the company replaces the yarn each time we send them socks. In addition, they pay express charges when we send to dozen pairs of socks at a time. We consider the "Auto Knitter" a good investment and a boon—for it keeps our girls at home.

Our own town merchants highly appreciate the work the Auto Knitter does and we have received several good orders to fill for their winter trade.

How You Too Can Make Money at Home

Miss Cummings' experience which you have just read in her own words, is only one of many. She has been one of our most successful Auto Knitter workers, for she gives regular business hours to the work, but we have hundreds and hundreds of letters from other women, and men too, telling of their success in varying degrees according to the time devoted to the work, and how they made the extra money they needed—without leaving their homes or neglecting their families. So why shouldn't YOU do it too!

The Auto Knitter Hosiery Company has helped to solve the "extra money problem" for home women because it offers steady, regular, well paid home work. There is no expense for materials after the first. There are no strings tied to the Wage Agreement; it is a straight, out-and-out offer at a fixed wage, on a piece-work basis—a good pay for your services.

The Auto Knitter comes to you with a sock already started in it, and a complete instruction book that makes everything plain. You will enjoy the pleasant work and it will enable you to have many of the pretty things to wear and the new things for the home that you have wanted, besides supplying money for other purposes.

"No one! It's you—yourself! And I hate you!"

He stood in consternation, with his eyes upon her bowed head, while the old clock ticked away the pregnant seconds.

"I'm sorry if I have done wrong," he said awkwardly, at last. "I don't know what I have done — I never meant to offend you—"

"You though it would please me, then? Thank you for your high opinion of me!" she said, with a miserable attempt at irony thrusting the gaudy Valentine towards him while her voice choked in her throat.

Tom, quite bewildered, let his eyes follow her gesture. He lifted the caricature and scrutinized it, turning it over in his hands without gaining any enlightenment from it.

"What has this to do with me?" he enquired finally, laying it down again.

"You sent it to me!"

"Oh no—I never sent a Valentine in my life!"

"Isn't this your writing?" She thrust forward the sheet of paper in which it had been folded.

He regarded it with rising color, while into his mind flashed the recollection of the evening when Charlie had caught him blissfully inscribing that dear name.

"Yes, I wrote it," he confessed, beginning to see light. "What about it?"

"It enclosed the—the Valentine!"

He looked at the paper thoughtfully. "I wrote your name there," he said, and raised to her face candid eyes that she could not doubt—"for I had pleasure in writing it—it seems a beautiful name, and suited to you in every way. But I did not send it to you, nor any Valentine. I do not think that under the circumstances I would ever send such a thing as that to any one. . . Sylvia!" his voice was deep, and there was earnest pleading in it—"I want you to believe me—I want you to understand that I could not knowingly, intentionally hurt you! I didn't do it — is that enough?"

She stood up and faced him, seeking the truth in his eyes.

"I want to believe you—indeed I do!" she said simply. "I just couldn't bear to think—you—you would do such a thing — Now I know you didn't! And so it doesn't matter any more—"

She tore the papers into fragments, and dropped them into the wastebasket. He beamed upon her gladly. It was all right again—his dreams shone rosy in the bright light of anticipation, and the world was his for the taking. So he leaned towards her, remembering his errand.

"What time shall we start away for the concert tonight?" he asked.

And while her lips faltered the hour, her shy eyes gave him another message—the message he longed for—the Hope, the Promise of his dreams!

THE ONLY THING I AM AFRAID OF

"Doctor, it is the only thing I am afraid of. But O, I am terrified of it! I have such a dread of it!"

"I'll tell you all about it," said the Doctor—"and when I get through you will tell me how you feel about it then."

CANCER WEEK.

Of course you know what my patient was afraid of. Our American friends, who are really very clever and do a great deal of good work, what with their population—(now over one hundred and ten million, I am told), their immense fortunes, and their great country,—nearly as large as Canada—they do, as I was saying, a great deal of good work. And one of their little plans has been to have a "Cancer Week"—so as to catch all those who sleep in the daytime and wake them up about Cancer. It will do good, this plan of having a "Cancer Week." It will also do some harm, and the quivering face of my patient showed me that she was one of those who had been harmed. She had suffered a mental traumatism.

A MENTAL TRAUMATISM.

What is a mental traumatism?—O—it is quite simple, when you understand it. You know what a bruise is?—Well—a mental traumatism is a mental bruise. You get "one in the eye", as the boys say, and everybody sees the bruise—on your face—the so-called "Black Eye." It goes through all the regular stages for a week or ten days—Blue-black, red, yellow—gradually fading away and you look respectable again. But the mental bruise is slower in healing and disappearing. The Nervous System—especially the brain, and the ruler of the brain, which is the mind, (whatever that is)! when they suffer a blow, are pretty slow in recovering unless you are fortunate enough to intercept the blow before the bruise is too deep. Then it is all the other way. If you can "catch up with" that mental traumatism before it has gone too deep—before it has done too much damage—your patient will recover almost instantly, if you know how to treat her. The black eye does take ten days to recover. But the bruised mind may recover in ten minutes if we can only get that bruising pressure lifted off it.

SO TERRIFIED

Well then. What about this patient? She is so terrified of Cancer that she cannot think clearly on this subject. But the Doctor can think. He knows. All he has to do is to place before the patient's mind the truth about Cancer and the cloud over her mind, which keeps her from thinking sensibly on this subject, will evaporate before the rays of the truth. The great comfort is that she came and told me she was afraid. You cannot see a bruise on the mind as easily as you can a black eye.

And if she had not told me, I could not have cured her. It is hard for people with bruised minds to tell anyone, even the Doctor, what is the matter. Sometimes they are afraid. Sometimes they are ashamed. Sometimes they think the Big Doctor driving round the streets so grandly will laugh. But he won't, if he is a Real Doctor. Try him and see.

THE TRUTH ABOUT CANCER.

What is Cancer? A bad disease? Yes.

Do many people die of it? Yes, but that does not mean that you or any of your family are going to die of it. Nor does it mean that you or they are ever going to have it.

Do more people die of it now than formerly? Well—we are not very sure of that. For reasons which will be plain to you, we are not sure how many died of it in former times. One of the plainest of these reasons is that we know a little more about Cancer than we formerly did and so when people die of Cancer we are more likely to know it was Cancer they died of and not something else. That makes the number appear larger.

AGE MAKES A DIFFERENCE

And then people live on the average about twenty-five or thirty years longer than they used to in 1600 A.D. So there are twenty-five or thirty more years in which any disease may affect them. And besides that, it is in these extra thirty years, which have been added to our average life-span that people are more likely to have Cancer. Babies do not die of Cancer you know. That is one peril the Baby will not have to meet till he is grown-up. "Being a Baby is the most hazardous of all occupations," but Cancer is not one of the hazards.

There are few exceptions to the rule that Cancer does not affect people under forty years of age.

A NEW GROWTH.

We do not use the word Cancer at all, among ourselves, we Doctors. We have a fine variety of forty words or so to express the little we know about origin, location and other points. One of the most sensible words we use is "Neoplasm," a word simply meaning "New Growth".

NEW CELLS.

For Cancer is a new growth. You know that your body, every tissue of it, every part of it, from skin to centre, is built of cells. These are structures so small that you cannot see one cell without the aid of a microscope. But put a million cells or so in one pile, and you can see them. When you take off your black silk stockings to-night—or your woolen stockings, (which sensible people wear in winter), and turn them inside out, you will see, if you look closely, a little fine white dust, which you will probably call "scales", powdered on the inside of your stockings.

Complexion Secrets

What Scientists Know About Your Skin

A CLEAR, radiant, youthful complexion, what else but internal cleanliness can produce it? A clean system is the originator of charm, the handmaid to beauty, the basis of personal attractiveness. The texture of your skin, the brightness of your eyes and the sheen and lustre of your hair, all depend upon cleanliness—internal cleanliness. Truly, the fastidious woman keeps clean inside. She is careful to see that her bodily organs function properly, particularly those organs that eliminate waste from the body. If these do not act regularly and thoroughly, poisons are formed, absorbed by the blood and carried to the great covering of the body, the skin. They poison the skin cells, causing facial blemishes, muddy skin and sallowness. These poisons are the most common cause of personal unattractiveness.

Result of Research

Experts have conducted exhaustive research to find some method of eliminating these poisons in a harmless and natural way and thus keep the system clean.

The result of their experience in treating thousands of cases has been the discovery that Nujol has the unique property of dissolving readily many intestinal poisons. These it carries out of the body along with the food residue as Nature intended.

It thus promotes internal cleanliness by preventing the insidious poisoning of the skin cells, the most common cause of skin troubles.

This is why so many women have found Nujol to be an invaluable aid to a clear, radiant, youthful complexion.

Nujol is for sale by druggists everywhere.

A Community Canning Centre

came, on the same day, to the Centre and worked there side by side.

A shipment of blueberries came in from Northern Ontario and it was decided to test the Centre. Those who worked there that day will never forget the experience. The steam was turned on and the vats were bubbling in three minutes. But while the vats bubbled, they leaked hot water at the bottom and hotter steam at the top until the place was like an Inferno. Then the water was turned off by the town authorities who were making repairs, the steam died down and every face showed the dismay felt by all. One woman was sent out to get water and she did it by the simple expedient of climbing over the wheel into a passing farmer's empty hay-rack, making him drive down to the foundry, hitch his horse to a tank and haul it full of water to the Centre. Two women, with brooms, spent the rest of the day sweeping the floor clear of water; but the steam had to be endured. It filled the small room in which the vats were installed, until a Turkish bath was mild in comparison. and in this steam, the women worked. At night, they emerged limp, red of face, but undaunted. They had their Canning Centre.

That first year, everything was cooked in glass sealers in the vats. Chickens, vegetables and fruits were donated by Institutes and Red Cross Societies in Middlesex and surrounding counties. These were canned and sent overseas for use in Canadian military hospitals. Some work was done for the community, but, the thought of benefit for themselves was soon lost in the desire which grew in their hearts to send some home dainties to the lads who lay on beds of pain far from home and all their dear ones. And when a letter from "over there" told of how one Park-hill boy had eaten some of the canned chicken, the efforts of the women were all well repaid. That year, the materials were donated to the Canning Centre, the Canning Centre product was donated to the hospitals and the expenses were met by concerts, cash donations, teas and in other ways.

The second year a new work-room was built at the rear of the Armory, partly by volunteer work. Carpenters, painters, masons and helpers all contributed their services and when the Canning Centre opened for work, a large airy work-room had taken the place of the small room where the escaping steam had left the walls guiltless of color or varnish. The work was still done in glass sealers and for overseas.

The third year saw an important change. Canning in tin cans was introduced and the plant was changed accordingly. Instead of the steam-heated vats, in which vegetables were cooked from two to three hours, large retorts were installed. In these the cans could be placed under five or ten pounds of steam and the cooking process reduced to less than one hour. A capping machine, whereby the lids were put on the cans, was also installed with an accompanying gasoline engine and the Centre began to look more like an up-to-date plant, in which machinery did the work and saved the woman-power that was formerly expended. And there is need to carry this idea farther and it is hoped that cranes and belts will lift and carry in the Centre in the near future. It has been found that the Centre can turn out cans in factory proportions and does much of this by hand work, where the factory has machinery. Of course, the preparation of the fruit and vegetables for the cans must always remain the work of the women, if the Centre is to continue to turn out a home-made product. But the carrying and lifting, the laborious part, can be done much easier than at present, and the physical strength of the women can be conserved.

Last year another large steam-jacketed copper kettle was added in which to make brines, jellies, jams or syrups, and the work reached unbelievable proportions. Fifteen thousand cans and about five hundred sealers were the season's output and this would have been much greater only that more cans could not be obtained. About seven thousand tins were sold to the Government for use in the S. C. R. hospitals in Canada and the other half of the output was community work and went into homes in town and in country in this district.

And all this has been a growth without organization. It has shown what can be done and more than anything else, it has shown that with organization, a Canning Centre for the community is possible. But the rural women must group together or be grouped together and come to the centre as a group, not as scattered individuals.

Take an ideal community day at the Centre. Five families from the country, comprising men and women, came to do their work in the morning. They brought 25 bushels of tomatoes with them. The women sat at long tables running the length of the work-room and peeled the tomatoes and placed all the tins. The engineer capped the tins and placed them in the retorts, turned on the steam and watched the cooking process. The men of the party did all the heavy work, such as lifting the corn and tomatoes out of the vats where they were blanched. In this way they assisted with the woman's work just as the woman so often assists with the men's work on the farm. At noon these five families took home with them 360 tins at a cost of twelve cents a tin. If this work had been done in the homes, with a boiler equipment it would have meant spreading the work that was done in the Centre in a few hours, over weeks of time. For, while vegetables cooked in less than an hour in the retorts, to do vegetables at home means boiling them for three days in succession. And the kettles and retorts in the Centre all come to the boiling point in three minutes after the steam is turned on.

In the afternoon of that same day, four more families came in with corn and tomatoes and went through the same process and went home at night with their cans. They had a covered-in two-wheeled cart attached to their auto and this cart fairly groaned with its load of good things.

The tins which held the vegetables and fruit cost from 4½ to 6 cents, and the other six cents paid for overhead expenses such as fuel, engineer's salary, repairs and general wear and tear. If a proper system of organization existed among the rural women and the Centre were used by different groups day after day, it would be a self-supporting proposition and the patrons of the Centre would lay in their winter supply of fruit and vegetables, at a fraction above actual cost.

In a community where there is a butter factory or a cheese factory where steam is available, any rural community can have a small centre for a small outlay and men and women working together there can fill the cellar shelves to overflowing with the products of the farm gar-

ROYAL YEAST CAKES

Canadian Made

As a health builder, Royal Yeast is gaining in popularity every day. It is a food - not a medicine. It supplies the vitamins which the diet may lack. Royal Yeast is highly beneficial in cases where the system seems "run down". Royal Yeast is the richest known source of vitamins, and when taken into the system acts as a corrective agent. Royal Yeast Cakes are recommended for their purity and wholesomeness. It is the purest, the most convenient and economical yeast on the market.

Two to four Royal Yeast Cakes a day will work wonders. A full day's supply can easily be prepared at one time by using one glass lukewarm water and teaspoon sugar to each yeast cake. Allow to stand over night in moderately warm room. In the morning stir well and pour off liquid. Place in refrigerator or other cool place and drink at intervals as desired throughout the day.

Chafing Dish Cookery

ned shrimp, one-half cupful of boiled rice, one tablespoonful of tomato sauce, one-half cupful of milk, salt, pepper and red pepper to taste. Stir gently until boiling, then allow to simmer for a few minutes and serve hot.

Creamed Peas. Heat two cupfuls of cooked peas in boiling water, and then drain well. Melt one tablespoonful of butter in the blazer, add four tablespoonfuls of cream and allow it to heat, then add the peas, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, a pinch of sugar, salt and pepper to taste. Stir over the flame for two minutes, but do not allow the mixture to boil. Serve with toast or toasted crackers.

Savory Bread Slices. Cut two slices from one loaf of bread, remove the crust, and make into finger-shaped pieces. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in the blazer of the chafing dish, fry the bread until brown on both sides, and then drain it. Now add to the fat left in the pan two tablespoonfuls of cooked ham or tongue, two tablespoonfuls of grated cheese, one-half cupful of stock or milk, and season highly with salt, pepper, paprika and mustard, and stir over the flame until very hot. Spread this mixture on the pieces of fried bread and serve at once.

Stewed Kidneys. Split four sheep's kidneys, skin and remove the core, then cut them in slices, toss them in flour seasoned with salt and pepper. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in the blazer, and, when smoking hot put in the kidneys and one small chopped onion, and stir them about until brown, then add one cupful of stock or water, and mix well. Now place the blazer over the hot water pan cover and cook slowly for fifteen minutes, or until the kidney is tender. Serve with fingers of dry toast or crackers.

Dried Beef. In the blazer put one tablespoonful of butter and one cupful of milk, when hot put in one-half pound of dried beef, chopped very fine, and cook until well heated, about six minutes, then slowly stir in three beaten eggs, and when thick add salt, pepper and paprika to taste. Serve on fried bread or toast.

Lobster With Tomatoes. Canned lobster may be used for this, cut it in small pieces, and rub sufficient tomatoes through a sieve to make one-half cupful. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in the blazer over the hot water pan, put in the lobster, and cook it for five minutes. Then add the tomato puree, one-half cupful of stock, seasoning to taste, make thoroughly hot and then serve.

Ragout of Cold Veal. Slice thin one pound of roast veal across the grain, salt and pepper lightly, and warm in the following sauce: Put into the blazer four tablespoonfuls of butter and when hot, stir in two tablespoonfuls of flour and cook until well blended, then add one teaspoonful of onion juice, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, one-fourth teaspoonful of paprika, and two cupfuls of stock, stir and cook for five minutes, then add the veal and cook until thoroughly heated. Pass currant jelly or lemon quarters. A plain unbuttered sandwich is relished with this ragout. Cut bread in fingers and lay a boned sardine between. Or, cut cold veal in small neat slices. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in the blazer, and when beginning to brown, mix in four tablespoonfuls of flour, stir and cook until blended, then add one cupful of brown stock, and stir until boiling. Then place the blazer over the pan of hot water, add two tablespoonfuls of red currant jelly, the meat and seasonings to taste. Cover, and cook until thoroughly hot. Mutton may be used instead of veal in above recipe.

Scrambled Eggs. Beat up four eggs with four tablespoonfuls of cold water and season with salt and pepper. Heat four tablespoonfuls of butter in the blazer, and as soon as it is hot, but before it browns, pour in the eggs and stir gently, but constantly, with a wooden spoon. As soon as the eggs are of a creamy consistency that will not run, but are yet soft and juicy, they are ready for serving. Pile on hot buttered toast. A moment's too long cooking will harden and spoil the eggs. Pass orange marmalade or whipped cream. Scrambled eggs may be varied by mixing with them any other ingredient desired. One tablespoonful of chopped parsley, or one fourth teaspoonful of powdered herbs, gives a good flavor and makes a simple change. Or, three tablespoonfuls of grated cheese and a little mustard may be added, or the same amount of cooked peas may be added.

A Variety of Recipes

Home-made cake is good all the year around and especially at the holiday time. It is well to say that if cake making is to be a success only the best ingredients should be used. Collect all utensils and ingredients before beginning. Regulate the oven, so that it will be ready as soon as the cake is mixed. Use a measuring cup and standard spoons. Flour should be sifted before measuring and use pastry flour if possible, as it makes a more tender cake than bread flour. A cake is usually done when it shrinks from the sides of the pan. The properly baked cake should be level with the top of the pan and uniformly brown. When the cake is cold, put it into airtight tins, unless when it is frosted.

Walnut Cake. Beat three tablespoonfuls of butter with three-fourths cupful of brown sugar until creamy, add the yolks of two beaten eggs, beat again and add one cupful of milk, one-half teaspoonful each of powdered nutmeg, cloves and allspice, two cupfuls of flour sifted with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and a saltspoonful of salt, then add one and one-fourth cupfuls of chopped English walnut meats, and the whites of eggs beaten to a stiff froth. Turn into a flat buttered and floured cake tin, and bake in a moderate oven for forty minutes. Cool, cover with milk frosting, decorate with halves of walnut meats and chopped nut meats. To make the milk frosting, melt one tablespoonful of butter in a saucepan, then add one and one-half cupfuls of sugar and one-half cupful of milk, boil gently for fifteen minutes without stirring, add one-fourth teaspoonful of lemon extract, beat until stiff and spread over the cake.

Honey Drops. Pour three tablespoonfuls of honey into one cupful of boiling water, put it into a saucepan, add two cupfuls of sugar and two tablespoonfuls of butter. Boil slowly until it forms a soft ball when tested in cold water, then pour it over the whites of two eggs that have been beaten to a stiff froth, and add one teaspoonful of orange extract. Beat the mixture until cold and just as stiff as you can handle, and drop by spoonfuls on a buttered pan or a sheet of waxed paper.

You shake your stockings and hang them up to air till morning. Quite right.

OLD CELLS.

But if you want to know, these "scales" are little heaps of old, worn-out cells, of your skin pushed up gradually from the bottom, or lowest layer of the skin, which is where the young cells of the skin grow. The part next to your body is the "front line" of the skin. The cells there are plump, rather rounded, and with a highly important centre which is called a nucleus. By and by these new cells are pushed up one layer by the next generation of cells that come into life and function and push the last generation another row further up, and so on, till at last they reach the surface, no longer round, useful, living cells, but flat worn-out cells—squeezed flat, no nucleus, no contents—no body—nothing. They were "squamous" a little while ago—that is, flat. Now they hardly deserve that name, for they are only a little dust when you shake the white powder off the inside of your black stockings.

WONDERFUL CELLS.

This all sounds very simple. But it is not quite so simple as it seems. A cell is a microcosm—that is—a whole little world in itself and (though we know but little) what we have learned about the cell and its life has filled a whole library of medical books. Each cell has its own body, its own character, its own colour and structure and its own special duties.

THIEF CELLS

But what has all this to do with Cancer, you say. Just this. A Cancer is made up of cells too. But the peculiar and dangerous thing about cancer-cells is that they are all young cells. Besides, they are not "well-built". They have no proper proportion, as it were. They are not controlled by the laws of normal growth. They multiply with terrifying rapidity. And they steal nourishment and life from the normal "well-behaved", useful tissues and organs of the body.

Cancer cells are no manner of use in the body. They are "ill-behaved". They are "Thief Cells." And by their enormous irregular multiplication they cause sickness and finally death. I thought you might like to have a true and sensible explanation of what Cancer really is. But what you, my intelligent reader, want to know is—"What really is Cancer?" And how you may guard yourself and your neighbour from the danger of Cancer. Well, you see the first point. The trouble is that Cancer cells break the laws of growth. But how do these cells get that baleful idea of wrong growth "into their heads," as it were. What makes good useful cells in the body change to cells that grow wrongly, never mature, and are never useful—but act like outlaws?

A PARTIAL ANSWER.

We can now give a partial answer to that question. The cause seems, in some cases, to be irritation. Take, for example, Cancer of the Tongue. In many, many cases it has been found that some source of irritation, such as a broken tooth next to the tongue, or a badly diseased tooth, or a wart on the tongue, or a "Smoker's burn" on the tongue, has made a "sore place" on the tongue.

A SORE PLACE.

That is Nature's first warning to you. You are too busy to be bothered about it? What a fool you are! Never have a sore place in your mouth or on your tongue, or anywhere else in your body without having it attended to right away. Go to a good Doctor—and the sooner the better. Next week?—No—not next week. Go to-day—or at the longest, on the third day. And count your days this way. You felt that sore place the day before yesterday, didn't you? Yes. Well then, that was the first day. Yesterday was the second day and to-day is the third day.

THINK.

When I say "A Sore Place", I do not mean a scratch on your finger, you know,—or a black and blue mark where you struck your leg against a chair in the dark. You know what I mean. I mean a sore place that you know should not be there. Now don't faint from fright the next time you bite your tongue! That is all right. It will be better to-morrow. But a broken tooth that was broken last month and is still broken and has rubbed a raw place on the side of your tongue is one clear warning to you to go to your Dentist and have your teeth put in first class order. You had better go the same day to your own family physician and have him look at the sore place on your tongue. Do what he tells you. He knows better than you do.

THE FIRST AND LAST WARNING.

You may never have another warning. Next time it may be too late. The sore place which once you could feel, better than you could see, is now red and angry. It can be seen only too plainly. The centre is deep. The sides are "heaped-up" or thickened. The most skillful surgeon cannot help you much now, though he could easily have done so if you had gone within three days of your first warning. Because at first the "Thief Cells" were only a few. They had not spread more than $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch. They were in a little "nest" as they always are at the beginning. Nothing is easier to the surgeon than to get rid of that dangerous little place if he is called in time. He just takes it out skillfully while you are asleep. You wake up and the tongue is not much sorer than it was this morning before the operation. The place soon heals up. No trouble. You are safe.

SHE WAS ALL RIGHT.

But about the patient who was "so terrified of Cancer." She was all-right. She had no sore place on her tongue, nor anywhere else. She was the picture of health. We had a good comfortable talk and she went away quite well and perfectly happy. She came quite well in body, but bruised in mind. She went away quite well in body and happy in mind. Well and Happy. What would you more? As for what I said to her, I will tell you that next month.

Puffed Grains are breakfast dainties, but they are also food confections. Let them bring you all of their enjoyments.

The grains are puffed to bubbles, 8 times normal size. The texture is like snowflakes, the taste like toasted nuts.

Yet every use supplies whole-grain nutrition in a scientific form: Every food cell is exploded, to make digestion easy and complete.

No other process so fits a grain to feed. And none makes whole grains nearly so enticing.

If you believe in whole-grain diet, serve the children Puffed Grains in endless ways and often.

Blaming it on the Movies

silent drama, like every other form of popular entertainment is anxious to serve its customers:—and you may take your choice of caviare sandwiches or pork chops. The movie is neither better nor worse than any other form of entertainment — and, when it attains fuller growth, it will be a highly edifying form of art.

THERE are several masters of production who have proved the high artistic possibilities of the moving picture. Mr. D. W. Griffith is pre-eminent in the colossal play such as "Intolerance," which simply amazed the beholder with its lavish scale and historic fidelity. The novels and plays of the great writers are becoming familiar to those who would otherwise know little about them. Many young persons of to-day know Charlotte Bronte only from the screen version of "Jane Eyre." While this form of acquaintance can never take the place of the actual reading of the work of fiction, it is much better than no introduction whatever to the masterpieces of the novelist's art.

The crime movie has been justly condemned:—and yet it is impossible to depict all sides of life and exclude offences against the law. In the silent drama, as on the stage, itself, the dangerous play is that which represents crime as admirable and seductive. Just because it is pictured the act of vice in the movie can be made more suggestive and alluring than that which is represented by the speaking actor. The drama which makes theft, murder and all manner of transgression acts of bravado is not a safe production for the young person—is not, in fact, good for any of us. I believe the number of such plays has been exaggerated, for, on scanning the titles of the productions at the movies, there do not seem to be many of the "shilling shocker" type. Of course, movies must have thrills—but even in the matter of thrills there may be a difference. The wholesome thrill gives a sense of exhilaration, with no reaction of unpleasant suggestion.

In children's plays, there is a wonderful wealth for the youngest citizens. Think of the fairy tales which are made real and sparkling before our eyes! I know there are a few tiresome persons who profess to find harm in fairy tales and who would fain convince me that "Snow White," as played by Marguerite Clarke was such a production as would arouse envy and a longing for weird adventure in the heart of the nine year-old. The Dwarfs in the eyes of these foolish persons, take on an evil and sinister significance. Cinderella, also, may give rise to utterly false views of life, for some deluded child may really fancy that a pumpkin may become a golden chariot and she may keep on the look-out for a fairy god-mother. As for Aladdin and his lamp, that story is sure, when played for a juvenile audience, to make every youngster hugely discontented. As a matter of fact, the results are just the reverse of what these over-careful busybodies foretold. Childhood has that rare imagination which makes the treasure of Snow White the chariot of Cinderella, the wealth conjured by the lamp of Aladdin all its own, and needs not the actual dollars and cents to make its dreams come true. Let us have the fairy tales, by all means, for the world needs them more to-day than it has ever needed them. The utterly revolting and the horrible should seldom be portrayed by the movies. I do not mean that we should have nothing but the pleasing and the beautiful in the silent drama. We ten all neatly canned and labelled and preserved for winter days. And such a centre, if used on successive days by different groups of neighbors, as suggested above, would pay all expenses.

THE CONNOISSEUR'S CHOICE

If it is desired to not only pay expenses but to have some surplus money, the plan adopted by the centre in Parkhill is good. About a thousand cans, over and above community work were canned by a committee appointed by the Women's Institute to manage the Centre. This was sold, not donated any more, to the Government for use in military hospitals in Canada or to private individuals in other places who wished to buy. Regular market prices were secured and a nice profit resulted from the year's work.

Supplies were bought in wholesale quantities, sugar in twelve barrel lots, peaches by the orchard, peas and corn by the acres, tomatoes as many as were offered, and other necessities in proportion. Those who had fruit or vegetables of their own brought them to be canned and were allowed full value for them. Men and women went out in car-loads and picked corn and peas and peaches. Indeed there was a hard and fast rule that the family that did not send picklers could not eat the finished product.

The women cleaned the pans, spoons and utensils with which they worked at the close of each day, and the engineer flushed the floor with a hose and hot water which all ran away down a depression in the cement floor. So, when new workers came on in the morning, they invariably found everything sweet and clean and ready for the day's work.

All these things contributed to the success of the Centre but the big thing to remember is, that the rural women must themselves co-operate first, by forming small canning groups and arranging the days when each group will use the Centre. Only by constant use in this way can a Centre be made self-supporting.

The women work in the Parkhill Centre day after day and year after year. They have learned to enjoy each other. They have learned good-natured toleration of each other's faults. The woman who always wants her share of cans out of the best batch of the season, does not always have her own way. The woman who shirks her share of the work is known to all and her fault is glossed over. The woman who is too much inclined to be overbearing finds her wings have been quietly and painlessly clipped. Human nature is an open book which all in the Centre can read. They read between the lines and ignoring the thing has to be done. It compresses glaring faults they find the true gold of each woman's character. They learn to give and take, to bear and forbear, to be loyal to your co-worker. And they realize, to some extent, that only someone's great desire to serve and someone's great vision and someone's trained mind and a genius for working out details and an unselfish character, could have made the canning centre of to-day an assured fact.

For the rural woman, the working out of this idea means a partial solution of the help problem. A centre lessens her hours over the hot stove in the hot weather when most canning has to be done. It compresses into one day the drudgery of weeks and in the Centre her husband can co-operate with her as she so often co-operates with him. And where there is a Centre and steam is procurable, there can also be a community laundry. This idea could be worked out along the lines on which a beef-ring is operated. One family could take charge of a group of washings for one week. Another family in the group could take the next week. With an electric washer, or a washer run by steam and a drying room, the work which takes half a dozen housewives a day or a half-a-day each, could be all done at the community laundry with a saving of at least five days or half days, and instead of a weekly wash day, each family would be responsible for the wash once in every six or seven weeks.

There are other plans that could be adopted, but this is our plan for this year, but, the rural woman who advocates co-operation and a centre where work can be done, is hastening the day when living on a farm will cease to mean hard work and when the farm woman will have time to devote to the development of herself and of her family, time to enjoy nature, time to spend on living, leisure time, without which no life is perfect or what God intended that it should be when men and women were created.

one. There was not much left but the clock now.

In vain had she tried to get work. There were too many unemployed in the city. It was a case of selling the clock for food.

Eight o'clock! Was anybody coming to buy it?

Deep down in her heart was the hope that something would happen so that it would not have to be sold. She didn't want to have to sell it. It seemed a part of Jim. In the first dark hours when he was lost, the clock seemed an emblem of hope. But there was nothing in the pantry, and it was the only thing left. Perhaps—But what was the use of supposing?

Outside a storm was raging—the first snowstorm of the year.

Marjorie poked the fire and, cuddling up in the chair, waited.

On the other side of the city in one of the big hotels, a man, with traces of excitement visible on his face, was putting on a big coat preparatory to going out in the storm. In his hand he carried a newspaper. He still held it firmly as he crossed the hotel rotunda to order his car.

"Who's that?" asked one man of another.

"Why, don't you know—that's Jim Dennison, one of the best chaps living. Was reported missing at the war, was on some special work in Germany, got the V.C., then came in to a pile of money when he got home. Sure, you must have heard of him. I'll introduce you if you like. Wonder where he's going."

Through the storm went the motor-car, to 208 Maple Avenue.

Marjorie still sat beside the fire. Just as the clock chimed nine there was a knock at the door. While she wondered whether to answer it or not the door opened and a man came in.

He took off his snow-covered coat while Marjorie stared at him in amazement.

With arms outstretched he advanced.

"Marjorie, don't you know me?"

She stood still, an incredulous light in her eyes. It was a dream resulting from the raking up of those old memories!

"Marjorie," he paused. "I came back but couldn't find you. I came to the house but some strange woman told me that your parents had died and that you had moved away—out West, she thought. I tried to trace you—had detectives but they did not enquire here again after being told that. For over five years I've looked for you, and if it hadn't been for this—" He pointed to the paper in his hand.

Marjorie answered as if in a dream. "I rented this house after Mother died and tried to get work, but I couldn't, and they were horrid people," her voice faltered, "Jim, Jim, is it really you, or is it a dream? I've dreamt so, so often."

His arms were around her. "It's no dream, dear one, or if it is, it is going to last forever."

There was silence in the room except for the little clock.

"Marjorie, Marjorie, what did I tell you? Didn't I say the clock would bring you happiness? If it hadn't been for it I wouldn't have found you."

And from the shelter of his arms Marjorie listened to the clock.

It still ticked on in its wise little way as if all along, it had known what would happen. And with each little "tick-a-tock", she knew it was saying "happ-i-ness."

A Model Kitchen

not one single moveable piece of furniture in the kitchen. The floor is covered with a nice linoleum in tile pattern and light colour. All the woodwork, except table tops and drain boards, is in 5/8" V. Joint and everything including the ceiling is painted white, while the curtains are chintz, with blue birds, with plate rail ornaments in wedgewood blue to match. The hinges are all butterfly pattern, and both they and the catches are in dull copper. The kitchen is what I set out to make it, bright, cheerful, light and clean, with work reduced to a minimum and made a pleasure. The old untidy pantry is no more; the dark and over-crowded kitchen has disappeared and in their place is really the most interesting room in the house.

And lastly, the view from the window. How many women have to look at their neighbour's wall from their kitchen window? My kitchen window looks out into a nice garden, where flowers grow practically all the year round, with shade and fruit trees always there and open country beyond, and mountains closing in the Western view, as beautiful and attractive scenery as can be found in any part of Canada.

must have tragedy and grief, if we are to have life. But the hideous, the distorted, the morbid have no place there, for such sights are too ghastly to be portrayed. Again we may be reminded that "things seen are mightier than things heard"—and may be infinitely more painful.

The movies are to remain and to become more forceful than we dream of now, in the portrayal of life as it is—and as it may be. Science is to do greater things with the film than Edison has yet imagined. The time is not far distant when the movie may be brought to the home, just as we buy a "record" to-day. You may have a moving picture after dinner or before you go down town—and the prospect makes the stories of Jules Verne and the prophecies of Edward Bellamy common-place reading. A few years from now, it will be nothing out of the way for you to telephone to a friend and invite him to come over and see your new "picture" of the latest aviation race from Victoria to Montreal. Yes, we are going to hear and see and do wonders in the next decade—and the movie man will catch all the changes of the panorama.

Add Richness To Cooking

Carnation Milk adds richness and flavour to everything you cook. Use it in baking, in puddings, soups, icings and for creaming vegetables. For cooking add an equal part of water to Carnation,—add more water if you want thinner milk. It is just cows' milk from which part of the water has been evaporated and sterilized. It is absolutely pure, economical and convenient. Buy it from your grocer in tall (16 oz.) cans, or by the case of 48 cans. Write for Recipe Book.

Carnation Milk

"From Contented Cows"

The label is red and white.

Oyster Stew—1 pt. oysters, 3 cups water, 1 cup Carnation Milk, pepper, ½ tablespoonful salt, 2 tablespoonfuls butter. Clean and drain oysters. Add butter and seasonings to scalded milk. Bring to the boiling point, add oysters and serve. This recipe serves six people.

Cream White Sauce

—2 tablespoonfuls flour, ½ cup Carnation Milk, 2 tablespoonfuls butter or substitute, ½ teaspoonful salt, ½ cup water. Melt butter or substitute, add flour and stir until thoroughly mixed. Add the milk and cook about five minutes or until the mixture thickens, then add seasonings. This recipe makes one cup of white sauce.

Carnation Bread—1½ cups water, 6 to 7 cups flour, ½ cup Carnation Milk, 1 cake compressed yeast, 2 teaspoonfuls salt, 2 teaspoonfuls sugar, 2 tablespoonfuls shortening. Dissolve yeast in lukewarm water. Measure the salt, sugar and shortening into a mixing bowl, add the milk and water. When lukewarm, add yeast and mix thoroughly. Then add the flour gradually. When stiff enough to handle, knead the dough on a floured board and knead until smooth and elastic. Put into a loaf pan and let rise in a warm place about one and one-half hours or until double its bulk, then make into loaves and put into baking pan. Bake and again let stand in a warm place about one hour or until hot. Besides the above, bake about 45 minutes. Always mix Carnation Milk and water thoroughly.

The new Carnation Cook Book contains over 100 tested recipes. Write to the Carnation Milk Products Co., Limited, Aylmer, Ont., for a free copy.

Japanese Wall Paper Cheap and Beautiful

By Anna H. Dyer

THERE is no more fascinating moment of one's experience in Japan than the one in which you decide to take a house of your own and play at housekeeping for a while. It opens endless vistas of decoration so dear to the feminine mind. And—blessed fact—in that delightful land expense is not the one and all-important consideration. The cheap and ugly is unknown there; but the cheap and beautiful surrounds you like the air you breathe. Japan is not a rich nation, but it is essentially an artistic one, therefore the problem with the people for hundreds of years has been to obtain the greatest amount of beauty with the smallest amount of actual expenditure. The result is that a perfectly developed sense of beauty has become an inalienable part of the note of decoration, the walls. In a purely Japanese house you may be sure of finding the walls satisfactory, for the Japanese are governed by un-failing good taste in matters familiar to them. It is only when they attempt to do things foreign style that their native artistic sense deserts them. Then it is that they will give you cheap and ugly imported papers, and honestly think that they are doing what will please you best. What their own carefully concealed opinion of your taste may be, there is no way of finding out.

When I took a house it was at the beginning of the winter season, and being influenced largely by the thought of material comfort, I selected a little foreign brick bungalow with real walls and chimneys. There were four good-national consciousness, and that ugliness is not.

The poorest, straw-thatched village hut has the beauty of line and color in its sloping eaves and brown velvety thatch, and a touch of art in the line of yellow roof-lilies that grow along its ridge-pole. The cheapest, commonest interior has its charm of esthetic color and arrangement. Beauty is in degree, but not in fact; and it is not until one has lived some time in Japan that one suddenly awakens to the knowledge that the secret lies in the elimination of what is not beautiful. And so it is that to keep house in Japan is a pleasure regulated but not restricted by the state of one's pocketbook.

In this little article I am dealing with that first and fundamental key-sized rooms and a wide glassed-in side verandah running the full length of the house. This, having a southern exposure, I at once decided should be converted into a conservatory and sun-parlor in one. It was easily made charming with plants and wicker chairs and tables, indeed it almost arranged itself without suggestion from me; the walls, of course, were pale green, the light wicker furniture and the varying greens of the plants blended delightfully, and I found that a note of rich brown obtained from one or two old Daimyo tea-jars set about proved to be very effective. The interior gave more thought, the rooms all having a northern exposure and looking out upon a densely wooded hollow, through the branches of which could just be caught here and there a gleam of blue sea. I determined from the first to adopt as far as possible the Japanese idea of decoration, and I sent for a very excellent and reliable kyojia, or wall-hanger, with whom I proceeded to have a real old-fashioned sodan (consultation). When he understood my plan he entered heartily into it, and as a result brought samples of all his cheapest and prettiest wall papers for my inspection. They were of the most delicate designs and colors, many of them, but following a theory of my own, I decided that for a somber room I should have a dark, rich paper, and fill the interior with glowing color, brasses, gold screens, and richly tinted hangings. The one I selected was of wood fiber, a very soft, rough, woody brown, against which as a background my Japanese paintings and prints mounted on gold and brocade stood out delightfully. Again following the Japanese custom of reflecting light from below instead of above, I had my floors covered with tatami, the smooth, light, rice-straw mats which are fitted together like puzzle blocks in varying designs to suit the size of the room. These make an ideal floor covering, being warmer than rugs on account of their thickness and deliciously springy under foot. On the floors, for the convenience of my Japanese guests as well as for the color effect, I placed several flat kneeling-cushions of dark red; and on my Indian reclining chair I piled brightly tinted cushions. The effect of the walls and ceiling were greatly enhanced by narrow strips of light, unpainted wood running lengthwise of the ceiling in spaces of about two feet wide, and a single strip running around the wall like a picture molding, and outlining the corners of the room and the openings of doors and windows. It may sound slightly bizarre, but the first exclamation of every one who entered it was, "Oh, how pretty!"

So much for my living and work-room. For the dining-room I found nothing so effective as a sort of an ivory-toned rice paper, irregularly covered with broad splashes of some kind of mahogany-colored wood bark.

With this the walls are so well decorated as to need little else, especially if combined with a dark wood ceiling and floor. Some of the delicate seaweed papers were found particularly adapted to the bedrooms, one especially (reproduced in the cut) of a very light green, with a design of pine needles and cones, the latter touched with gold. A reddish brown seaweed paper with conventionalized pine tree designs, picked out in gold, is also very charming. Some of the wave designs are beautiful, and one of the prettiest dining-rooms that I saw while in Japan had a deep frieze of this design, combined with plain tones of ivory and Chinese blue. This background for blue and white china and the blue and white Japanese color prints, or nishiki-ye, proved to be charming and a fitting frame for the very beautiful woman who lived in it.

Of course these papers of which I speak are the cheaper among the Japanese papers. There are numberless grass cloths and silk textures that are used in the better class Japanese houses, and that can even be obtained over here at a high cost; but they are no more charming in effect than these cheaper, commoner papers, many of which are used only for the backing of screens, but which for that very reason are made of especially tough fibrous material.

On returning from Japan one of the things that struck me most forcibly was the almost universal ugliness of the wall coverings in the houses of the poorer and even of the well-to-do people. They are in most instances either tonelessly commonplace or garishly vulgar. Why may we not have some standard of good taste? Surely the lesson we most need to learn from Japan just now is what Lafcadio Hearn calls "making pleasure (or beauty) the commonest instead of the costliest of experiences—the divine art of creating the beautiful out of nothing!"

when chased by their most fleet-footed warrior easily out-distanced him and vanished. On the third evening all were fearfully awaiting his appearance when, to their amazement, he passed very close to them. A shot rang out. It passed into his body yet he did not fall but continued on his walk. Then Mawdosh sped after him, gained on him, seized him in a vice-like grip only to find that he embraced no human flesh, nothing.

"It is an evil spirit," murmured the cowering tribes, "He will curse us if we remain; we must depart." and never since have they assembled in one great pow-wow."

"I guess not," I answered candidly.

Before I left for home there was a trim little maid servant installed in the kitchen. And Lucia had begun to play golf; she was practicing every afternoon.

"There is nothing to the household slavery business, Auntie" she said, with all the effrontery in the world, "Emily is so capable; I am going to give her a free hand."

Watch your gums—bleeding a sign of trouble

MEDICAL science knows now serious is the sign of bleeding gums. For it knows that tender and bleeding gums are the forerunners of Pyorrhea, that dread disease which afflicts four out of five people over forty.

If the disease is unchecked, the gum-line recedes, the teeth decay, loosen and fall out, or must be extracted to rid the system of the Pyorrhea poisons generated at their base—poisons which seep into the system and wreck the health. They cause rheumatism, nervous disorders, anaemia, and many other ills.

To avoid Pyorrhea, visit your dentist often for teeth and gum inspection, and use Forhan's For the Gums. Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's keeps the gums firm and healthy—the teeth white and clean. Start using it today. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions and consult your dentist immediately for special treatment.

Young Western Canadians and Their Education

By Eleanor M. Shepherd

IN western Canada exists the problem of the development of national spirit after a great influx of foreign population. We hear much of the training of the teachers for non-English schools and community work among the foreigners in our midst, whether in city or country but there is another phase of the matter which technical work or graduate courses in the Universities.

As a solution might it be suggested that some of our leading Eastern Educational institutions have a publicity man (or woman) come through the west and speak to matriculants and their parents? Or could not more literature and of a less prosaic character be made available? Even the railways might help. From Canadian Western points excursion tickets to California, at reduced rates, may be obtained at any time, valid for nine months. On the contrary, if we wish to go to eastern Canada an ordinary return ticket, for two months, is the limit; beyond that we pay two single fares. What wonder that the average, well-to-do westerner goes more frequently to California than to his old home in the east? Keeping Canadian boys and girls for Canada is not a question to be lightly passed over and to keep patriotic ideas in their minds all the time is important. We are apt to publications assist? When a boy picks up a daily paper to which page does he almost invariably turn?—To the cartoons, of course! Look at these on Dominion Day, and what is there of a patriotic character? Nothing at all, but on the Fourth of July what a different story! The reason is easy to find because the "Funnies" come from American syndicates. However there must be some native cartoonists from whose work our papers could supplement the American pictures. Failing this would it not be better just to omit the Fourth of July stuff?

If our boys want a magazine for themselves dealing with boys' problems and interests for what do their parents subscribe? "The American Boy!" Is there no publishing house in Canada which will create a "Canadian Boy"?

In a sense this is all a species of propaganda. If Canadian writers attempt to retaliate and get before the public in the United States any writings of a national character, they are politely told by the New York publishers that the theme will not appeal to the American readers! Almost the only kind of Canadian story (or scenario) which is popular in the U.S.A. is the piffle written about our great north land with its barren, or snow-covered plains. From this the average American gets the idea, as Sinclair Lewis said last spring in Toronto, that Canada is a polar country "in which men in great fur coats chase little furry animals over the snow all the time!"

When we think it all over, are we not pretty easy to let the Americans keep telling us about themselves when they will not listen to anything about us? Are not our railroads adopting a queer attitude in encouraging people to travel to the south instead of east and west? To come back to the original idea, why are Canadian young people being sent to American institutions when we have just as good, or better here in Canada? In trying to help the children of the foreign-born we are doing a good work but we should not forget to keep patriotic ideals before the English-speaking as well.

WINTER SPORT AT ALGONQUIN.

seems not to have been considered. Yet it is important in keeping the west a unit with the rest of Canada.

In a recent issue of the "Saturday Night" appeared pictures of several Vancouver debutantes. The explanation under each of the pictures tells the story: Miss X—graduated this year from the University of Southern California, Miss Y—has just received her diploma from a private school at La Jolla, California, Miss Z—has just completed her course at Bryn Mawr, Philadelphia. Why did all these girls go to American Colleges? They are daughters of leading citizens, and themselves probably future leaders among the women of their city and yet they have been for from two to four years, at a very impressionable time of their lives, under a training which tends to break down their Canadianism and replace it by American ideals.

This is true not only of Vancouver but of other cities of the Canadian West and if information in regard to boys of the same age could be obtained it would be surprising to find the large number in American Colleges.

Our Public and High Schools lay the foundation but after that a large percentage of the cleverest of our students go away to Colleges in the United States. They are either lost to Canada permanently by entering professional or business life there, or they return with a luke-warm Canadianism. We talk about the exchange situation and are urged to buy Canadian-made goods but here is Canadian money going out of the country, and expended in a way, ultimately to unjure our country. Further, there is no excuse, for it is very generally acknowledged that Canadian educational institutions are at least as good as those of our neighbor to the South, except for certain acter be made available?

Even the railways might help. From Canadian Western points excursion tickets to California, at reduced rates, may be obtained at any time, valid for nine months. On the contrary, if we wish to go to eastern Canada an ordinary return ticket, for two months, is the limit; beyond that we laugh and say "jingoism" when we speak of American schools and all the flag-waving and ultra-patriotism in which they indulge. However it seems quite possible that, in our British, undemonstrative way, we are, erring in the other extreme.

If the schools do their part, to what extent do newspapers and other

Orange Jell-O

E Americans have a way with desserts that is all our own. It is an Anglo-Saxon trait to eat a heavy pie or pudding that is a meal in itself after a hearty dinner; and we alone of all people discourage the flow of gastric juices by generous servings of frozen ices and creams as a last course. The ideal dessert is one that is light, not too sweet, delicate and not an added burden to digestion; a dainty, for a gracious "farewell," not a substantial course.

Dishes that have gelatine as a basis have just these characteristics. They melt in the mouth, they are chilled without being frozen, solid without being hard, and they furnish nutrition in the way of protein and sugars, supplemented by the whipped cream or fruit that is added to them. Plain or with cream, they make an ideal dessert for children, giving a sweet taste without an undue amount of sugar.

For the sake of your health, take care of your teeth

COLGATE'S Ribbon Dental Cream is safe. It contains no dangerous acids, no harsh grit. Through the double-action of its chief constituents (chalk and soap) it cleans thoroughly. The fine precipitated chalk loosens deposits upon the teeth. At the same time, the pure vegetable oil soap washes away the loosened particles.

Always brush the upper teeth downward; the lower teeth upward.

Use Colgate's every morning, and especially at night before retiring.

Bad teeth endanger the health, often being responsible for rheumatism, indigestion, heart troubles, impairment of sight, etc. Regular brushing twice a day with a safe dentifrice, and examination twice a year by a dentist are necessary to keep your teeth in good condition.

Many people are suffering unnecessary pain and regret because they have failed to observe these simple rules.

Don't let your teeth ache before you begin to take care of them. Protect them now, no matter how strong and sound you think they are.

Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream has no druggy taste; its flavor is delicious. Children like it on this account, and easily form the habit of using it regularly. Colgate's makes care of the teeth a pleasure—not a task.

One Druggist writes us: "People take up fads, but they always come back to Colgate's."

The Secret of Charm Never Changes

Throughout the ages it exerts its power—this charm to which the world bows, changing history and making queens—of nations as well as hearts.

Few can describe it, for charm doesn't depend upon beauty alone. The woman who wields it may be dark or fair, of any race or type. Only this is certain—she has a perfect skin, fresh, youthful, free from blemishes—the irresistible attraction which all understand and admire.

Begin today to give your complexion the care it needs and this charm will also be yours. It's a beauty secret of ancient Egypt and the beautiful Cleopatra.

How to beautify your skin

Bad complexions are largely due to lack of proper cleansing. The pores become clogged, then enlarged, then irritated. Blackheads and blotches follow.

The best preventive is a daily cleansing with Palmolive soap. It makes a balmy, creamy lather, for the base is palm and olive oils. A gentle massage makes it penetrate. A rinsing takes it out, and with it come all accumulations which have clogged the skin. Finish with a dash of cold water and a touch of cold cream. Then your skin will be fresh and rosy, clear, soft, smooth.

A lesson from stage women

All women can learn something from women of the stage, who use much rouge, much powder.

But they remove them before they sleep. And with them the oil, the dirt and perspiration which clog up the pores of the skin.

Their complexions will show you that they do no harm when skins are treated the right way.

Ancient beauties knew the way

Roman beauties, in their famous baths, used palm and olive oils. Egyptian beauties used them in Cleopatra's time.

Now modern science finds no better way to beauty than by scientific blending of these oils.

Popular priced, yet supreme

Palmolive soap costs little, yet it forms the best skin soap the world ever knew. It employs palm oil from Africa, olive oil from Spain. It combines them in a perfect emollient.

The Palmolive price is due to the fact that millions have come to employ it. And we have worked for years to bring it within the reach of all.

EDITORIAL CHAT

WE are sure you will like this month's cover, which "blew in" on a March gale from Miss Long's studio and which is essentially of the month which alternately blusters or smiles, and is altogether the most boisterous one of them all. We like this March cover very much, with the springtime green showing through the winter's snow; — and we hope that you will like it, too. The pretty Queen of Hearts, who smiled on you from our February cover was the work of another Canadian artist, Mrs. M. H. Campbell, who is now in New York. January, with its young wrestler ready to take on the year, 1922, was a cover design by Mr. Arthur Drummond, a Toronto artist; and April will give you a charming spring study by Miss Florence Luton, another Canadian of artistic gifts.

Many of our artists have made their way to New York, there to find fame and, possibly, fortune. However, some of our expatriated artists find that Canada is an attractive field for work, after all, and are returning to their native land. Mr. Carl Ahrens is one of the "recently returned," who has deserted his studio in the United States for his old home, and is heartily welcomed back to Canada. Mr. Ahrens has promised to paint a woodland study as one of the summer covers for the JOURNAL and we are sure that you will find the production worthy of preservation.

Mr. E. J. Dinsmore is another of the "British-born" who has returned and has renewed his work as illustrator for this magazine and other Canadian publications. Mr. Dinsmore's "decoration" for Miss Pickthall's poem, "An Old Portrait," which appeared in our January issue, has been justly admired—and we hope to claim both the poet and the artist as regular contributors. Still another Canadian artist who has returned is Mr. D. C. McArthur, whose poem, "Faces," illustrated by himself, appeared in our November issue. So attractive did the illustrations prove that, when the editor of a soldiers' journal arrived to borrow them, we readily consented to give them to him—only to find that some unknown admirer had calmly appropriated the cuts:—which have not been seen again.

The return of some of our esteemed Canadian contributors may be taken as an indication that this country affords opportunities for both the writer and the illustrator:—and that the ambition to produce work of literary or artistic merit may be gratified—to some extent at least—within the borders of our own Dominion

FICTION is an essential of the successful magazine of to-day:—and never were stories more eagerly read for refreshment and entertainment—not to mention instruction—than in this year of turmoil and stress. The true story-teller opens the little magic door, through which we may escape from the world of everyday toil and worry into the Land of Make-Believe. You all know some of the stories by C. N. and A. M. Williamson, who have made the motor romance all their own and who "make the wheels go round" in right royal fashion when they set out on a motor trip in the land of adventure. In fact, every novel by them might truly be described as a joy-ride. In April, our serial, "Idol of Youth," by these writers will begin its glad course and you will be delighted with the progress, as the miles and the months go by. We hope to have another most entertaining romance by the month of August which will prove equally enjoyable.

As for short stories, we can show an enviable list including several new writers. Miss B. L. Smeeton of Ottawa has already contributed two sprightly tales. Her "Going Down," in the February issue, is a story to keep any reader enthralled, even if the final ceremony is highly unconventional in setting. One reader objected that there wasn't really any "wedding," inasmuch as the bride was married in her going-away gown and there were no orange-blossoms. We hope Miss Smeeton is going to send us another love story, for she manages to write a romance which has just the proper proportion of "sugar." A writer who sends us "things" from Victoria, Miss Christina Frame, has contributed another delightful story which will bloom some time in the spring.

Six Savings from Soap

Made possible with Fels-Naptha by its perfect combination of splendid soap and real naptha. How this golden bar brings ease and economy in doing your washing and general housework

1. A saving of clothes

Why not make your lovely clothes last longer? Those dainty undergarments with edgings and insertions you crochet with your own hands, are too precious to be worn-out so soon in washing.

When you rub clothes between a hard soap and a hard washboard, that means wearing away the fabric and hurrying it to the rag-bag.

Fels-Naptha is particularly safe. Because it is not a brick-hard soap it rubs off easily on the clothes without wear. And it washes clothes so gently! The real naptha in Fels-Naptha makes the dirt let go by loosening it from the fibre without injury to the fabric. Only extremely soiled places need a light rubbing. You don't have to do any hard rubbing at all. This is why Fels-Naptha keeps clothes from wearing-out fast.

2. A saving of hands

There is no need to risk scalding and shriveling your hands in hot water, or to put up with the extra heat and steamy atmosphere of boiling clothes. Fels-Naptha does its work in water of any temperature.

You can boil clothes with Fels-Naptha if you wish, and get them clean quicker than with ordinary soap, because of the real naptha in Fels-Naptha; but thousands of women tell us they find no need of boiling when they use Fels-Naptha.

The Fels-Naptha way of washing with lukewarm water is the comfortable way.

It is amazing how quickly and thoroughly Fels-Naptha works throughout the house—brightening painted woodwork, taking spots out of rugs, carpets, cloth, draperies, cleaning enamel of bathtub, washstand, and sink.

3. A saving of time

In using Fels-Naptha you simply wet the clothes, soap them, put them to soak, then go about the house for half an hour doing something else while the real naptha in Fels-Naptha goes through and through the clothes and loosens the dirt. At the same time, Fels-Naptha makes the water soapy, ready to flush away the dirt when you douse the clothes up and down a few times. Extremely soiled places, of course, will need a light rubbing. Rinse, and the washing is done. A saving of time!

4. A saving of fuel

Since you can do the washing with Fels-Naptha in lukewarm water, what is the use of wasting gas or coal? You can save all the extra heat needed to boil clothes, if you use Fels-Naptha.

When you use a washing-machine:—because the naptha in Fels-Naptha loosens the dirt even before the washer starts to work, you don't have to run the washer so long—you save electric current.

FREE If you haven't tried Fels-Naptha for washing and cleaning a pleasant surprise awaits you. Send for sample, free. Write Fels-Naptha, Philadelphia.

5. A saving of work

When you use Fels-Naptha there is no need to spend the morning bending over the washtub, or to rub your strength away on the washboard. There is no boiler to lift on and off the stove, and no lifting of clothes in and out of the boiler. You will never dread the weekly wash when you do it the Fels-Naptha way, because it doesn't tire you out.

If you have the washing "done out" with Fels-Naptha, the clothes come home sweeter and cleaner, and with less wash wear-and-tear. Or, if the washing is done at home for you with Fels-Naptha, the strength saved enables your laundress to do the ironing, too, the same day. A real saving of work!

6. A saving of money

Besides the saving of money in fuel, time, and clothes, very often with Fels-Naptha you save doctor's bills by preventing colds from overheating, and other illness from over-exertion.

The only way you can make this all-round saving from soap is to be sure you get Fels-Naptha—the original and genuine naptha soap—of your grocer. The clean naptha odor and the red-and-green wrapper are your guides.

You can tell genuine Fels-Naptha by its clean naptha odor—and the work it does.

FELS-NAPTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

IT was in the long bazaars of Peshawar, where Afghan and Briton meet, that Andrews came upon Robert Winthrop, seated on the ground, mumbling prayers in one of the uncouth dialects of the hills. He was dressed in the long yellow robe of a Buddhist priest, and his face, which Andrews had not seen since their college days five years before, was sunken and weather-beaten past all recognition.

Andrews, indeed, gave the yellow-clad figure barely a passing glance, so immersed was he in the wonderful life of the bazaars, where, in a medley of strange colors, Afghans and Pathans, fierce Rajputs and hard-bitten men of the hills, gossipped, bartered, gambled together, their dark eyes flashing like so many stars.

A light touch upon his arm startled him. "How are you, Andrews?" asked a voice he vaguely recalled.

He swung sharply about. Peshawar is too near the Kyber Pass and the Afghan frontier for a man to welcome casual handling.

The Buddhist priest was looking up at him, his sunken grey eyes alive with a curious inward fire. "How are you, Andrews?" he repeated.

This time Andrews understood. Winthrop's eyes would have betrayed him anywhere. He stood staring at the emaciated figure in the yellow gown. "Bobby Winthrop!" he ejaculated. And, standing in the roadway, he swore softly.

Robert Winthrop gave a little smile. "You must give me some money, you duffer," he whispered. "People are looking."

Andrews tossed him several small coins, which the other received with a guttural blessing in an indescribable native tongue. Then he rose slowly to his feet, a tall figure from which every particle of superfluous flesh seemed to have been removed by long privations that had made his inward energy shine out more indomitably than ever. "I've got it, old man," he said, simply.

The two had not met for five years, but had it been fifty, Andrews would not have been in doubt. He and Winthrop had discussed the matter so often, it had been so much a part of their life together, that he would have understood a reference to the Garden of Desire, had he suddenly encountered Winthrop at the South Pole.

"You've got it?" he repeated, half-stunned with surprise. "Say, doesn't that beat the Dutch?"

Winthrop smiled. "I only reached the end of my calculations a month ago," he explained. "Then I sent a duplicate set of my figures to New York—I didn't want to take any chances you see, of America losing the credit if I went under—and set about organizing my expedition. We are over here a mile or two outside the town. And we start to-morrow morning."

Andrews drew a long breath. He alone of his college generation had believed in Winthrop, and lapse of years had never dimmed his faith. "I'm ready," he said with a little laugh, feeling as though he had suddenly become a vital part of the Arabian nights. "Of course, I must say good-bye to my friends here first."

Winthrop nodded. "Wasn't it lucky I was here this morning? I had an errand at the bazaar, and of course I had to play my part. Funny rig, isn't it?"

"Why not chuck it?" asked his friend.

This time Winthrop grew very serious. "I couldn't do it, old man, if I wanted to ever so much. No man but a priest could ever get access to the hidden temples. And I had to get inside them. Now," he smiled faintly—"well, now it wouldn't be exactly safe for me to chuck it just at this stage of the game."

Towards them in the clear morning air marched a tall artillery officer. "There comes my host now," said Andrews quickly. "I want you two chaps to meet."

"Oh, I know Neville," said Winthrop hastily. "He feels sure I am crazy. An odd smile crossed his face. "I'll expect you out after tiffin. And don't let Neville draw you out about our expedition. Call it a hunting trip."

And, with a quick nod, he drew his yellow gown about him and walked slowly away.

THE GARDEN OF DESIRE

Colonel Neville joined his guest, looking rather awkward. "I don't mean to be inquisitive," he began, "but do you happen to know anything about the man you have been talking to?"

Andrews explained that his friendship with Winthrop had been more than ordinarily close, and had been interrupted only when the latter had cut himself off from all home ties to bury himself in the mysterious East.

Colonel Neville listened closely. "Was he crazy when you knew him in America? Had he strange ideas? Did he want to find out a happy garden? Or something like that? Where our original ancestors lived? Sort of Garden of Eden?"

"He had strange theories," Andrews admitted. "And I recall that some people thought him a little queer. But as a matter of fact,"—he hesitated for an instant, uncertain how far Winthrop would like him to go—"as a matter of fact, Neville, he converted me to most of his theories."

The Englishman looked puzzled. "He is a wonderful chap in many ways," he agreed, "knows more Sanscrit and native dialects than any man out here. But he is crazy without a doubt. My idea is that he loosened a screw grubbing round in those filthy native temples without anything to eat. He fights shy of me because I want him to let the station physician look him over. Says I lack imagination."

Andrews smiled. "That's what Bobby always told me," he explained. "I am going to ask you to let me off with him after tiffin," he went on. "It's an old promise—a hunting trip. And when we get back I intend to bring you two together."

"Thank you," said Colonel Neville dryly. "But you needn't worry. You won't get back. That is, not if I am any judge. He has a lot of hillmen there I wouldn't trust with the change of an anna. And, according to all reports, they expect to go right into the mountains where no white man has ever set his foot. Take my advice, Andrews, and cut it out. You are too good a man to waste."

This time Andrews laughed outright. It was his first visit to the East, and its glamour and mystery had not yet begun to haunt him as they finally do haunt all who come within their reach. "Nonsense, old man," he answered with assurance. "I'm looking forward to the time of my life."

The feeling was still upon him next morning, when in the grey dawn the little expedition broke camp for its strange journey. He watched the pack-mules, that carried their bedding and provisions and the wild-haired, half-clad, half-savage hillmen, that attended them, with a strange feeling of elation. It is not given to everyone to form part of the most extraordinary expedition since Time began.

Winthrop and he rode side by side, when the road permitted, the chief of the hillmen in the lead. The morning was very still and the air cold. To the west the mighty mountains that border the Afghan land lifted their tawny shoulders into air. Andrews surveyed them with eager interest.

"Are we going that way, Bobby?" he asked of his companion.

Winthrop shook his head. "Nothing doing that way, or in Kafiristan either," he whispered. "We are going east, right up in the Himalayas. But first we are going up towards the source of the Indus."

Now when a man wishes to enter the Himalayas it is not necessary to travel all the way to Peshawar, which is at their western edge, and as inconveniently situated for such a journey as a place well might be. So it was no wonder that Andrews looked puzzled.

Winthrop laughed. In his yellow robe he would have made a grotesque figure but for his keen emaciated face, and his wonderful grey eyes. "Do I look like a fool, old man?" he asked gaily. "Don't you see Peshawar is at the end of the railroad line. Once we get clear of the railroad we have a chance to get somewhere. Oh, I have it all arranged with the headman there. He is the only one who knows anything about my plans. And of course he doesn't know much."

He clapped his hands smartly and the headman, who was riding in front, his rifle across his knees, dropped back abreast of them. He was a tall, sinewy, dark fellow, with a hawk's nose and eagle eyes.

"The sahib called me," he said with a grave salute.

"Where are we going, Ito?" asked Winthrop, without looking up.

"Hunting for big game, sahib," was the prompt reply.

"And the five hundred rupees that lie waiting in Krishna Lal's strong box, in Peshawar, Ito?" asked Winthrop, facing him with a smile. "Is it for hunting big game that you are to get that?"

The headman saluted again. He bent low in his saddle, as he whispered his answer. "To the highest mountain, and through the desert of the mighty winds, if my lord will." Winthrop nodded his satisfaction, and the little caravan went on its way to the north, the mules laboring over the stony ground, the hillmen sitting like statues when the road bent downwards, and running like deer alongside their mounts when the ascent grew steep. And thus some days went by.

It was very cold upon the mountain side. Sometimes Andrews, fresh from the plains, found the low temperature almost insupportable. At which Winthrop would chuckle audibly, and offer him the protection of his thin yellow gown. And ever as they mounted higher, and the cold grew more intense, Winthrop's sunken face brightened, until there came a day when they made camp at the entrance to a narrow valley, and it had become positively radiant.

He walked to and fro before the narrow pass that led within, quoting aloud to himself in a majestic tongue, which Andrews recognized as Sanscrit, his long arms keeping time grotesquely to the rhythmic sounds.

"Here now the trip really commences, old man," he said. "The first stage is over, and real hard work begins." He clapped his hands and the headman appeared. "Tell your men, Ito," he ordered quietly, "our road lies through the valley and across the mountains to a place I go to seek. The reward is great for those who go with me."

It was a weird scene as the headman began his speech, for a huge fire had been kindled in the entrance to the pass, and its light, falling on the hillmen's upturned faces made them ghostly, unreal, like figures seen dimly in a dream. As he talked, Ito's keen eyes seemed to dart lightning. He waved his long arms towards the distant mountain peaks, and Andrews knew that he was painting the hardships that lay before them. Then his voice dropped to a scornful monotone as he swung about to the road they had come, and pointed backwards. He gave a little laugh, as though deriding the faint-hearted, then lapsed into silence.

There was a momentary pause, then two of the six hillmen stepped forward. "The dogs wish to go back," said Ito with contempt. "They have the hearts of chickens, and they say that no man may go our road and live."

Colonel Neville listened closely. "Was he crazy when you knew him in America? Had he strange ideas? Did he want to find out a happy garden?"

"To the four that stay, fifty rupees each, on the day we reach Peshawar," said Winthrop. "Let the other two go now and camp by themselves."

That night their little camp was very still. Andrews, try as he might, was unable to shake off a strange feeling of oppression. It seemed ominous to him that two hillmen, trained in the way of the mountains, should be afraid to go forward. He rolled over in his blanket beside the smouldering fire and found Winthrop's eyes upon him. He kicked the logs into a flame.

"Those fellows seemed rather nervous, Bobby."

Winthrop smiled. "There are all sorts of legends about the road," said he; "legends that have come down from thousands of years. The priests naturally spread them to prevent the people from wanting to go back. And they are just as influential at the present day as ever before. Besides," he went on, "if it were just straight climbing the thing would of course be impossible. Those two beggars couldn't know what I had discovered."

Andrews sat up, sniffing the cool night air. A Californian by birth, he had spent some years in the mountains of Arizona, near the old Apache land, and his training had made his senses more than ordinarily keen. "There's something stirring down below," he whispered.

Winthrop sat up in turn, and both peered down the hillside where the two hillmen had pitched their solitary camp. It was a moonless night, and the starlight cast the earth in deep shadow, through which there seemed to move a shapeless dark figure, sprung from out the night. An instant only the two men sat silent, then to their ears the night wind brought a long yell of terror.

Andrews caught up his rifle and rolled over from the fire. Then he rose cautiously on one knee, to find Winthrop gone. He could see his long figure disappearing down hill. With a bound he set out in pursuit. But by the second camp-fire all was still. The two men who had left the expedition, were lying face upward to the sky, quite dead, a knife-thrust showing just above their hearts.

Winthrop and Andrews stood for a moment motionless in the darkness. Then a twig crackled and an even voice said gently, "Let my lords fear not; it is their servant, Ito." And into the faint circle of the embers stepped the hillmen's chief, wiping his dagger on a tuft of grass.

"I killed the dogs," he said coolly. "They were hired to follow me to the end. Without them it will be harder to win our way to the place my lord wills, and it may be I lose the money waiting for me at Krishna Lal's."

"Oh, hang the money," cried Andrews, hotly.

"Five hundred rupees?" asked Ito gently. "Five hundred rupees told down on the table in Krishna Lal's treasure-room? Surely the sahib is jesting?"

He stuck his dagger into his girdle with the precision of a master workman. "There will be no other deserters," he said in a tone of assurance. And with a military salute he turned about and walked calmly up the hill, as though he were returning from a pleasant stroll.

Andrews looked soberly after him. "A valuable man, but a trifle mercenary," he said thoughtfully. Which afterwards he came to despise as a foolish judgment.

Next morning, the expedition made its way through the narrow pass and entered a winding valley set with trees of a variety they had left behind on lower slopes of the mountains. The air, though cool, had a delicious fragrance, and wild-flowers bloomed on every side. But traces of man there were none.

Ito rode slowly, his keen dark face very sombre and awe-stricken. "Surely, sahibs, this place is accursed of the gods," he said after they had travelled an hour. "Never have I seen anything to match this green solitude." He rubbed his chin with strong, slender fingers. "It gives a man evil thoughts," he ended, with a shiver.

An hour later they halted before a rocky barrier, which stretched itself abruptly across their path, and evidently formed the valley's farther end. Winthrop drew from his pocket a little red-covered note-book, which he examined with some care.

"I made all my calculations here," he explained to his companion. "I sent another little book just like this to New York to be sure that no hitch could occur." He ran his fingers down one of the pages. "The road lies here."

It did, indeed, lie in the direction he pointed; although no one, not warned by someone who knew, would ever have been able to find it, so cleverly had the priests of bygone generations hidden the trail from sight. Even Ito, stolid as he was, looked startled as Winthrop, after a brief search, disclosed the secret way, hidden in the rock.

"Surely devils live here," he muttered in his beard.

The secret trail, once entered on, widened out like a western canyon, with the exception that it was almost totally closed overhead. Despite the cold, the air was heavy with moisture, and thin sheets of ice lined the grey precipices on either hand. After advancing perhaps two hundred yards, the path began to mount at a sharp angle, zigzagging to and fro. Then followed perhaps half a mile of steep ascent, in ing the plateau, his torn yellow gown fluttered grotesquely in the wind.

"Well?" he questioned abruptly.

"What's the matter?"

"Thought I heard you yell."

"Can't a man yell if he wants to?"

Winthrop's voice was full of anger. He turned about. "I'll be busy for a while, Andrews," he said more quietly. "Just let me alone, please."

That evening, around the camp-fire in the huge stone court-yard, he was himself once more, keeping the little group in good humor with jests in English, and in the native tongue of the hillmen—whatever that might be; after which he spent some time in going over the figures in his mysterious red book.

"Something happened that gave me a little shock, old man," he explained, as they huddled in their blankets for the night.

"Forget it," was Andrews' sleepy answer, but underneath his calmness, his mind was brooding over the strange occurrence of the afternoon. What could have happened in a ruined monastery, that had been deserted for centuries? Was it possible that Neville was right? And that he had come on a foolish quest, from which there was to be no returning?

SUCCESS

By John Albee

Oh, to be rich, the young man boldly prayed!
And set his firm foot on the crowded stair,
Now swiftly climbing, then again delayed,
But never resting in an easy chair;
At length he reached that dizzy, breathless air
We call success, where never mortal stayed
Content, but higher yet must do and dare,
Or else must lose the stake for which he played.

Onward he pushed and scorning as he passed
Every ideal and aim except his own,
As with an iron will and brutal stress
All weak competitors aside he cast,
He touched his sordid goal with wreckage strown places almost impassable for the mules, after which the way led suddenly out upon a wind-swept plateau.
Lost, and defeated by his own success.

In Andrews' dreams that plateau always haunted him. He could see it as it stretched bleakly before him, a dozen miles or more to the giant mountains that hemmed it in, as it had stretched that June day, when the little expedition crept toilsomely across it. And, like some dreary prison, he could see the deserted monastery where they took refuge for the night.

It was a mighty structure of forgotten ages, standing half-buried in the sand like the ruins of some Egyptian temple. The beating of wind and rain and sand had worn its soft stone structure into quaint hollows; debris from the adjoining cliffs had shattered its rear walls; yet it still fronted the desert with a certain dignity.

It was here that Andrews for the first time began to have doubts of Winthrop—doubts such as he had laughed at Colonel Neville for expressing. He was strolling about the vast empty rooms while daylight lasted; he had entered one, which from the long array of discolored parchments, had evidently been used as a library, when he heard Winthrop's voice raised in anger.

The thing was so totally unexpected that he stood an instant in doubt; then he called his name aloud.

His voice rang through the empty room like a revolver shot; there was an answering shout, and Winthrop appeared from the adjoining room, a parchment in his hand, his face flushed, his whole aspect uncanny; from beneath a fur coat which he had donned on reaching the early dawn they gathered for the final stage of the journey. The mules were turned loose, where there was an opportunity for them to graze on some stunted moss, and each of the seven loaded himself with provisions to the limit of what prudence allowed. Then they set their faces toward the mighty peak up which they must climb.

In the icy atmosphere climbing was difficult, and, owing to the high altitude which they had already reached, they began to experience difficulty in breathing. But Winthrop seemed to be immune from all suffering. With his eyes shining, his tall slim figure bent forward, he toiled gaily up the declivities, laughing as though intoxicated. Andrews eyed him anxiously. Was it possible, he thought again, that Neville had been right after all?

After two hours, one of the hillmen flung himself down in the shelter of a boulder, and declared it impossible to advance another step; as the man had evidently reached the limit of his endurance, he was left in charge of some provisions, which the others were now compelled to abandon; two hours later another hillman was left behind on a higher level, while the diminished party toiled on.

The sun beat down upon them, scorching hot, and at the same time a bitter wind bit to the marrow of their bones. In the steep ascent hands were torn and bleeding, lips spurted blood, yet up they pressed, until when evening came they made camp almost within reach of their goal.

It was not really a camp, but rather a bare shelter by the side of an overhanging rock; and here, ere they fell into an uneasy slumber, Winthrop told the story of his dream.

"You know, Andrews," he began, "how I first got on the trail of my theory. We had been talking, you and I, of the original home of the ancestors of the Aryan tribes which peopled Europe, and wondering why none of the migratory tribes ever went back there. Nowadays emigrants often return to their old homes, but in these cases they never seem to have done so, else their literatures would have handed down traces of the return journey. Now why didn't they go back?"

Ito was listening closely. "Maybe, sahib, they couldn't get back," he suggested.

Winthrop smiled. "That's just my theory. Some eruption, or some earthquake may have blotted out the way. It must have been that or the people left behind would have, at intervals, visited the outside world. Now, all races have legends of happy valleys and beautiful gardens, which lie beyond their reach. I concluded that these all referred to the same place, and that the happy valley, somewhere or other, was still in existence. So I set to work to find it. I became a Buddhist priest."

Ito seemed puzzled. "Why should the sahib become a priest?" he asked in a low tone.

"To get inside the old monasteries, where the old manuscripts are kept," Winthrop explained. "My yellow gown took me to ancient monasteries where no white man had ever been, and there I finally found, in a pile of forbidden books, which the priests themselves must not read, directions for reaching the happy valley, which the forbidden books call the Garden of Desire. And now," he ended, with a great sigh of relief, "now in the morning I hope to show you the Garden of Desire beyond that side spur of the mountain."

"The sahib is wonderful," said Ito, softly. "To gain that he has served the gods in the temples. Surely he is a man of marvels."

"And yesterday in the ruins?" asked Andrews. "What was the trouble a there?"

Winthrop grew confused, and all his friend's doubts came back to him with redoubled force. "I read something I didn't like," he said curtly. "It seems the quest of the Garden is unlucky. But, of course, the old fool that wrote that didn't know what he was talking about."

"Oh," said Andrews, shivering in the icy air. "Didn't he?"

"No," replied Winthrop, gruffly. "He didn't."

Next morning marked the final stage of the great attempt. In the early dawn they swallowed some biscuits, barely moistened with coffee, made over a spirit lamp, and began their trying climb. Above them the mountain was crossed to the right by a sharp spur, covered with snow.

Winthrop took out his red-covered book and consulted it with care. "I am right. Just behind that spur," he said quietly.

They were very silent as they toiled up the mountainside. Sometimes one of them missed his footing, and the rope which bound them together—they had been roped since leaving the ruins of the monastery—came taut with a jerk. But for the most part all kept their footing with the ease of mountaineers. And presently, footsore, weary, bleeding, they reached the summit of the spur and beheld beneath them the flaming colors of the Garden of Desire.

It lay far down, apparently in a warm temperate climate, not unlike, it seemed to Andrews, his native California. Through their glasses could be made out stately temples and great palaces, and once—so still was the air—there floated up to them the notes of a great silver bell.

Winthrop, his grey eyes alight, prepared to descend into the valley. The task was one of some difficulty, for they stood upon the summit of a precipice; the whole end of the spur being clear-cut and sharp, the result evidently of a volcanic eruption, which had closed the valley against all egress.

LIVING is the kind of thing which seems to have lasted forever; especially when one has been eleven for some months. She had been called Vanessa at a previous period in her existence; but she had been very young then, and had known hardly anything. The former Vanessa had had no principles worth mentioning, in the opinion of her successor; she had not been bad, but merely ignorant. This Vanessa had principles, at least she had one. By this time she was eleven, Vanessa had read far too much for her own good; but no one could stop her.

"Mother," said the highly moral Vanessa to Mrs. Brown, "when people are girls, they ought to like girls best, oughtn't they?"

"It might be a very good thing if they did," replied Mrs. Brown, absorbed in the contemplation of nature, who, without warning, had suddenly applied her shoulder to the wheel.

"Not that there is anything the matter with boys, I don't mean," pursued Vanessa anxiously. "But when people are girls, it's girls they ought to think about and be good to. Girls first; and boys afterwards. Boys," said Vanessa solemnly, "belong to someone else. And girls belong to each other. That is the way they were meant to be."

"We should try to be good to everyone," Mrs. Brown remarked tentatively, considering how far she could justly propel Vanessa's mind in the direction of this doctrine which seemed about to stretch a protecting wing over her youngest daughter's girlhood, the time when Vanessa would have to go to school and be invisible to Mrs. Brown during part of the day.

"Girls," murmured Vanessa in a dream, "girls."

"Mother would be very glad," said Mrs. Brown, taking chances, "if you were to find a nice little girl for a friend."

There was a young person of eight with an innocent docile mind near enough to be made a friend of; but she wasn't the one Vanessa was thinking about; nothing so simple.

The Brown family was spending the summer on a fruit farm in a part of the country where to be on a fruit farm is one of the most encouraging episodes in any juvenile existence. Systematic benevolence had converted the same neighborhood into a starting place for emigrant girls from London. Annie Guay was starting in the farm house where the Browns boarded; and few happenings in life had ever given Mrs. Brown as much satisfaction as to be able to point out to Vanessa and the rest of her family Annie Guay's starting. It was then Vanessa learned that everyone is loved the same, especially when it doesn't seem like it. She learned something else at the same time which was almost as valuable to her. When it was too late to do anything about it, Mrs. Brown saw that Vanessa was going to devote herself to girls just as she had said she would. Liberty, fraternity and equality had seized hold of Vanessa; she believed that you could walk right into that kind of thing. Now Vanessa might be eleven; but Annie was as old as the hills. Mrs. Brown would have stopped it if she could; but she depended on Vanessa to tell her. Vanessa meant to tell her when she was thoroughly acquainted with Annie, and had been a Mrs. Brown to her; but in the end the telling wasn't so easy.

Annie had been taught to sing alto in the Home; and since this was the first time that Vanessa had ever heard alto to know what it was, she regarded it as a highly romantic characteristic of Miss Guay, indicating that much might be expected from her. As far as the impression she made on Vanessa was concerned, Annie was entirely alto. Her eyes were alto—black. So was her nose, with close nostrils. She walked alto, and looked it. When she talked, she talked alto; but she talked very little. After Vanessa was grown up she reflected that Annie had never had a sufficiently unguarded moment to let fall a single remark about where she had come from, or what she had seen. This also had been taught in the Home; but with Annie it went deeper than instruction.

"I suppose," remarked Vanessa with complacency, "that you were sorry to leave England."

"No," said Annie, dipping one of Mrs. Stetter's aprons casually into a tub of water and holding it up to see if it really needed any more washing. "I thought I could do some good here."

"Oh my!" exclaimed Vanessa impulsively, "I didn't know that was why you came. I am not nearly as good as that." Then she wasn't so sure—about Annie.

Singularly enough, if it had not been for her principles, Vanessa would soon have tired of becoming acquainted with Annie. She began to feel that it was impracticable. But Annie felt otherwise; one must have some interest in life, even if one is starting. Annie didn't care particularly for Vanessa; but Vanessa would have to do, because she was the only one who would do.

THE farmer's name was Mr. Stetter. He appreciated Vanessa. If there was one thing he liked, it was little girls; the more little girls the more he liked them; he was a charming man. Miss Guay, as he called her, wasn't going to have anything to do with Vanessa if he could help it. There were other transient denizens on the farm that summer. The agricultural operations of a fruit farm are singularly attractive. One may hair, conveyed to Mr. Stetter the intelligence that whomever he was going to like best in the end it wouldn't be Cynthia. William was, say, seventeen.

"Is her hair red?" Vanessa inquired studiously of Mr. Stetter. She had met Cynthia soon after coming to the farm.

"That's what people call it," Mr. Stetter answered jocosely.

"She said that my hair looked red sometimes in the sun."

"Well then, it doesn't," William interpolated savagely.

Vanessa looked at him. It hadn't occurred to her before that William must consider her too infantile to be spoken to. But it occurred to her now, for this was the sole remark that he had ever addressed to her. The fact somewhat prejudiced her against William. She went on with what she had been going to say to Mr. Stetter.

"Would you like me just as well if my hair was red?"

"Vanessa," Mr. Stetter replied fervently, "have any kind of hair you like. Nothing would ever change the way I feel to you."

What could be plainer than the difference between Mr. Stetter and William? Cynthia might well go on her way rejoicing.

It couldn't have been long afterwards that Annie Guay sought Vanessa one evening at twilight. She had been undergoing a disagreement with the veteran on the farm who looked after the hens, and seemed to wish for society. Or perhaps she had something to say to her? Vanessa wasn't quite sure. Miss Guay looked extremely alto.

"Wherever you go," she began, "you will always find an aching heart."

"Wherever you go," she began, "You will always find an aching heart."

Vanessa positively shuddered; she felt so sorry for Annie.

"Could anyone do anything to help you, Annie? Could I?"

"Oh, it taint me," Annie exclaimed with suave emphasis, "'tis William."

"Why," said Vanessa with astonishment, "what's he been doing?"

"He's that fond of you," pursued Miss Guay. "But he's afraid to tell you. He said 'Annie, would you take her my love?' And I said, 'William, I'd do anything for one who felt like you.'"

Mrs. Brown's youngest regarded the eloquent stranger from the standpoint of a detached and somewhat critical frame of mind, and remarked chillingly:

"Did you think—that I would think—that that was true?"

Then her principles fairly climbing over each other in her bosom, she leaned forward eagerly and laid one hand on Annie Guay's arm. "Oh Annie," she said, "it's wicked to tell a lie. You mustn't."

"Tain't a lie," said Annie. "He loves you."

"Who cares about him?" exclaimed Vanessa. "I know it's a lie. Haven't I seen him? It's you I care about, Annie. It's dreadful to tell lies. Don't you ever tell another."

This was Miss Guay's drama for the summer. But what she couldn't understand was that no matter how much she said about William, Vanessa couldn't get up any interest in his supposed love affair; she didn't seem to be able to. Vanessa hadn't the slightest difficulty about William. But why couldn't she get Annie Guay to acknowledge she was telling lies? Of course the minute one admitted telling a lie that was the end of it; one couldn't tell any more. But by and by the story of William became too tiresome. She intimated to Annie that, as far as she was concerned, the discussion in all its details was closed. Mr. Stetter was occupation enough for any well-regulated mind that summer. Naturally, according to Vanessa, when she left a thing alone, it ceased happening.

ONE day, however, she awoke to the fact that here was Annie left to perish in her sins; and she, Vanessa Brown, who knew better, was going back to the city. She didn't want to do it; but she would have to go right into the subject. She was the only one who knew about Miss Guay's departure from the truth. Vanessa had never dreamed of telling anyone what Annie Guay had said about William. Even Mrs. Brown had to do without hearing this kind of thing.

She pursued Annie, who would always rather find Vanessa than be found by her, round the house, in by one door of the wash-house and out by the other, until she brought her up in a corner of the children's play ground which was on the other side of the oldest apple orchard on the farm.

"Annie," said Vanessa miserably. "I'm going home."

Annie assented.

"Here's a necktie, Annie, from Mother."

The tie disappeared into poor Miss Guay's pocket. She looked relieved.

"Annie," burst out Vanessa, trying to get her arms comfortably round Annie's neck and failing entirely. "Don't tell any more lies. Promise me you'll be good."

"Who's been telling you any lies?" remarked Miss Guay imperturbably. "I've got to help Mrs. Stetter get tea ready right off."

The interview which was to have made Annie a better girl wasn't quite up to what Vanessa had hoped; and it had been more trying than she had imagined.

She walked back through the orchard with her head down, thinking round and round Annie Guay. There wasn't anything more to do; this was the last time. She had been quite successfully kept outside of anything that was going on inside Annie's mind. Vanessa was a good deal of a little fool; and likely she thought of celebrated examples of the kind of thing she had been trying to do which had turned out otherwise. This wasn't the way things happened in books.

But at that moment, supper being, so to speak, within reach, William was returning to the carriage house with a piece of the new harness which Mr. Stetter was particular about; he had been known to lose his temper over it twice already. The decorous William, seeing that Vanessa was absorbed in her own mind, paused to regard her with a cautiously speculative look. There was no reason why William should not have done this; it was the only time he had to live, just as it was Vanessa's, and he had had six more years to become attached to it. But fortunately for his further progress in the study of feminine human nature, Vanessa looked up and saw him. She saw, in William's expression, a great deal more.

Here was something which had to be attended to before one died!

It was impossible to speak to William about this kind of thing one's own self. She whirled round in the air on her heel, looking for an instrument. There was her youngest brother, Hector, three years older than she was herself. "Hec-

The Quitter Comes Back

BY GRETA BIDLAKE

Illustrated by A. Fisher

"IT'S no use, Tom, I can't stand it any longer. It's not your fault and it's not mine. We've made a mistake, that's all. I hate this country with my whole soul and I'm going back to England."

There were defiance and determination in the little war bride's eyes.

"I'm sorry, Edith, but I don't see what more I can do. I thought we had done very well this year." Tom's look was wistful. "The crop turned out better than we dared hope for. Another year like this would put us on our feet. I've done everything I could," a little note of bitterness crept in here, "you knew you weren't coming to a city palace when you left Birmingham."

"I know, Tom, all that's true and yet if we just can't make a go of it what's the use. Life on this fruit farm is as isolated as it would be at the North Pole and it's very near as cold already; I'll tell you that."

"I thought you said once you loved me—must be some mistake about that."

"None at all, only I've my eyes open now. Marriage isn't what we thought it was and Canada,—does anybody in this country ever see anybody else? I do love you, Tom, but can't you see?" she cried pleadingly, "can't you look at my side of it and see how awful it is!"

"I dare say it is, Edith. This is all very sudden." Tom was rather dazed.

"I wish I'd known you felt like this."

"Well, you know now. I've tried to stifle it, to choke it down and like the place for your sake, but I can't do it."

"So this, then, this," he broke out, "is what I fought for through those years in France and Belgium,—to come home alive, marry the girl I loved—and have her throw me to one side like an old shoe. All right, Edith, go." Tom had his pride. "I'll not lift a hand to keep you. Better make it quick though for I'll have to go into Vancouver to find work for the winter."

"I'll make it tomorrow, Tom."

And she did.

LIFE in Birmingham proved rather different after all. She was frankly delighted to see everybody but she noticed a hint of restraint even in the first salutations that friends and relatives extended to her.

"How long are you going to be with us?" asked her father. "Shall I plan on giving you your allowance as usual and on your making your home here?"

"Why, I don't know," vaguely, "certainly not about the allowance. Tom gave me five hundred dollars when I left Canada and he said he'd send me more. He'll never consent to my being an expense to anyone else. About the home,—yes, I suppose so. It would be nice, wouldn't it daddy, if Tom could only find work in England that he'd like."

"You know what the unemployment situation is here, I suppose," he answered drily.

To her gay, "Well, mother, it's nice to be home. I never want to see Canada again, I tell you that," her mother replied, "But Tom, my dear, he's your husband."

"You're most Victorian, mummy. Tom's all right. He likes Canada."

She found her chum, Doris, evidently distressed about matters as they were.

"There'll be a legal separation, of course. You'd much better do one thing or the other. You'll find yourself in a difficult position all round if you don't." Another "best friend," Margery, opened her eyes in surprise.

"Why, Edith, a visit so soon! You must have done well in your part of the world. How long shall you be in England?"

"Forever and ever, Margery. I'm not going back to Canada."

"The idea! I always thought going out to Canada was one of the most delightful adventures anywhere!"

"So did I!" vindictively.

"I can't believe you're really turning your back on such a chance!" Margery was incredulous.

Still another chum, Amorel, was all for Tom. Amorel had married a widower with three children. He had served nearly four years in the war. His two sisters had kept the children for him but in different villages and far apart. Now he was very glad to have them under one roof again. Amorel made a devoted little wife and step-

"The mean, nasty things!" she said spitefully. "They'd take me as quickly as ever if I were a girl or a widow. It's because I'm married. They needn't be so fussy; Tom's worth any twenty of them."

The next day Bobby Ryndell, who was one of her oldest friends took her to a great show in the heart of London, and Tom's stock went up another hundred points. There were huge sheaves of Canadian wheat like that she had seen growing on the prairies and boxes and barrels of the choicest apples she had seen anywhere outside of Canada. Bobby found a box that Tom had sent. Tom's apples in London—and they took a prize! She was just a little bit miserable when she wished she knew what tree they had come from but she had never felt much interest in the orchard or the garden when Tom had taken her through.

"That's the country for a man who you every day we lived. What about it now?—Three times in four months!"

"Let's sit down," said Bob leading her to a quiet seat. "Yes, I know, my dear," he began in fatherly fashion when they were sitting, "you see it's like this. You dropped out of our lives over here and went off to live a life of your own, you and Tom. Now you've come back. We're interested in other things; it's hard to fit you in again. Then we're all Tom's friends. We all want him to have a square deal and we haven't heard his side of the story yet. I'm rather busy myself and can't see you as often as I'd like. As for the others, of course you'll never find anybody to care about you as Tom does. You used to be a plucky little thing," he added irrelevantly and somewhat reminiscently.

"I am yet, you horrid old thing!"

Edith had caught the sting of his implication. She walked off and left him then and there.

* * *

ALL this explains why, in the face of her denials, she wrote a long letter to Tom that night and ended it with the following contrite paragraph:

"Oh, Tom, I'm so ashamed of myself and everybody's been ashamed for me all these months without my ever knowing what was the matter. I'm going back, Tom. Please, I want to. I want to learn to do things with you, not to be a drag and a hindrance. Dear old Tom, I was too heartless and selfish to think of you when you were working hard all the time and wanted to do so much for me. When I saw your apples today, boy, I was really a little bit homesick. No wonder I didn't like your wonderful country,—I didn't try to a bit for all I made myself think I did. I was thinking about England all the time. England has changed too and Canada,—well Tom, Canada and you would mean peace and content to me now. If you'll have me back, dearest, I'll be very humbly glad to go."

Five weeks went by. The only news from Tom was a scant cable which said: "Don't come, I'm going over. Good news. Love,—Yours, Tom."

She was dreadfully excited and curious and, oh, so hungry to see Tom again, but she kept her secret, saying not a word to anyone.

One afternoon six weeks after she sent her letter she came in from a long walk in the park. Tom sprang up from conversation with her mother when he heard her mount the stairs and came forward.

"Edith!"

"Oh, Tom, you dear, you old dear!"

"Whenever did you come?" she asked as soon as she could get her breath again.

"Landed yesterday and came through at once."

"Let's go right back!"

"Not a bit of it if you want to stay here. This success business comes fast in our country, honey. I've made my pile. We can take it easy if you like."

"Oh, Tom, whatever has happened? Tell me all about it this minute!" It was very strange how happy she was just to have Tom at her side and smiling down at her.

He helped her off with her coat and hat, hung them on a hook and led her to a window seat overlooking the park.

mother, while her middle-aged husband was very much in love with her.

"Fancy your leaving Tom," she said on the occasion of Edith's first visit. "I can't imagine how you could do it. He's such a splendid chap. I was in love with him myself, wasn't I, old dear?" Amorel's husband was sitting in an arm chair reading his evening paper. She tweaked his ear playfully.

"I suppose you know," to Edith, "Tom could have had any of a dozen of us Oh, yes he could but he picked you. Should think you'd break your heart without him. She leaned over and rubbed her face up and down her husband's cheek to tease him into a kiss.

The boys she met were different too. They said, "Cheerio, old thing," and passed on. Now and then one of them brought her home from a dance or a party but mostly they just didn't know she was around.

wants to do things—or a woman either!" said Bobby enthusiastically.

"Bobby Ryndell, you don't know what you're talking about. It's a dreadful place; all hills and valleys that swallow you up and prairies stretching for miles. Why, I lived in the heart of the Rocky Mountains and I'd have been far happier if I'd been one of their grizzly bears!"

"But Tom,—Tom's a pretty good sort, eh?"

"Tom's a dear!" she said warmly. "He makes all the men here seem so useless. I can't tell you how but he's a dear and he does!"

"Having a good time here? Don't want to go back?"

"No, I can't ever go back, but a good time here—nobody cares anything about me any more. You're a sample of the way my friends act. I used to see

Number Twenty-One Crow Lane

BY J. CHATTERIS LIVETT

Illustrated by F. N. Mann

NUMBER twenty-one Crow Lane was a quaint little shop, and very difficult indeed to find, for it was almost completely hemmed-in by the neighboring tall buildings. To the left, as you gazed at it from across the street, was a big sombre-looking structure of gray stone; while on the opposite side a mammoth warehouse towered into the sky, pressing against the tiny store as though to squeeze it out of existence.

As for number twenty-one, nobody seemed able to recall how or when it first came to be there at all. It was as though the faded sign "THOMAS DENNY, DEALER IN SECOND HAND BOOKS," must have been displayed over the narrow window in Crow Lane ever since the beginning of Time, or at least very shortly afterwards.

Never, in the memory of man, had the small establishment been repainted, and its dingy anaemic exterior looked upon the scurrying world with a shy, furtive glance, as though wishing to creep away to some more restful sphere. The small square panes in the low, old-fashioned window were, however, always spotlessly clean, so that the attractive volumes grouped temptingly behind the polished glass could peep out quite easily at the street above.

To enter the shop, you had to descend three or four steps and push open a thick oak door, and this procedure invariably caused a merry tinkle to issue from the ancient bell over the entrance, as if it were singing, "Ah, here comes another customer. They always find their way through my doorway—all the people who know where there's a good book to be had."

And just inside, ready to welcome you as though you were his closest friend, would be old Tom Denny himself, his short, rather thick-set figure slightly bowed, but his bright, kindly face beaming from behind gold-rimmed spectacles. With a royal gesture he would wave his hand towards the laden shelves, with the movement plainly giving you the freedom of this small kingdom.

And oh, what a collection of books awaited your inspection! All around, and piled up to the low ceiling too, books of every description. Not many rare editions, it is true, but all sorts of unusual volumes, with quaint pictures and lettering. You suspected that some of them had been dozing comfortably on their shelves ever since Tom Denny first came to number twenty-one, and certainly that was the opinion of many who had known the cosy little bookshop for years and years, but of course, to tell the truth, Tom had been a part of Crow Lane for so long, that very few pretended to remember just when it was that he opened his second-hand store. If any person was aware of the precise date, he kept the fact discreetly to himself, for to reveal such knowledge could only prove how ancient was the rash individual who possessed such hoary information.

The best thing about the place was that you were never expected to buy. As it happened, you nearly always did, for the bargains were far too tempting to resist, but Tom seemed just as delighted if you spent an hour or so browsing among the treasures on the dust-covered shelves and then departed without making a purchase, as if you had ordered a score of valuable books to be packed up and despatched home immediately.

In the rear of the shop were a couple of small tables, with soft inviting chairs drawn up close by, in which you could lounge and forget the mad rushing world outside as you followed the thrilling pages of some tale of bygone days, told in the romantic language of yesterday. In the winter, a large open grate was stacked high with glowing logs, which cast queer restless shadows across the floor.

Sometimes, then, sitting by the blazing fire with a book resting idly on your knee, you would gradually become very sleepy, and soon all sorts of unaccountable things would happen. Quite frequently, on these occasions, the musty volumes would leap down from their comfortable bed on the shelves above, and very often the covers would open of their own accord, and strange Lilliputian creatures come from out the dim past. Then they would scramble up the chair legs, to revel merrily on the smooth round tables. Sometimes, if you kept quite still, they would tell you of wonderful adventures in far-off lands, in Egypt, China, Italy and Sunny Spain. You could sail the broad Atlantic in their company, or, in strange high-prowed ships like huge white gulls under their stretch of canvas, visit bright-hued islands of the Southern Seas, gliding imperceptibly from one small fairy-land to another.

Then, suddenly, the book you were holding would slip noisily to the floor, and instantly the merry little folk would scurry back inside the yellow pages, the covers fly to with a snap, and by the time you had opened your eyes, all the books were fast asleep on the shelves once more, just as though nothing had happened. And old Tom would look up from his corner by the fire-place and laugh heartily, the blue smoke from his old briar pipe curling lazily up to the ceiling.

green blind was drawn closely over the narrow window, and tears streamed down the glistening panes. After that sad day, Mrs. Tom was seen no more at the upper windows; her cheery voice, humming little snatches of some old-fashioned melody as she bustled about the house, was silent. But in a very short while the small bookshop recovered its accustomed brightness, and Tom was, outwardly at least, as happy and optimistic as ever. Soon he discovered a genial Irishwoman with two small children, seeking a comfortable home, and instantly, the trio were installed in the lonely rooms upstairs. Old Tom had found a treasure. Mrs. Burke at once adopted him as her own, and she kept him mended, and scolded, and properly fed, just like the other members of her family.

Then there followed a glorious period for the children. Night after night, when supper was over, they would run downstairs and climb up on Tom's knee, as he dozed by the fire. And he would tell them the most wonderful stories, tales of wicked giants, and bold bad pirates; tales of chivalry too, in which courageous knights in splendid armour, well, but he was unable to read without painful effort. Urged by Mrs. Burke, he at last paid a visit to the big Ophthalmic Hospital, but the doctors looked grave and shook their knowing heads. Altered glasses would make little difference, they said, and so they feared there was nothing they could do. So Tom read less, and little by little his days became filled with dreams. Perhaps, sometimes, as the weeks and months rolled by, he pictured Mrs. Tom hastening along Crow Lane, her arms full of sundry purchases from the corner grocery store. Perhaps—who can say—his mind wandered back to still earlier days, when he and Mrs. Tom were quite, quite young, and long before she became Mrs. Tom. Perhaps he thought of the future, when he should have heard the jingle of the merry little door-bell for the last time. However that may be, it was very pleasant to dream, very pleasant indeed, and Tom was happy. At least, he thought, I shall always have my cosy little shop—that will be mine until I go.

And then one day a letter came. A letter in a long white envelope.

He handed it to Mrs. Burke. "My eyes are not quite as good as they used

Ready to welcome you, as though you were his closest friend, would be old Tom Denny himself

THERE were times too, when some poor soul, attracted to the window by the temptingly displayed volumes opened at some particularly absorbing passage, would, after gazing enviously through the glass, venture timidly inside and ask old Tom if he might see one of the books, "just for a minute or so." Then, as he laid down the coveted treasure, Tom would beam at him over the rim of his spectacles. "Suppose you take that book home with you, and enjoy it there," he would say. "Sometime, when you are passing by, you can bring it back again." Now and then he would press a volume into someone's hand with, "It's getting very old and lonely on these crowded shelves, my dear. It will please me very much if you will take it home—and love it."

Once upon a time, though long ago now, there was a Mrs. Tom, as cheery and lovable as the dear old fellow himself. They lived together for goodness knows how many years in the tiny flat over the store. Then there came a dreary day, with the cold March rain beating down in torrents, when the second-hand shop was closed. The dark-rode gallantly to the rescue of the most beautiful princesses with long golden hair. One story in particular—about a magic carpet—the children loved. All you had to do was to stand on the carpet, and just wish to be wherever you liked. Before you could get the words out of your mouth, or even think them—you were there.

It was about this time, while he was story-telling one evening, that Tom heard a doleful cry in the street above. He hurried out and picked up a frightened dog, a tiny fox terrier puppy that had been knocked down by a passing truck. Fortunately, the injury proved to be slight, and as a matter of course, the delighted terrier was at once made one of the family. He became part of the establishment, wagging his absurd stumpy tail when a customer rang the merry little bell, and then curling up again by Tom's chair preparatory to going off to sleep once more.

As Time went on, and Tom, and Mrs. Burke, and the children, and the dog, and all Tom's customers grew steadily older, Tom's eyes aged gradually too. At a distance he could still see quite to be, Mrs. Burke. Would you mind reading this to me?"

Mrs. Burke opened the letter and spread the single sheet out on the table before her. Suddenly her eyes caught the concluding lines.

"as the building is to be demolished, kindly note that you will be required to vacate the premises at twenty-one Crow Lane, on or before November 30th."

Her brain reeled. Instinctively she realized that she must gain time. In a flash Mrs. Burke crumpled the dreadful letter in her hand, and ran to the door leading upstairs.

"Just a minute, Mr. Tom," she called back. "Them pies is burning-sure. can't you smell 'em?"

She hurried upstairs and then collapsed on the nearest chair. Poor old Mr. Tom. A blow like this would kill him. To be forced out of his beloved shop—his home—it was unthinkable. Of course, he could find another place, but at his age. It seemed awful to think of such a thing. Still, he would have to be told.

of a lazy summer day. A few miles to the east lies Oka, and an hour's walk up a hill road brings one to the monastery of the Trappists, a veritable Castle of Silence and a suitable link with the crusading pioneers of the early Church, who strove with the devotion of martyrs to Christianize the savages of the seventeenth century. Farther down the Ottawa lies St. Anne de Bellevue, where lived, in a house still standing, Thomas Moore, the Irish poet, during his stay in Canada, and where he wrote "The Canadian Boat Song," with its haunting refrain:

"Row, brothers, row, the stream runs fast;
The rapids are near, and the daylight's past."

Should one have the curiosity to venture up-stream from the foot of the Long Sault, travelling past the rapids by the small, antiquated railway which meets the needs of the slender traffic, he will come shortly to Montebello, and there discover an old chateau behind its screen of woods. Here lived the peppery Louis Joseph Papineau, in his declining years, after he had led the brief rebellion of 1837 in Lower Canada and then remained to see the reforms he sought secured by other hands. Beyond this retreat, one might follow the Ottawa to the Canadian capital, and so to new wildernesses and regions of wealth of which Champlain, with all his energy, never dreamed. But we must return.

Adam Dollard, who was a young Frenchman who had come to Canada three years earlier at the age of twenty-two, had been in the French army, and he was inspired by an enthusiasm of faith, patriotism and honor, which has led to his being likened to the crusaders of the Middle Ages. He appears to have been fired by a desire to wash some stain from his past. The struggling settlement of three thousand French people, mainly divided between Quebec, pressive incident than the farewell of Dollard and his companions, as they took the oath "to fight even unto death, for God or country," and then set out for what all knew must be a desperate adventure. In the chapel of Hotel Dieu, in the little clearing below Mount Royal, and under the sombre setting of the evergreens, scarcely yet pushed back from the river, the men and women who founded that great settlement, as yet with only one hundred and forty men, took part in the ceremonies. There was Maisonneuve, father of the city, whose dashing figure is still preserved

Eventually, Dollard and his companions reached the foot of the rapids of Long Sault and took up their position in an abandoned palisade, there to await the coming of the Iroquois. They had not long to wait. Within two days an advance party of the Indians were in sight, and the firing of the muskets of the French soon brought the main body of Indians, and resulted in a desperate battle that lasted for five days. Dollard and his men fought with the utmost bravery and abandon, but their defences at best were weak and unstable. They suffered from thirst, and experienced danger and loss from journeys to the river at night for water. The few Hurons who had joined them were not to be depended upon, and eventually deserted to the enemy with the exception of their chief, Anahotaha. A miration for great heroic episodes of the past, and among these I desire to recall one from the early history of Canada, the defence of Long Sault by Dollard and his companions.

More than two thousand years ago a great army of Persians was halted for days by a small force of Greeks at a narrow pass between a great cliff and the sea. This struggle is known to history as Thermopylae. Half a century after Champlain laid the foundation of Canada at Quebec, a mere handful of Frenchmen, seventeen in all, aided by a few Indians, battled for days behind a broken palisade against hundreds of Iroquois, until, though finally extinguished, they so impressed the foe with their fighting qualities that the attack on New France was abandoned.

to us in the magnificent bronze monument in Montreal. The brave Charles Lemoyne stood near him, regretting that he must remain behind. Marguerite Bourgeois, who had opened the first school for females in Montreal in a stable granted her by Maisonneuve, and Jeanne Mance, the first in Montreal to nurse the sick and care for the injured—these were spectators of the momentous departure of Dollard for the Long Sault.

Such a venture presented immediate physical difficulties to men not hardened to the wilderness life, and after the solemn departure the seventeen gallant Frenchmen underwent untold misery and difficulty. It is said that a week's time was lost alone at the head of Montreal Island in circumventing the rapids where the Ottawa flows into the St. Lawrence. "The zeal and ardor of so holy an expedition," says the Jesuit Relation of that year, "made them set at naught encounters with the ice and the coldness of the waters but recently melted; they resolutely leaped into them to drag their canoes with their hands amid the stones and blocks of ice."

frantic effort was made by Dollard when he filled an old musket with powder and attempted to throw it over the palisade with the hope of bringing great destruction on the enemy. The weapon struck branches of a tree and fell back, killing several and wounding others of the band already sadly reduced. In this extremity the Iroquois became bolder and, learning from the renegade Hurons of the slim force of the defenders, stormed the fort from all sides, and broke through, and the remnant of brave defenders were soon annihilated. Such an exploit would almost seem foolhardy and useless, but its effect was instant and remarkable. Twenty years of warfare by the Iroquois against the slender settlements of the French came to a termination when the redmen realized the mettle of the colonists. If a handful of men behind a broken palisade could put up such a battle, what might the invaders expect from the forces in the fortified towns of Montreal and Quebec? Dollard by his gen-

This incident has been called the Canadian Thermopylae, and Dollard and his companions have won a place in Canada's Hall of Fame for all time.

To-day one may visit the scenes of Dollard's heroism and find only peace and plenty in a setting of the rugged splendors of the Laurentians. Long Sault is a succession of rapids on the Ottawa River, about fifty miles above Montreal, and the village at the foot of the rapids bears the musical name of Carillon. For peace and quiet on a summer day it recalls a "land where it is always afternoon," but if the wind is in the west the dull moan of the cascades is carried to the village, and one wonders what day these brown waters will be harnessed for commerce, and this last natural possession of the wilderness diverted to uses of man. Low shores line the river, but off to the north the lovely Laurentians reach up and up, their evergreen crests mottled by cloud shadows

Three Rivers and Montreal, lived in constant dread of attacks by the Iroquois, who occupied the rich lands south of Lake Ontario. It was the day of Bishop Laval, the pioneer "circuit rider" of Canada. He went about among the people of the settlements, and with the other black robes proclaimed a severe gospel and comforted the anxious settlers, who were ever in fear of the Iroquois, who would drive the stranger from the land.

In the spring of 1660 word reached the settlers that a horde of the enemy would shortly attack Montreal from the West. Three hundred Indians were gathered at the mouth of the Richelieu, and five hundred more were already descending the Ottawa, said the message. The impetuous Dollard quickly made his decision, and with sixteen others determined to take the aggressive and defend the approach to Montreal. Canadian history probably has no more im-

The Gladsome Living Room

BY COLLIER STEVENSON

THE heart of the home! How better can the "homey" and gladsome living room that has magically succeeded the austere and awesome parlor of yesteryear be described. The living room has, indeed, a recognized status today as the pivot upon which revolves our whole home life. Small wonder, then, that, under every principle and practice of contemporary home-planning, to the living room are unanimously accorded the foremost consideration, the choicest location and the most interesting development: for does not the importance of the room more than warrant all the thought and effort that are involved?

Even in the most superficial discussion of the living room, mention of the important bearing of proper exposure and agreeable outlook cannot be altogether omitted. In an urban house, predetermined as to contour as in the placement of rooms by imitations incidental to a restricted street frontage, neither outlook nor exposure is of fundamental import: whereas, in a suburban or country house, they are both of vital concern, and, of all rooms, particularly for the living room, that is much in use during the daylight hours.

Before any wise decision can be made in reference to either exposure or outlook, it is, of course, essential to understand the conditions with which the various rooms of a house are to cope: in other words, to estimate accurately the eventual utilization of each. Primarily, the actual utilization of a living room occurs after, rather than before, midday: and it proceeds with less interruption during the winter than during the summer. Obviously, then, in arriving at any decision relative to exposures, attention can appropriately be confined to that best adapted to the short afternoons of winter, when sunshine is especially welcome. Does this not point directly to the advantage of a Southerly exposure? That the dominating exposure of a living room should be such has, as a matter of fact, of late years, become a veritable axiom—and this to the credit of the architectural profession.

No rule can, however, be invariably observed: therefore, any axiom as to Southerly exposure can be judiciously honored only after the matter of outlook has been duly considered. Often, even in a property far from extensive, there is a choice of several good outlooks. Occasionally, too, the most interesting view may be Northward, Eastward, in any direction but towards the South. What, under these circumstances, of a Southerly exposure for the living room? If it is impossible to effect a compromise, whereby the relation of the living room to the balance of the house will be such as to permit windows for the enjoyment both of the desirable outlook and the ideal exposure, the only alternative is to choose between the two. And, in choosing, it is well to bear in mind that, while it is comparatively easy to achieve an appearance of sunniness in any room by means of certain color-schemes, it is not possible to encompass within doors an adequate substitute for an attractive outlook: which rather points to a decision in favor of outlook rather than exposure.

With the coming of night, however, neither exposure nor outlook is a matter of moment—yet a living room is even more the family congregating place after dark than by day. This serves to emphasize the necessity for the utmost care in the selection of a color-scheme. Not only must the chosen colorings be agreeable by day: they must be no less pleasant under artificial illumination. That is the first requirement. The second is this: that, if possible, the colorings be chosen according to their "warmth" or "coldness" of effect, dependent upon the exposure of the room. Rose, through its whole gamut to the deeper mulberry and red shades, and yellow, from a light canary to a deep orange: these are examples of the so-called "warm" colorings especially suited to the room whose exposures admit little or no direct sunlight. Blue, in its amazing varieties, green and violet, both limitless in gradation: these suggest the possibilities in making from the "cold" colors an entirely appropriate selection for a room of very sunny exposure.

In this diminutive living room, the paneled walls and the woodwork are painted French-gray and the ceiling is tinted oyster-white. Mottled orange tiles form the hearth and facing of the quaint corner fireplace: and their glowing color is repeated in the valanced window-hangings of plain sunfast material, edged with French blue and black silk fringe. The rug is of blue velvet, with a dark border. The gay bird-patterned chintz used for the cushions and chair-coverings carries a pleasing combination of blue, orange, gray and black on its ivory background. Interest is added to the room by the use of several pieces of furniture painted gray to match the walls and woodwork: and a good foil is provided by the balance of the furniture, which is black-enameled. The lighting fixtures are of Roman gold finish and the long mirror on one wall is framed to correspond with them. Because the room is small, the absence of pictures is especially commendable.

Rough-plastered walls of a light, clear Italian blue and woodwork painted to match have an interesting foil in the dark brown timbers of the beamed ceiling. In the great antique tapestry which adorns one wall, there is much more blue—a greenish-blue, that blends perfectly with the bluish-greens and contrasts pleasantly with the old reds that also appear in the design. Beneath the tapestry, three cushions of yellow and gold brocade repeat the coloring of the thin gold gauze curtains which hang at the windows. The wide davenport before the fireplace is covered with a plain velour in the bluish-green of the tapestry: but most of the chairs, which are chiefly early Spanish and Italian specimens, are upholstered in dull brown tool-leather, that almost matches their warm brown walnut or oak frames. The gateleg table is of brown-stained oak. Upon it rests a lamp of pale Chinese yellow pottery with a simple shade of parchment in the natural coloring. The tall reading-lamp in one corner is similarly shaded. Of pictures, there are none—except the quiet pastoral scene, framed in dull gilt and hung above the fireplace.

In choosing a color-scheme, it should also be borne in mind that certain colors reflect light, while others notably absorb light—and, as this involves the question of artificial illumination, it has an important bearing upon the choice of color for living room decoration. As a rule, the most satisfactory results attend the selection of a rather light tone for the walls, ceiling and woodwork, unless it be that a room possesses many windows or that the style chosen for its architectural development demands a darker treatment. While the light colorings are, perhaps, less rich in effect than the more intense shades, they can easily be enriched by the introduction of harmonizing dark hues in the accessories of the room. Thus, in a living room having walls of cafe-au-lait color, a ceiling of pale ecru and woodwork to match the walls, velvet hangings of claret color, with chair-coverings and rugs carrying the same glowing hue, can be depended upon to create an effect of the utmost richness—yet with no undue absorption of either the natural or the artificial light.

* * *

RATHER than risk a wrong choice in color combination, many inexperienced home-decorators decide upon a one-toned harmony with a sense of perfect security: and then proceed to carry out that harmony so exhaustively, that they achieve an extremely monotonous effect—monotonous to an irritating degree! A living room all in tans and browns—the floors, the woodwork and the furniture of dark brown oak; the walls of brown; the ceiling of tan; the rugs, the hangings and the chair-coverings all of brown and tan combined—would undoubtedly be harmonious: but it would be just as surely deadly dull. Can you not visualize the change which would be effected?

by the introduction of subtle touches of jade green, coral, Copenhagen blue or burnt orange in lamps, chair-coverings and curtains? Or by soft mulberry, old blue and olive green, combined with the prevailing tan and brown in a decorative chintz for cushions, draperies and other accessories?

The one-tone harmony—that is, a color-scheme produced by a gradation of the tints and shades of one color—is really never satisfactory unless safeguarded from undue monotony by some contrasting note, as it lacks the power to stimulate the eye and the imagination. And, if it is to be truly glad some, a living room cannot be altogether devoid of stimulating color!

While a room individually may express just the idea it should—cheerfulness, restfulness, welcome or comfort—its good effect may be nullified altogether, because of a lack of harmony between it and the colorings of the adjoining rooms. There should, therefore, always be a proper transition of color from one room to another. For the amateur decorator, this can be achieved very satisfactorily through the use of harmonizing wallpapers throughout the communicating rooms of a house. Nor need this uniformity of treatment predicate monotony! In a small house, for instance, the walls ness and distance. Applied to the walls and woodwork of a room, it confers a restful air of wide spaces. The delicate gray-green of poppy leaves, the faded yellow of old parchment and the warm creamy-gray of putty are other space-creating colors especially suited to living room decoration. If any of these be chosen for the walls, the woodwork can be painted or enameled in the same tone: which will not only add considerably to the apparent size of the room, but facilitate the use of furniture of various types without discord. In the living room having gray-green walls and woodwork, for instance, let us use a plain, oblong rug of brownish-red, merely bordered in a darker shade—matching the brick hearth and facing of the open fireplace which centres one wall. For the covering of the Chesterfield and its attendant armchair, a changeable corded velours in gray-green and henna can be selected. For the mahogany chairs used in the room, gray-green poplin in a two-toned stripe would be particularly effective if the same material were used for long, straight hangings at the windows. Then—for that stimulation which is so desirable in a living room—wicker is available: great, roomy wicker chairs, enameled gray-green and cushioned in a chintz, patterned in henna, blue and gray-green on a light gray ground. For of room, there is a very pleasing alternative arrangement, whereby two settees are placed at right angles to the fireplace with a reading-table conveniently located between them. For the smaller room or for the room of square contour, armchairs and fireside-stools are infinitely preferable around the fireplace, with a reading-table placed either in the centre or at one end of the room.

A badly-lighted piano does not invite use. The piano should, therefore, if at all possible, be placed where the daylight will fall over the left shoulder of the player and where, after nightfall, no artificial light will shine in the eyes of the player.

No living room is complete without books. That is, then, a very good reason for providing built-in bookcases in the living room. These should invariably be finished to match the standing woodwork of the room. Whether they be of open-type or glass-doored is a matter of personal preference: but their shelves should be of adjustable construction. To avoid both stooping and stretching, the shelves should not be carried too high and the lower portion should be devoted to drawers—which will be found useful for maps, plates, portfolios and other library paraphernalia.

appearance, all pictures should lie close to the wall, instead of being tilted forward. It is also desirable to so hang a picture, that its centre comes within easy range of the eye. Pictures depicting the Ascension, or other religious subjects, can, of course properly be hung somewhat higher to convey the idea of worship. Landscapes showing mountain scenery can also be appropriately raised. When pictures nearly of a size form a group, the spaces between them should be uniform: for this creates a sense of repose.

In choosing pictures for home adornment, it is surely not necessary to urge that pictures which have become banal through a too-general use be omitted. Many splendid pictures have, alas! become, by their ubiquitousness veritable bromides in the modern Canadian home. When satisfactory reproductions of other equally good pictures are obtainable at very moderate cost, there is certainly no reason why each home should not possess a distinctive pictorial character, bespeaking thereby the individuality and discernment of the owners in matters artistic.

The value of abundant natural light we apparently appreciate to the full nowadays, for no longer do we enshroud our windows in layer upon layer of both diaphanous and light-obscuring fabrics. Instead, in all well-regulated homes, the windows are usually treated with curtains of fine net, voile marquisette or scrim next the glass and with inner curtains of a heavier fabric, straight-hanging, pushed well back to the sides and topped by a shallow valance or a shaped lambrequin. Thus do we cater to the entrance of light by day: but what of the evening hours?

Many living rooms, that are admirably lighted by day, are altogether inadequately illuminated by night—simply because their owners have not yet grasped the secret of successful illumination. By its very name, the living room suggests that a diversity of activities may be expected to proceed simultaneously in it. The provision of several distinct lighting centres, would therefore, appear to be absolutely essential, if real livableness is to ensue. That banishes the former idea of one central ceiling fixture being considered all-sufficient. With that type of illuminant used exclusively, the light is thrown where it achieves no useful purpose whatever—it is productive, perhaps, of a general glare, but certainly not of anything that conduces to enjoyment.

Instead of this archaic mode of lighting, how much better is a system whereby well-shaded lights in various parts of the room create several agreeable scenes for family work and play! Lights, there should be, near the piano, beside the bookcases, upon the desk, near the fireplace, beside the davenport and upon the reading-table—each available for momentary or special service, yet each contributory to the brighter illumination required when the living room is in use for general entertaining.

And, of course, there is a fireplace in the ideal living room. In addition to its well-nigh uncanny hold upon human affections, a fireplace has certain other attributes of interest. For instance, it possesses wonderful architectural possibilities; which, if developed, can impart to a room that in all other structural details may be mediocre an air of refinement and individuality. A rightly constructed fireplace is, too, an aid to ventilation—and in a much-used living room good ventilation is of decided importance.

Books, music and the glow of an open fire! Add to these flowers, and we have an assemblage of what might appropriately be termed living room essentials—an assemblage that, properly employed, can be depended upon to convert any living room into a place of contentment and charm.

The nurses and students at a certain London hospital were rehearsing a Greek play—in English. They were to perform it at a concert in aid of their exchequer.

There was a dear old lady at the rehearsal. She seemed a little mystified. Eventually she turned to the girl beside her and said, in a puzzled voice: "Let me see, dear—Euripides—was he before Venizelos?"

The simply-paneled walls and the exquisitely-carved mantel, which, with all the woodwork, are finished in pale parchment yellow, form the background for this charming living room. The one large rug is of plain velvet in a yellowish-green shade, bordered with a slightly darker note. Sheer curtains of ivory net are used next the glass, with inner hangings and artistically-outrigged lambrequins of a printed linen, patterned in Chinese red, blue, yellow and yellowish-green. The treatment of the French casements is interesting for a two-fold reason: it conforms with the treatment of the other windows and it permits the opening and the closing of the casements without the slightest disarrangement of the draperies. The lighting fixtures of dull brass carry shades of parchment: and a parchment shade is used on the table-lamp of dull blue pottery. Blue again appears in the cushions and in the tile of the fireplace, which shades from green to blue.

of the hall might be hung with a fawn oatmeal or grasscloth paper, the living room walls with a wide-striped paper in two tones of fawn, the dining room walls with a fawn-colored foliage or block-patterned paper and the walls of the kitchen painted a cheerful light fawn. Here, the variation in pattern would be sufficiently stimulating to adequately balance the uniformity of coloring: and the neutral-toned walls would be ideal as a background for the richer hues of furniture and fitment.

Unless the family budget warrants frequent changes in decorative treatment, it is, indeed, always wise to eschew pronounced colorings in wall-coverings and to avoid distracting patterns in hangings and furniture-coverings: more especially in a room so constantly used as the average living room of today. There, of all places, a pleasant sense of restfulness should predominate. And, happily, that is not a quality difficult to impart!

Do you know that lovely amethystine-blue that floats like a veil over distant mountains? It is a hue of spacious-the lamps: what could be more appropriate than tall vases of light gray pottery, shaded in soft gray-green over rose? A bit of burnished old copper, a piece of quaint blue china, possibly some cool green Wedgewood, the colorful bindings of books, a dewy rose in a clear glass vase—the room is complete!

In promoting restfulness of effect in a living room, the placement of the furniture is also of importance. Above all, that placement should be logical. Instead of a helter-skelter disposal of furniture, there should always be a grouping of related pieces, with a proper regard for both natural and artificial light. And each arrangement should suggest and invite use. Around the fireplace, for example, there are opportunities galore for hospitable and inviting arrangements of furniture. Many homemakers have a predilection for the placement of a davenport directly in front of the fireplace, with a long reading-table to back the davenport. This, although frequently found in small rooms, is, nevertheless, successful only in long rooms of fair width. For the same type

HAVE pictures a logical place in the living room? A few worth-while pictures, yes: but only when much care has been lavished upon their selection and upon the creation of a suitable background. As a rule, it is better not to attempt the use of any pictures on a patterned wall, as there is apt to ensue a hopeless confusion of line, destroying the good effect of both pictures and wall.

Frames should be chosen, not only in relation to the pictures but also with regard to the room in which they are to be hung. They should not be of too pronounced coloring: nor should they be of very ornate design, lest they distract the eye from the intended interest—the pictures. Bright and dull gold frames should not be hung close together, as each suffers by the juxtaposition—one becoming garish and the other dingy by comparison. When mats are necessary, they should be wider than the frame. If two or more matted pictures are to be grouped on the wall, it is desirable that the mats be of the same tone and harmonious with the background. In order to avoid a restless

On this page are pictured scenes from two plays which marked the early success of the film drama. The upper illustration shows a scene from "Queen Elizabeth" produced by the Famous Players in 1912. The great French actress, Sarah Bernhardt, played the leading part. Below is a picture of the coronation scene from "The Prisoner of Zenda," another Famous Players production of ten years ago. In this, the well-known Canadian actor, James K. Hackett, played the hero's part.

ONE of the many things that have come or will come to this Canada of ours as a result of the great war, is that Canada is finding herself. Canada did not start out after the manner of the late Kaiser, to make a place for herself in the sun; but the result has been nevertheless achieved, and according to such splendid proportions that she is admired throughout the whole world for the stand she took at the beginning of the struggle, and for the attitude she was able to maintain through five years of conflict such as the world had never seen.

In this brief article I want to say something about Canadian Spirit. The discussion must necessarily be fragmentary, for to deal in detail with any one of the various thoughts set forth would call for a volume.

Some of us who were born up here in God's country under the best old flag that ever swung out to the breeze, have known for a long time something about the spirit of Canadians and of Canada. But Canadian spirit as awakened, or aroused, a few years ago, is no longer a static thing; it is a dynamic force that knows no bounds and will stop at no barrier. And lest I appear to boast, let me say that boasting in that sense of the term is far from my desire. In the first place the enlightened, intelligent press of Canada would not stand for such a thing; and in the second place it is not necessary to boast,—just plain, unvarnished facts will fill the bill.

As regards the place Canada filled in the war, she has been backward in the matter of taking praise to herself. But Canada has not lacked praise by any means. From the very outset to the present time the spirit of Canada as exemplified in the men who did her fighting, has been not only the envy of the whole world, but has drawn forth praise even from our enemies.

And this is the more marked because of the fact that we did not go over seas to "knock hell" out of one William Hohenzollern, although we came near doing that little thing once or twice; we did not go over to win the war for the allies, or to "wind up" the watch on the Rhine, or any such thing; but as an integral part of the world's greatest empire, Canada heard the Macedonian call, and took her place out on the frontiers of civilization, where with drawn sword she learned the meaning of that watchword of her gallant ally,—"ils ne passeront pas." And this was in the main we believe the spirit of all the allies. It was a serious business, undertaken in a serious spirit; the result aimed at was serious.

It is nauseating to matter-of-fact Canadians to read the unwarrantable claims set forth in a portion of the press of the adjoining Republic. To be perfectly fair, it is a small portion; and yet, even in the sane editorials of some of the great national magazines there is a whole lot of talk about the spirit of "America," which in itself is all right; but in the next sentence the same thing is restated in such terms as would lead a citizen of Mars who had just landed on this little clod of earth to conclude that America is the United States and the United States America.

No, we don't like this spirit of bragadocio, Uncle Sam; but in spite of it all we think the world of you. You belong to our kith and kin, and perhaps that's the reason we can see each other's faults so clearly, and speak of them so frankly:—a sort of family prerogative.

But Canadian Spirit is our theme, and we just dabbed the brush in once or twice to make a background against which this splendid quality may be the more readily seen.

Now, we cannot write down a complete formula and call it Canadian Spirit. You know how difficult it is to analyze the spirit of an individual. The same is true of a family; and yet we speak of a man having a beautiful spirit; and we also speak of the family spirit. And were we to put on paper a small part of the things which we think go into the makeup of the family spirit, we would need much paper,—and patience.

To-day is Canada's psychological moment. If the nineteenth century was the golden age for the United States, then the twentieth century belongs to Canada. Almost every week our population is augmented by contingents from across the ocean. Read what this same thing meant for the United States during the last fifty years. And Canada has the advantage in that she may profit by many of the mistakes made by Uncle Sam. We already have immigration laws that are far ahead of those of the United States in many respects, and in the course of a few more decades, let us hope that we shall have an abundance of splendid material out of which to mould real Canadianism. These men and women, wisely chosen for our land, are real assets; and properly introduced to the resources of our land, the forests, mines, and the fertile fields, is there any good and sufficient reason why we should not look forward with a great degree of optimism?

BUT now, that thing which we need and must have in great abundance in order to make all these things pan out to our satisfaction, is that which forms the caption of this article, Canadian Spirit.

One might write Canadian Spirit in one word. We could put down Democracy and let it go at that; but of all the words in our language there is probably no word more abused than this. Every writer or speaker has his own meaning injected into the word, and anything that does not measure up to his peculiar standard lacks all the essential qualities.

But democracy from the Canadian standpoint is a stately thing. It is not the "democracy become the aristocracy," but rather conversely. For take it how you will, a young country like ours, bound to the mother land by such strong ties, receives just that amount of old country backbone needed to make our Canadian democracy a dependable thing. And it is the dependable thing we want; no other need apply.

Now, let me tell you some of the things that I feel must enter into Canadian Spirit. Other things will of course suggest themselves to the reader, but these will serve to stir up your minds by way of remembrance. I say remembrance, for I am not bringing to you through the medium of this publication new things. This is not Athens but Canada, and we have something else to do other than "hear some new thing." These things that I remind you of you know as well as I, and you have been reminded of them before. But unless we are reminded often we are apt to lose interest and forget. But forgetting means failure for us to-day, my good friend!

Just as we are at the most important turn of the road, so we face the most critical stage of our national existence. And that is why I feel like reiterating "Forgetting means failure." We are coming out of the adolescent period, and the bones and sinews of our national life are becoming mature. And just because there is a tendency to feel "grewed up," so there is a danger that we, like Topsy, snap our fingers at antecedents and say we "just grewed." And this is the one thing we must steer clear of. To just grow up like Russia for instance, would be a calamity indeed. There must be guiding principles, however simple; and these principles must, to change the figure, become the very warp and woof of our national life.

First, then, let me bring to your attention this basic axiom: In order that the real Canadian Spirit may be developed, we must have a sincere appreciation of Canada as the peculiar property of Canadians. By this I do not mean mere flag-flapping. We all know how easy it seems for some to carry their patriotism where the Irishman is said to carry the chip,—on his shoulder. And there are scores of people who would spend hours in applauding patriotic speeches or talking loyally; but when it comes to real appreciation of Canada for her own peculiar worth, they are not there with the goods.

In a recent book catalogue there appeared the following sentence in connection with an author's name, "He is a Canadian to the core." As I sat musing, the beauty of this expression seemed to grow. I thought of the apple that looks red and rosy on the outside, but when it is cut the core is bad. And over against this, the apple that is not so fine in appearance, but it holds its worth all the way through. Now, my ideal Canadian is one who is sound all the way through,—one who has a finely developed sense of proprietorship, and who can say with emphasis,

"This is my own, my native land!" Possibly some one may object to this and say it is narrow, and we are living in an age of broad things. A young woman who had never been out of her own native province, went a few weeks ago to the United States. After a little she wrote to some of her friends, "No more of old slow Canada for me." That woman has yet to learn one of the cardinal principles of travel,—the further you go afield, the more you appreciate your own home town.

No, sir, this will not do! What we want and must have is the spirit that feels proud to say "My own, my native land." We are right willing to admit that Canada is slower than Fifth Avenue; but so far are we from regretting that fact that we feel rather proud of it. For while the throngs that crown the busy marts of the great American cities are "tripping the light fantastic," over here in God's country we are anxious to make good. And in order to make good the spirit of Kipling's great poem has become a fact of our lives,— "Soberly under the white man's laws,

My white men go their ways."

Yes, we want to make good, and we are making good; and one thing that is going to help us in attaining the ideal, is a high appreciation of "Our own Canadian Home." And without this appreciation we cannot make good.

Apropos of this I heard an interesting conversation recently between a whitewashed Yankee who had gone from Canada a few years ago, and one of the "Make-good-in-Canada" type. Said the first, "O, this place makes me tired. I cannot see that any improvements have come about in the last ten years or more. I think it is the last place that God ever made."

"You're right" replied the other, "and if that is so, it must be that God, like man, profits by former mistakes."

And right here let me say, we would not have the reader interpret our meaning as otherwise than a sane, sensible appreciation. We don't want swagger! We don't want untrue, or exaggerated statements! That sort of thing is unpleasant to people of good common sense. And that is why some of the paragraphs in certain American magazines fail to win our approval,—it is contrary to the spirit of the day.

An editorial in one of these publications some little time ago had the following: "The Central powers were victorious for four years less ten days; Then Foch with the United States troops in the vanguard, won his way to victory in one hundred and fifteen days."

NOW, with all due regard to our good cousins across the border, and with all deference to Marshal Foch, the real truth of the matter is that the power of Germany was broken before Foch took command, and months before a Doughboy set foot on European soil. A statement like the one quoted is swagger pure and simple. It makes one feel like the late Elbert Hubbard must have felt when he would say "pass the formaldehyde?" No, we want warm hearts and all that sort of thing, but may the dear Lord help us to keep cool heads in these years of reconstruction.

Another factor which must hold a big place in this Canadian Spirit, is what we are going to call the "Pull-together idea." Not very euphonious? Well, never mind that part of it, it is practicable; and if there is one thing that is needed and badly needed in this old Dominion of ours today, it is the working out of the "Esprit de Corps." And this implies a great degree of brotherliness, a subordinating of the personal interests to the interests of the whole body. This article is being written in the midst of a general election, and while the writer does not care a Continental for any or all the parties, there is one thing that it seems to me is more apparent than ever before, and that is that there are hundreds and hundreds of people who would be highly indignant were one to challenge their loyalty, yet these selfsame individuals put the interests of their party, and in many cases their own personal interests before the interests of the nation. And this is so in many other walks of life as well as in politics. Surely even the most conservative reader will agree with me that this is not the "Esprit de corps." This is not the spirit of the whole body, or to be more specific, a regard for the welfare of the nation.

Do you know why some of the great nations of the past reached the point of greatness? There were many contributing causes, but one thing that loomed large was the willingness to sacrifice personal aims and desires for the good of the country. And conversely, lack of this same quality has wrought the downfall of many a kingdom. In spite of the fact that the great German war machine was the most wonderful the world had ever seen, came a time when the people did not trust their leaders, and even the leaders did not trust each other. One of their military men recently indicated that this was the prime cause of his nation's defeat.

And our Canadianism is not a matter of place, and therefore is not confined to the limits of our own Dominion. A man who is once a Canadian is always a Canadian, no matter where he may live his life. He may find it necessary for a time to sojourn under some other flag but he retains his loyalty to his own country. And when the time comes for this ideal Canadian to return his feet fairly burn with impatience. Or to quote again,

"His heart within him burned,
As home his footsteps he has turned,
From wandering on a foreign strand."

But the spirit that we speak of now is the spirit that should be developed right here in our own country and should

THE ROARING LIONS

IN the Northland is the bush, the forest of spruce and pine, of fir and cedar, of balsam and hemlock with the poplar and the white limbed birch. There is snow in the Northland, for winter-time is long, and one year came when there were four lions, frosty, snowy, saucy lions, in the great woods. Let me tell you about them.

One night, at the very end of February, a little, white owl sat on the tip of a baby cedar-tree. He was lonesome, with nothing to see but the trees, and the deep shadows, and the twinkling stars. There was nothing to hear, either, nothing but the snapping of frosty twigs, or the booming of cracking ice. So he was lonesome; but he kept on looking and listening.

There was a "fluff, fluff" of soft wings below the little owl, and a reedy, piping voice called:

"Come down off your perch."

The little white owl chuckled, for he knew that voice, then replied:

"Saucy as ever, aren't you, Feather-toes. But never mind; I'll come down."

The little owl dropped to the ground like an overgrown snowflake, alighting just in front of a plump, white bird. This was Feather-toes, the Ptarmigan. He was not quite so fluffy as the owl, but he was better dressed, for he had feathers even on his toes.

"Anything doing around here, Snowball?" asked Feather-toes.

The little white owl shook his head slowly.

"Nothing at all," he replied. "I was just hoping you had brought some excitement with you."

Then the two white birds both wagged their heads, and looked very solemn.

"Though skies are clear,
You never know
Whether or not 'tis going to snow,
In feather, flake or flurry;
But if you cease
To use your eyes,
On you will come as a surprise,
A snow storm, in a hurry."

The two white birds heard this sung by someone quite near them, and before the song was ended, the little cedar tree was shaken violently and all the snow on its branches pelted down on Snowball and Feather-toes.

"Why, it's Inna Hurry, the hare," laughed Feather-toes, as he shook the snow from off his back.

A large white hare came around the cedar tree in two long jumps, wagging his long ears excitedly.

"I'm just in time to tell you that the three of us are going to be lions to-morrow."

"I'd rather be myself, thank you," said Snowball, the owl.

"Not me," remarked Feather-toes, "this weather is too cold for lions."

Inna Hurry, the hare, laughed; "Oh, I just meant make-believe lions. The month of March is coming in like a lion, so I thought we might as well be lions for four or five weeks too."

"What's that noise you're making, Snowball?" asked Feather-toes.

The owl had his round head stretched out as far as he could get it, and from his wide-open bill came most alarming sounds. The little owl brought his head down with a jerk, and said sharply:

"Roaring like a lion, of course. You fellows had better practice some yourselves."

So the three of them practiced roaring for a while. The best Feather-toes could do was a stuttering squeak, while the hare whistled through his nose, then through his teeth, then through both together, until it sounded just like a popcorn roaster.

While they were "roaring," March came on a rough, blustering North wind, and did some roaring himself. He brushed the snow off all the trees, and shook his own snow-clouds until the drifts were everywhere. Inna Hurry, Snowball, and Feather-toes, had taken refuge beneath the little cedar-tree, which was almost roofed over by a white drift.

All that first day the three make-believe lions never saw the sunlight, and never roared a single bit. The second day, they ventured out, though not far from their cedar-tree shelter. The snow was whirling so that it was hard to tell one cedar-tree from another.

But, as the month went by, bright days came, quiet days of clear skies and warm sunlight. There was a firm glistening crust on the snow now, and the hare and the two birds went each his own way for hours at a time. Once every day they met together and "roared," just to prove that they were lions; and each time March came on the North wind, and roared angrily himself.

But on the last day of the month, when the three of them "roared," there

The hare sat still for a while grumbling to himself, then said at last:

"I didn't care much about being a lion. I can whistle better than I can roar. I guess I'll keep on being Inna Hurry, the hare. Lambs are too slow for me. Me be one of them? Bah!"

But March came in like a lamb, for you could hear the South wind say so through the pine-trees.

THE TALE OF WISE SAINT PATRICK AND THE SPOTTY FROGS.

WHEN good Saint Patrick was but a lad in Ireland, he tended sheep near the mountain of Slieve Mis. It was lonely, but he grew to like the place, so, in after years, when he became a saint and the greatest man in the country, he often came back there.

Up to this time, there were no holidays in Ireland, so Saint Patrick, who

The frogs had their own king, too, who was the richest, as well as the biggest frog in all Ireland. His palace was under the water of a little, round lake, where he lived with his forty sons and their families. There was mud at the bottom of the little lake, but underneath the mud there was sand that was almost all gold.

The frog-king loved the shining yellow gold, and he and all the other frogs who lived in the lake gathered the golden sands, day after day.

The gold-digging frogs and their king had been told about the great holiday Saint Patrick had proclaimed, but they were so busy getting rich they forgot about it entirely.

All the folks in Ireland were out in the morning in their fine suits and their gay dresses. The foxes, and the deer, and the birds were all out, too, and so was Saint Patrick. There he was, walking through the country, wearing a sprig of shamrock, and wishing everyone "the top of the mornin'."

Never had the good saint been so pleased, until he noticed that the king of the frogs, and his forty sons and their families, were not out observing the holiday. Straightaway, Saint Patrick went to the little lake where the frog king lived, for, said he to himself: "I'll just give them a piece of my mind, that I will."

Now the frog king heard the footsteps of Saint Patrick, and remembered that this was the day they should be out and making merry with the rest of the folk. There was no time for anything at all, for Saint Patrick was now quite close to the lake. So it was, that they left their gold-digging at the muddy bottom of the lake, and when Saint Patrick came near the shore, he saw the frog king, with his forty sons and their families, just as they hopped out of the water to the land.

Their beautiful, green suits were all spotted and streaked with the brown and black mud from the bottom of the lake where they had been working, and the King's suit was the spottiest of all.

The frogs looked at Saint Patrick's angry face, then they looked at each other, and, turning, every one of them jumped just six feet out into the water again. All around the shore of the lake there was not a frog to be seen, but Saint Patrick would have his say, and he called:

"Show your noses, and listen to what I have to tell you."

Then all around the water of the lake, just six feet from the shore, appeared a ring of frog-noses, and the frog king's nose poked up in the centre.

Saint Patrick shook a finger at them all, and said:

"Everyone of you spotty frogs is a disgrace to the green coat he wears. I've half a mind to banish you to foreign lands to keep company with the snakes that I drove out of Ireland. It's only your green coats that save you from that, but, because you all forgot that this was Saint Patrick's Day, and kept on working, and dirtying-up your clothes, I lay this penance on you."

This little lake shall be your home as long as there's an Ireland. You shall dig and dig for gold in the mud and sand, yet never grow richer. All the folks will talk about you. I'm not going to let them forget about you, either, for, though you may hide your potty backs, some of the gold you dig will float upon the water in the summertime. It will make a ring of bright, bright yellow just where your noses show this very minute."

The first Saint Patrick's Day was all of fifteen hundred years ago, but there is still in Ireland, a little lake where live green frogs with spotty backs, and where, each summertime, some six feet from the shore, appears a golden ring of yellow water-lilies, risen from the sands beneath the waters of the lake of the spotty frogs.

"I'm just in time to tell you that the three of us are going to be lions to-morrow" was no North wind, and no roaring March. Instead, the South wind blew gently, bringing with it warm-looking, woolly clouds, and through the pine branches came a soft "a-a-ah, a-a-ah."

Inna Hurry, the hare, wrinkled up his nose, wagged his left ear, and said: "No more roaring. We're not lions any more; we're lambs."

"Bah!" said the owl.

"Bah!" said Feather-toes.

"Exactly," said the hare, "we're lambs. March is going out like a lamb, so we'll be lambs too."

"I like roaring," said Snowball, the owl, "I won't be a lamb. I'm going off by myself where I can be a lion just when I like. Be a lamb? Bah!"

"Me, too," said Feather-toes; "catch me turning into a lamb after being a roaring lion. Bah!"

The two feathered ones without another word, each went his separate way.

liked good times as well as anyone, made up his mind, and said:

"Through all the land, the Seventeenth of March shall be a holiday. It is by way of being my birthday, too, which makes it all the better. Everybody will stop working, and put on his best clothes. It is the order of Saint Patrick, and it is myself will see that everyone obeys."

Long before that holiday, Saint Patrick's Day, as it was called from the first, there was much washing, and dusting, and brushing of clothes, for everyone wished to look his best.

No, not quite everyone. You must understand that, long before this, Saint Patrick had driven all the snakes from Ireland. A land without snakes was a land of safety for the frogs, who soon were as plentiful as grasshoppers in a hay-field.

The Transplanting of Ann Young

BY LUCRETIA D. CLAPP

"I AM the Resurrection and the Life." The minister's voice in solemnly rising inflections came through the open window. It was an afternoon in early summer. Long pulsating lines of heat beat down from a cloudless sky on the dusty road and the dry fields. The flowers in the small square front yard and the lilac bush by the gate showed gray with dust. The whirr of locusts and the drowsy drone of bees filled the sleepy silence.

"I am the Resurrection and the Life." Amelia Young sitting in the front room in her place among the mourners looked about her at the assembled company. She sat very straight and stiff in her plain-fitting black dress. The minister's voice in its irritating monotone came to her as from afar. With a strange sense of detachment she tried to bring herself to realize that the still form lying before her in all the insignia of death was her father, and that this was her father's funeral sermon; his just due and tribute after years of homely toil.

The room smelt damp and musty. The two north windows had been thrown open to admit the light and each object in the room took on a startling familiarity. There was a marble-topped table between the windows. It had a bead mat on it and a lamp. There was a china card-basket and two books bound in red and blue. Amelia found herself trying to read their titles, although she knew them by heart. On a shelf with a lambrequin were tall red and white vases. They held bunches of dried grasses. There were some small shells on the shelf and a string of gilded cones. Over on the floor in the corner was a huge conch shell. Amelia remembered the few rare occasions of her childhood when the best room had been opened and she had been allowed to hold the shell to her ear. Even now she could hear the sound of the sea. There were some pictures on the walls; portraits of her mother's people, and one, a picture of her father as a young man.

Amelia's eyes rested on each of her relatives in turn. Aunt Maria and Uncle John and their two children sat together on the hair-cloth sofa. They had driven over that morning. Aunt Maria was crying softly. Uncle John shifted his feet now and then uncomfortably, and with a curious sound that made itself fearfully felt in the somber silence. He kept his eye fixed on the cornfield to the west of the house. Men might come and men might go, but the question of crops remained ever uppermost.

Cousin Delia sat on the opposite side of the room, from Amelia. Every now and then she drew out her handkerchief and gave a furtive dab at her eyes, but for the most part she busied herself with looking about her. A gleam of sunshine, quivering across the carpet, rested on the lower part of the marble-topped table; it caught and held a few particles of dust in its radiance. Cousin Delia watched it until she knew Amelia had seen her steady gaze and knew on just what it rested.

Amelia did not cry. She sat very erect in her straight chair. Her face was pale and her lips were drawn tightly together. She was a tall, spare woman. She had light blue eyes and her hair, of a light indeterminate brown, was drawn tightly back from a broad, high forehead. She had her father's plain features.

Old Mrs. Young in her black dress and her black cotton gloves sat next to her daughter. She was a little woman with thinly parted gray hair. She cried continually until her face was red and swollen. She made no movement. Once she cried out aloud. Amelia looked sternly up at her. After that she cried quietly into her handkerchief.

The afternoon was very warm. The grass in the front yard seemed to shrivel and shrink in the fierce glare of the sun. There was a round shell-bordered bed of clove pinks and their spicy fragrance floated in through the windows. The yard sloped a little down to the gate. Just outside there was a long row of buggies.

Amelia kept her eyes fixed on the glancing mote of sunlight. Only once did her glance rest on the long black coffin in the middle of the room. Then she seemed to see instead her father's gaunt, thin figure as he lay in bed that last day. His face showed a yellow pallor against the pillows. Amelia sat beside the bed crocheting some coarse lace. The habit of work was too strong upon her to be laid aside even in the strangely set, rose and poured out some medicine. Mrs. Young's sobs broke out afresh. The paroxysm of coughing past, Ephraim tried to speak again.

"You an' Andrew," he began, "hed better," the words seemed torn from his throat, "you an' Andrew—I allays knowed 'twould be all right." His voice trailed into silence as he sank back on his pillows. The room was hot and still. Suddenly a shudder passed over the old man. It was only an instant, then all that was mortal of Ephraim Young lay rigid beneath the bedclothes.

Ephraim Young died serene in the knowledge that through his daughter Amelia his failure and shortcomings would be set right. The place had belonged to his wife and to her father before her. Her children had been born and had died there. Amelia was the only one left of a large family. Ephraim Young was a good man, but he lacked initiative. The first few years he had managed the place successfully. Then came a year of failure. The one that followed was not much better.

one summer night long ago. There were pale stars in a still paler sky and the scent of the pinks in the front yard was very sweet.

Today, as Amelia sat listening to the monotonous drone of the minister's voice, while the sunlight of the June day crept across the faded carpet in rays of burnished gold, while the fields and meadows of her childhood's home rolled away from her on either side bound by a low line of softly shadowed hills, something of the simplicity and the pathos of that faith in which her father had died content, touched her heart, yet had no power to pierce the shell of her New England pride.

With that forgetfulness of all save good which is death's legacy to the living, poor old Mrs. Young, her little, bent body shaken with grief, looked up every now and then into her daughter's face. She clung tightly to Amelia's arm as they passed out of the house. In the front yard was a group of men in their Sunday black clothes, friends and neighbors Amelia had known from her childhood. Andrew Vane was among them. Cousin Delia, walking just behind, looked sharply at Amelia. The latter, though she did not turn her head, knew that Andrew Vane was looking at her. She noted his stooped shoulders and the dust of his unbrushed Sunday coat.

On their return home from the cemetery Amelia went straight upstairs and took off her black dress. Then she set about getting supper. Her mother sat in the front room with Uncle John and Aunt Maria and Cousin Delia. There was a long, painfully empty space in the middle of the floor. Cousin Delia's voice suddenly clipped the silence. "Wan't that Andrew Vane I see out in the yard this afternoon? Seems to me he looked kind o' peaked." She leaned forward. She had a small, thin face and little piercing black eyes. "I allays had an idea there was somethin' 'tween him an' Melia." She looked sharply at Ann. Just then the door opened and Amelia came into the room.

After the early supper Cousin Delia and Aunt Maria and Uncle John started on their long homeward drive. Amelia and her mother stood at the gate and watched them until they drove out of sight. Then they went back into the house and sat down together in the empty sitting room.

The day was slowly hushing into silence. The sun sank in a yellow glory behind the purple hills. Across the fields the shadows wheeled and lengthened. A belated butterfly, resting in its flight, poised an instant on the window sill, its delicate wings outspread. Over on his own porch Andrew Vane sat alone in the dusk of the summer night. The rings of smoke from his pipe floated slowly upward.

For a long time Amelia and her mother sat together in silence and strange reserve, until the darkness gathered and the stars came out one by one. Then they went upstairs to bed.

The next morning Amelia rose at the usual time. The very relentlessness, the utter inevitableness of death shows itself in the fact that we pause in our busy lives only for an instant at its threshold before we take up once more the shuttle and the threads and begin again where we left off. Amelia slept with her mother. The old woman watched her furtively from the bed, as she dressed in the early morning light. The younger woman's face wore a look of

CHANGE

By Constance I. Davies

Oh, that we might hold what most we love,
That time would only pity us, and spare
Our treasures grown so dear—that God above
Would heed our grief, nor strip our lives so bare!

The rose in all its perfect beauty falls,
Its scatter'd fragrance on the breeze is blown;
The bird that now across the meadow calls,
Ere summer goes, will all too soon have flown.

And not alone the flower and the bird,
But friends we love, in such a little while,
Must pass forever with a fond last word,
And leave but memories of a voice, a smile.

presence of death. Mrs. Young sat at the foot of the bed. Her little thin body shook in an agony of sobs which she tried in vain to repress. Some medicine bottles and a glass covered over with an envelope and a spoon stood on the dresser. Out of doors the rays of sunlight lay long and level across the summer fields. Now and then a bird shadow darkened the window. The smell of the pinks was sweet and spicy.

Ephraim's eyes moved restlessly back and forth from his daughter's calm face to his wife's quivering one. His long fingers plucked at the coverlet nervously. When he spoke the words came with an effort.

"The old place'll hev to go," he began, "ness—". He paused a moment. "I've kinder ben lettin' the payments slide a little, lately. Didn't seem like there was much use. I seen Andrew one day an' he said 'twas all right. He said as how it wouldn't make much difference anyway. I knowed right along 'twould be all right some day 'tween him and 'Melia.'" A spasm of coughing seized the old man. Amelia, her lips

Where another man would have forced a rich yield, Ephraim succeeded in getting but a mere living; where another man would have ventured ahead, Ephraim held back.

The place was badly run down. Then Old Hiram Vane, Andrew's father, whose broad yielding acres touched those of the Youngs on the left, offered to take the farm. The years went on, Ephraim meeting the payments as best he could. Hiram died and the place fell into Andrew's hands. For years Andrew Vane had been in love with Amelia Young. He was a good-looking young man; mildmannered, with blue eyes and features almost as delicate as a girl's. People wondered what he could see in Amelia Young with her plain features and her still plainer figure. He was considerably younger than she.

Ephraim had carefully concealed from his wife and daughter all knowledge of the affairs of the farm. To the younger woman, the truth when it did come had all the force of a double blow. Calm in her pride but with white lips, Amelia had given Andrew Vane his dismissal

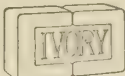

Whenever soap comes in contact with the skin—use Ivory.

HOW can you decide whether the soap you are using is the best to be had? Though its virtues be suggested in the pictures of pretty faces and extolled in claims almost impossible of fulfillment, the practical man — or woman — determines the real worth of a soap by asking these simple questions:

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1—Does it lather abundantly? | 5—Has it the whiteness that indicates highgrade ingredients? |
| 2—Does it rinse easily? | 6—Has it the unobtrusive fragrance that refined people prefer? |
| 3—Does it feel mild? | 7—Does it float? |
| 4—Has it the purity to insure perfect safety? | |

If you must answer "No" to any of these questions, you are not enjoying the greatest possible satisfaction that soap can give.

If your answer is an unqualified "Yes", you undoubtedly are a user of Ivory Soap. All seven of the fundamental qualities that soap should have are developed to so high a degree in Ivory that its superiorities are an open book to its millions of users. They know that Ivory is as nearly perfect as soap can be, and they are given fresh proof of it every time they use it for toilet, bath, shampoo, nursery and fine laundry.

A Variety of Comment

THE painting which has been photographed and is reproduced on this page, "When Daffodils Begin to Peer," is one of the most attractive spring scenes in our National Gallery at Ottawa. The gladness of the early days of spring sunshine seems reflected in the faces of the young girls who are a part of the season of promise.

As early as February, the daffodils begin to appear in shop windows, artistically arranged in a bowl, forming a centre-piece at an afternoon tea or brightening the interior of the limousines that pass in the day.

We have an especially friendly feeling for these sunshine-tinted flowers which come to us, just as the Earth is rubbing her eyes after her winter sleep. We are grateful for their gladness, envious of the gold that blossoms in their petals. They make the dulllest room look bright, set the darkest corner aglow with floral fires. Who would condemn such heartsome decorations? They are a part of all that makes life gayer and tenderer than it would be without the poetry of Earth. We need the flowers to-day more than ever, to remind us of Nature's resurrection and circle of eternal change which yet brings back what seemed to have vanished.

The most charming feature about floral cheeriness is its unconscious gladness. We become bored by the human being who is always "glad" and telling us about it. She very often jars upon our sadder thoughts and inevitable regrets. Perhaps, it is because she suggests a galvanic gladness, a forced gaiety, which is more trying than tragedy.

Not of this order is the golden mood of the daffodils. It is the unconscious gladness of the child, the good cheer of a spring-time that has forgotten what it meant to be sad. The daffodils just open their sunny hearts and let us know that there is always light somewhere that the flowers of yester year are not dead, but blooming again in a world that welcomes them more gladly than ever. They are more than a comfort—they are a joy, as they come to us with sunlight after sorrow, glory after gloom. "And then my heart with pleasure fills,

And dances with the daffodils."

The daffodils have been a fit and favorite subject for many an artist and many a poet. Bliss Carman, whose new book of poems is a comfort and inspiration to any lover of beauty, has written these lovely lines on the flower which makes the day golden.

"What matter if the sun be lost?

What matter, though the sky be grey?
There's joy enough about the house,
For Daffodil comes home to-day."

"Oh, who would care what fate may bring,
Or what the years may take away!
There's life enough within the hour,
For Daffodil comes home to-day."

WOMEN have been blamed for not being more patriotic in their buying. Recently in Montreal three representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association submitted to a cross-fire of questioning from members of the Local Council of Women on the question of prices and quality of Canadian-made goods as compared with those of imported goods.

The visitors attended by special invitation of the women who while desirous of patriotically supporting made-in-Canada goods felt that in certain lines Canadian products did not come up to the standard of other goods on the market, and thought that a talk with the manufacturers would clear the air and assist both sides.

Mr. D.— declared that women in the past had not been as patriotic as they might have been and had persistently demanded American footwear, though Canadian was as good. Many women who thought they were wearing American shoes were wearing Canadian for Canada only imported five per cent of her shoes.

The public had to be educated to the fact that Canadian values were as good as any others.

Women were largely to blame for keeping up prices by their demand for freak shoes in which styles changed overnight. No price the retailer could ask under these circumstances ensured him a safe return for the continual changes of style left him with stocks on his hands which he had to get rid of at nominal prices.

Replying to a question as to whether all associations of manufacturers were not primarily concerned in keeping up prices, Mr. D.— said that the shoe manufacturers to his knowledge did not make enough profit during the war to carry them over the present slump. They did not charge enough and consequently the trade today was in a bad state. This statement was received with open dissent by the women and Mr. D.— declared that the subject was open to careful examination by anybody. The war price of shoes was based on cost and the trouble was that the manufacturers did not get enough and in consequence the shoe industry was not at the present time a proposition it was profitable for any banker to handle.

One member of the audience attacked the retailers. "I have bought shoes for many years through the wholesale and I know enough of the trade to know there was never any justification for a retailer to charge more during the past seven years than he charged in 1913. Women are to blame for paying the price asked," she said.

Another member asked why, when farmers in the West practically had to give hides away, the price of shoes kept high. The speaker explained that hides obtained straight from the farmer were often worthless owing to the way in which they had been removed and other causes. The best hides came from the butchers in cities, and these brought a fair price. The poor hides made inferior leather which no woman present would wear.

The speaker referred to the world-wide reputation which British goods had built up. That reputation was built on honest goods and there was no reason why Canadian goods if handled in the same way should not achieve the same result.

A second visitor presented a brief for Canadian cottons, urging that not only did the purchaser of these goods get sound value but better value than if she bought imported goods, because on the latter there was a much larger percentage of profit. Canada, on account of its relatively small population, could not attempt to make the variety of lines produced in the United States or in Great Britain and therefore confined herself to staples. The demand for the very fine lines, termed "novelties," in the trade, was so small that it did not pay to make them. It was better in the interests of Canada to stick to staples and make these lines in large quantities than to make small quantities of many lines.

That the feeling in favor of Canadian-made goods was growing was evidenced by the fact that production had increased four hundred per cent. during the last seven years. The demand was still greater than the capacity to meet it though new machinery was being rapidly prepared. Imports were not nearly so serious as was generally supposed. Canadian mills having turned out in 1921 goods to the value of $63,000,000 while only $8,000,000 worth was imported during the same period. This was made up largely of novelty lines not made in Canada.

Time was when it was the custom to ask for English and American goods and this demand was maintained as far as woollens were concerned. The idea persisted that English tweed or cloth was better than Canadian at the same price. This idea was to some extent kept alive by the tailoring trade which reaped a larger profit on English lines. Canadian lines became known and marked and were subject to constant cutting by rival manufacturers. During the war, the speaker claimed, Canadian mills had worked on a smaller margin of profit and had given better value than any other country in the world. The industry was now in a prosperous state and only one mill in the country was not working full time. The workers were getting a fair wage, and there was no unemployment.

Dr. Grace Ritchie, England, asked if it were not true that stockings made in Canada were often inferior to English makes. A third manufacturer, in replying said Canadian stockings were equal to English at the same price. There had been a prejudice in the past against marking things Canadian in origin. The demand was for English and American goods and in order to ensure sale Canadian goods had often been sold as English and American and had at once found a ready market.

Dr. Ritchie, England, asked what guarantee under these circumstances the purchaser had when buying Canadian goods that they were really made in Canada. It was explained that in the days when Canadian cotton goods were sold as English they bore no stamp,

Girls No Longer Wanted

BY F. C. BECKETT

THE decree has gone forth from one of Canada's largest banks that women are no longer wanted as employees and that those now employed, with the exception of stenographers, be gradually dismissed commencing at the end of the year. A survey is being made by the management in order that no employees may suffer an injustice from the order which has issued from the office of the General Manager to branches throughout the Dominion.

The management of the bank in question takes the stand that the bank's system of promotion has been entirely upset by its women employees. Most of the men who enter the service of the bank, the management declares, make the work their life work whereas women do not. In the words of the manager "they keep their ears open for the marriage bells."

took up the work during the war in order to relieve men for war service took a long time to settle down and when a girl resigned to get married or for any other reason, her place was filled by a man.

Another bank manager who was interviewed stated that girls do not consider the work as being permanent. Most of them expect or hope to marry which means that new employees have to be "broken in" with the result that a lot of time is wasted and many mistakes are made in the process. Moreover it was impossible to transfer a girl to a small branch in an out-of-the-way community and as banks are constantly opening new branches it became necessary to have well trained men in readiness to move at short notice.

According to another bank manager a great many girls who took men's plac-

WILL SHE DISAPPEAR ?

While a great many girls will be up in arms at the decision which will in all probability be followed by most, if not all, of the other banks in Canada, there is a good deal to be said for the arguments put forward by various bank managers who were interviewed after the order was given out. One manager states positively that men are better fitted for banking work than women and particularly so in respect to the positions of teller and accountant. He also stated that he found that women did not take so much interest in their work as men and that although the rules of the bank were strict a good many girls wasted time in "tittivating" their hair every few minutes, in disappearing every now and then to powder their faces and in engaging in frivolous conversations with other girls. There was no denying that the majority of the bank's female employees were efficient and trustworthy but many of them who es during the war still "hang on" to their positions although they do not need to work for a living and thus they deprive men of positions, contributing thereby to the number of unemployed. He instanced a case of a girl drawing a salary of over one hundred dollars a month, whose parents are in comfortable circumstances and recently bought a new bungalow. The girl is herself a property owner and has no need whatever of the money and yet she "hangs on." The management did not like to dismiss her so she continued to draw the salary which a returned soldier—many of whom in Canada are on the verge of starvation—should have. And this was by no means an isolated case in that particular bank.

Still another manager admitted that every girl who left his bank's employ was replaced by a man. "Men take

Why the Human Body Grows Old Sooner than Necessary

"There's a Reason"

POOR old Ponce de Leon followed a delusion and found a disappointment.

Metchnikoff was a great scientist. He followed facts and found why the human body grows old sooner than necessary.

He found that food that passes too slowly through the intestines (as many starchy, heavy and "refined" foods do) creates conditions which amount to an ageing of the body.

"Auto-intoxication" is one of the terms used to describe what happens. Hardening of the arteries is one of the results.

Sense Instead of Magic

There is no fountain of eternal youth, of course. But there is an extension of youth, through proper feeding and care of the body.

One of the distinctive qualities of Grape-Nuts as a food is that it helps to avoid the conditions pointed out by Metchnikoff, and by many others since his time, as being the real beginning of old age.

Grape-Nuts has wide popularity because of its delightful taste, its economy and its unusual nourishment—but it has a larger merit than that.

Finding the Life Elements

The processes that make Grape-Nuts—including continuous baking for 20 hours—act upon the nutritive solids, producing a food which is partially pre-digested, and develop in Grape-Nuts its own natural sweetness from the grains.

Whole wheat and malted barley flour—from the grains which are richest of all in the food elements needed by the body—is used in making Grape-Nuts. All the nutriment of the grains is retained, including essential phosphates and other mineral salts, intended by Nature for the building of human bone and brain tissue and for feeding the red corpuscles of the blood.

A Sad Waste Stopped

Often, in making the so-called "refined" or whitened cereal products, these most vital of Nature's gifts are thrown away. Grape-Nuts contains the necessary "roughness" to stimulate quick and complete functioning in the digestive tract.

Grape-Nuts delights the taste with the richness and sweetness of its flavor. Served with cream or milk, it supplies the body with what scientists have found to be an unusually accurate balance of food elements needed for body-building.

Grape-Nuts puts no burden upon the digestion—and it passes naturally through the digestive tract without causing fermentation or creating any of those disturbing conditions which are so common, and which have been identified as a first and principal cause of the ageing of the body.

FEDERATED WOMEN'S INSTITUTE NEWS

By Elizabeth Bailey Price

FROM NOVA SCOTIA.

THE Women's Institute, which organization had its birth in Canada, is spreading to many lands, and is becoming world famed for its record of achievement. In Nova Scotia the growth of the movement has been rapid, and the story of the work accomplished

A WESTERN SECRETARY

Mrs. V. S. MacLachlan, Secretary of the British Columbia Women's Institutes, National Convener of the Standing Committee on Public Health and Child Welfare.

is most inspiring. November marks the end of the Institute year and this year closes with seventy-three branch Institutes in existence in the province, and with prospects of a substantial increase in the early days of the new year. Along with the increase in numbers has come an even greater increase in interest, and the circle of influence is ever broadening. Under the motto "For Home and Country," the Institutes are doing a work of which they may be justly proud.

The work of the Institutes is under the supervision of Miss Helen Macdougall, Superintendent, whose headquarters are at the Agricultural College, Truro. Associated with her in the direction of Institute affairs are the Conveners of the Standing Committees:

Home Economics, Mrs. W. W. Baird, Nappan Station, Public Health, Mrs. Hugh Dickson, M.D., Central Onslow. Home and School, Miss Dora Baker, Ass't. Rural Sc., Director, Normal College, Truro. Agriculture, Mrs. L. A. DeWolfe, Truro. Legislation, Mrs. D. C. Hilton, Carleton, Yar. Co.

These conveners were appointed at the Convention in June and have since been busy preparing plans for the future. At a recent Conference, an outline of the proposed work was given, this work to be carried on with the co-operation of corresponding committees in the local branches.

The Home Economics Committee intend to send out information and instruction on Better Home Making, Labor Saving, Nutrition, with special attention to the feeding of children.

The work of the Public Health Committee will be to supplement the work of the Public Health Nurse and to collect and distribute information on Home Hygiene and Home Remedies.

The encouraging of Home Gardening, the exchange of seeds, the study of forestry, and the establishment of Women's Institute booths at the County Exhibitions is part of the program of the Agricultural Committee.

Any Institute will be able to secure information in regard to the laws by applying to the Legislation Committee, who will interest themselves particularly in such laws as those relating to Mother's Pensions, Schools, etc.

A programme of suggestions has been prepared by the Home and School Committee, which, if carried out by the Institutes would tend to more closely ally the home with the school, and make the work of the school more effective.

At the last Convention, a resolution was passed urging that greater attention be paid to the teaching of patriotism in the schools. The Institutes are vitally interested in this and The Home and School Committee have prepared an outline of ways in which true ideas of patriotism may be instilled into the minds of the children. This programme is to be submitted to the Institutes for their approval.

With an advisory committee made up of women specially adapted for the work assigned them, and with a Superintendent, whose efficiency has been so well proven, the new Institute year will open with prospects for almost unlimited development.

Alberta Conferences.

Alberta Women's Institutes have just completed their itinerary of constituency conferences, some forty-five in all. These gatherings are of immense value to the strengthening of institute work. Not only do they stimulate it by the interest inspired by the speakers, but they are direct organized mediums through which various phases of institute work can be carried on—especially through the standing committees.

They form the direct link through which the branch can work through the constituency, the constituency in turn through the provincial and the provincial through the national.

Institute work is carried on through its standing committees, such as child welfare, public health, immigration, agriculture, national events, laws, home economics, education, publicity.

This year at each conference conveners were appointed to take charge of W. I. work along these various lines. These conveners will report to the provincial conveners, who will have as their committees all the constituency nominees in that particular phase of work.

For instance in publicity the constituency convener passes along to the provincial convener the news of all the institutes in her constituency. The provincial convener in turn culls out what is of national importance and passes it on to the national convener.

This constituency organization has been completed—a fund has been established, a president and secretary-treasurer elected. By this means the special needs of each community will be carried forward to its maximum capacity—such as can only be accomplished by complete organization.

FROM NEW BRUNSWICK

In April during the Public Health week, inaugurated by the Minister of Health, lectures were given by leaders in this work for the purpose of educating along Public Health lines, and in this the Women's Institutes heartily co-operated, many meetings being held among the various branches of this association.

A fitting tribute to our organization is the pleasing reference to Women's Institute work by Lady Byng of Vimy, cultured wife of our new Governor-General:

"I am interested in public work. One thing is especially linked with Canada, and that is the Women's Institutes. I started one in the village of Thrope-Soken, Essex, Eng. with the assistance of Mrs. A. T. Watt of Victoria, B. C. the founder of this movement in this country. I am proud of the fact that ours was one of the first in England."

In view of the interest aroused in our organization from cottage to castle, let us cast off every ill befitting weight of race, creed and jealous agitation and press onward toward the goal of our ambitions, a better community, a better nation.

Many fine addresses were given, but none were appreciated more than that of the national president, Mrs. Todd. "It was an honor appreciated by all," says the Maritime Farmer, "that Mrs. Todd, the national president consented to be present. By her quiet unassuming manner, her friendly way, her sound judgment, and practical address she won the hearts of all."

"She urged upon all to stand together, that the whole was greater than the part. Energy must not be scattered. We must pool our gifts."

"Every common interest," continued Mrs. Todd "is a door to larger things. An intimate interest between teacher and community is a good thing. Community halls have arisen in a splendid way, bringing the facilities for good music. Let us sing 'O Canada' as a victory song—a march—not a dirge."

"Hospital work, libraries, health work is open to all."

"There are two things to be developed in our democracy—leadership and obedience to leadership. All should know the best methods of procedure and all of the helps of 'Big Business.'"

Do not omit the nightly cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream

Every normal skin needs two creams

*One cream to protect it against wind and cold
Another to cleanse it thoroughly*

For the following complexion flaws you need a protective cream made without oil

Windburn, roughness. Extremes of heat and cold, sharp winds, dust and dirt and smoke, all leave their mark upon unprotected skin. To guard against the devastating effects of wind and cold, protect your skin with Pond's Vanishing Cream before you go out. It acts as an invisible shield, preventing dust and dirt from clogging the pores and guarding against windburn and chapping. This softening cream cannot possibly make the face shiny, for it disappears the moment you rub it on and there is not a particle of oil in it to reappear.

Shiny Skin If you use Pond's Vanishing Cream as a powder base, rubbing it lightly on your face and neck just before powdering, you will not be embarrassed by a shiny nose or forehead. This dry, greaseless cream is absorbed at once by the skin, leaving a soft, velvety surface which holds the powder many times longer.

Tired, lifeless skin. When your skin needs instant freshening — when it feels tense and drawn and tight, smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream lightly into it. Notice how quickly the tired muscles of the face relax, how the color brightens and the very texture of the skin seems to take on more vigor. Pond's Vanishing Cream is based on an ingredient famous for its softening, soothing qualities.

Before going out into the cold air smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream into the skin.

For the following flaws a cleansing oil cream is needed

Blackheads. Blackheads require a deeper, more thorough cleansing than ordinary washing can give.

Before retiring, wash the face with warm water and pure soap. Then rub Pond's Cold Cream well into the skin. This rich oil cream works its way so deep into the pores that it gets at all the dirt and purges the skin of every particle of grime. Do not omit this nightly cleansing if you would have a clear, lovely skin.

Wrinkles. Only a cream with an oil base can successfully fight the fine lines that are the beginning of wrinkles. Oil lubricates the skin and restores its elasticity, keeping the little lines from fastening themselves on the skin and becoming real wrinkles, which are almost impossible to eradicate.

At night rub a generous amount of Pond's Cold Cream into the skin. This rich cream acts as a tonic, rousing and stimulating the skin and supplying the oil that is needed to ward off wrinkles. Particular attention should be given to the fine lines about the eyes and mouth and at the base of the nose. Rub with the lines, not across them. Too vigorous rubbing is often harmful, but gentle, persistent rubbing is always helpful, no matter how sensitive the skin.

A Better Sweeper

Made to Do More Work and to Last Longer

Carpet sweepers may look the same—but they differ greatly. Not only in method of operation, but in strength and durability. The Bissell method is radically different from any other. It is more than four wheels, a box and a rotating brush. It alone has the famous "Cyco" Ball Bearing principle which allows the brush to come in correct contact with any kind of carpet, giving maximum sweeping power. And the average life of a Bissell is 10 to 15 years.

Canadian Women's Institutes

"We must have a big vision. We have in the institutes the finest units in the world. Mass these units for home and country."

Other addresses were one by Mrs. Harry Crocker on "A Delegate's Duty," by Mrs. Lawlor on "A Model Institute Meeting," when she went thoroughly into the parliamentary procedure that should govern all institute meetings. "How to Make Institute Meetings Interesting," by Mrs. W. J. King of Smith's Creek, her suggestion being, an annual community picnic, attend regularly, choose a good leader, prepare an instructive roll call, prepare programs six months in advance, make them include home nursing, sewing, agricultural subjects, get the girls in the community interested and above all "Boost."

Hon. D. Mersereau, Minister of Agriculture, was another speaker, who stated that he would do all in his power to get the institute bill through the coming session. Mr. Harvey Mitchell, the deputy Minister, in his address, said that the Department of Agriculture was ready at all times to receive suggestions from the rural women and is ready to render as much assistance as they possibly can. Other addresses were: Child Welfare, by Mrs. Richard Hooper and Mr. R. W. Maxwell, on Vocational Education. The following resolutions were passed:

Resolved, that this Women's Institute, met here in convention, express its intense gratification at the results achieved by the referendum taken in New Brunswick on Oct. 10th and

Whereas the voters of New Brunswick have twice in eighteen months voted against the sale and importation of liquor in the Province of New Brunswick, and

Whereas on both occasions, intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes have been strongly opposed by large majorities.

Therefore, be it resolved that this Women's Institute in convention urge the Dominion Government to put into operation the New Act at the earliest possible moment.

Further resolved, that this Women's Institute Convention urge the Provincial Government to enact such amendments to the existing Prohibitory Act as may make it more effective for the purpose for which it was enacted.

And further resolved, that we believe the time has fully come when a much more vigorous enforcement of the Prohibition Act be undertaken.

In connection with the foregoing resolution, it was moved and seconded that a committee be appointed to present this resolution to the Premier at Ottawa, and to the Premier of this Province, Mrs. Harvey to be convener of this committee with power to choose her own assistants.

Further moved and seconded, that this resolution be placed in the hands of the Temperance Alliance, with the request that it be published in the press of this Province.

Last year's Resolution re Mothers' Pensions was re-affirmed.

Whereas, in the opinion of the Women's Institutes in convention assembled, there is need of some provision being made for the students attending the Provincial Normal School in Fredericton.

Therefore be it resolved we memorialize the Government to take steps toward providing a residence for the students of that institution.

Whereas the Province of New Brunswick, in every part of it, is benefited by the development of industries, and

Whereas raising and manufacturing of Flax has unlimited possibilities, and

Whereas the encouragement of Hand-craft is a step in keeping with the modern onward march of events.

Therefore, be it resolved that the Women's Institutes of N. B., in convention assembled, earnestly petition the Provincial Government to aid in every way, financially and otherwise, the development of these industries.

GREETINGS TO CANADIAN INSTITUTES

Mrs. William Todd, national president, Federated Women's Institutes of Canada has received the following greetings, from Lady Denman, chairman of the National Federation of Women's Institutes, England.

These are of interest to every W. I. member in Canada and read as follows: "The news that the Canadian Women's Institutes have formed themselves into a national Federation is arousing much interest in this country and it is with the greatest pleasure, as chairman of the National Federation of Women's Institutes of England and Wales, I send greetings to the National Federation of Canadian Women's Institutes."

"It is our sincere wish that the year 1922 may be a year of great growth and prosperity for our sister federation. We believe that the National Federation will achieve the same measure of success as has been attained by individual Canadian institutes and by provincial organizations, a success which has always been an inspiration to us in this country."

"The Institutes in England and Wales are formed on the model of Canadian Institutes, and they were first organized by Mrs. Alfred Watt, M. B. E. who gave to the country the benefit of Canadian experience. In 1917, when there were 137 institutes, the National Federation of Women's Institutes of England and Wales was formed. At that time the work of forming new Women's Institutes was in the hands of the Ministry of Agriculture, but since 1919 the whole work of the organization has been done by the National Federation, which has been assisted by a generous Government grant."

THE ONTARIO WOMEN'S INSTITUTES

OUR SILVER ANNIVERSARY

These are of us, they are, with us, All for primal needed work, while the followers there in embryo wait behind,

We to-day's procession heading, we the route for travel clearing, Pioneers! O Pioneers!

The thought force of rural Ontario expresses itself in action. The 19th of February, 1922, marked the 25th anniversary of the day when the men and women of the country took definite action in organizing the first study centre for better home-making and community building in Saltfleet Township, known later as the Stoney Creek Women's Institute.

The Women's Institutes were organized as a sister society to the Farmers' Institutes, with the purpose of giving similar care, study, and service to the country home and its human content, the family, as was given through the men's organization to the barn and field and their grain and cattle contents. In each neighborhood, one afternoon or evening a month was set aside by the girls and women of responsibility in home-making to be devoted to this study, followed by a social half hour together.

Co-operation was the underlying principle of these non-partisan, non-sectarian groups, "For Home and Country" their inspired motto, and their "handful of aims:" better homes, better people, a better community, a better and happier social life, and a better and more scientific agriculture. With the simple working formula, "if you know a good thing, pass it on," they drew out of the well of practical experience to help each other, discovering and developing as they did so a wealth of talent in themselves and others which more and more profoundly influenced Provincial life and action.

The Women's Institutes early had the sympathetic support of Ontario Agricultural College and the Department of Agriculture, and before many years, a further Trinity of co-operation was achieved—that of the Home, the College, and the Government. The result of this was the gradual evolution of what is the first State Department of Home-Making set up by any Government, the Institutes Branch of the Department of Agriculture of the Province of Ontario.

This carried out the profoundly great and true vision of the pioneers in the movement, that home-making was not just a woman's job, but the basis of strong and sound nation-building, and the business of men and women, colleges and government. This working partnership between rural home-makers and the government has brought about a condition of affairs which a quarter of a century ago existed merely as a dream of the imagination. A large and well-qualified Departmental lecture staff is at the service of the home-makers through the Institutes Branch, the results of college research and university culture are being placed at their service through the Extension courses, and Government Departments, especially those of Agriculture, Education, and Health, find the Institutes one of the most effective channels through which to reach the whole people.

The officers of the first Branch were: Hon. President, Mrs. Hoodless, Hamilton; President, Mrs. E. D. Smith, Winona; Secretary, Miss Nash, Stoney Creek.

There have been three Superintendents of the Institutes, Farmers' and Women's Branch: Mr. F. W. Hodson, Dr. George C. Creelman, and since 1904, Mr. G. A. Putnam, under whose guidance there has been steady expansion and development during the last eighteen years.

The idea has extended far beyond the bounds of Ontario now, the other eight provinces having also organized until there are Institutes from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. Belgium, England, Scotland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand have followed suit, eagerly seeking information as to methods of work and results from the Governmental Reports, Hand-books, and Bulletins issued from time to time, and from personal investigation of the Branches themselves.

It is with humility, and a sense of serious responsibility, therefore, that Ontarians, regarding agriculture as their basic industry, mothering as the greatest of sciences, and home-making as one of the most important professions, face towards the second quarter century in this work of nation building through an intelligent and increasingly scientific attention to the production and development of a high type of citizen.

PROGRAMME PLANNING.

By Emily J. Guest, M. A.

The key note of success in the Branch Institute is Programme Planning. The Board of Directors of the branch will find this one of their chief and most interesting duties. First find out what the members want, then arrange the programme. There are various ways of doing this, partly by suggestion, partly by inquiry, roll calls, the Suggestion Box, and, a very good method, by devoting half an hour at the April or October meeting or both, to discussion and suggestions of items.

Of these suggestions the secretary keeps a record for the assistance of the committee in mapping out an attractive, well-balanced programme for the ensuing six months of the year.

"The First Year I Made $475 —and Worked Only in My Spare Time"

Here is the actual experience of a woman who learned how to turn spare time into money. Read how scores of others are doing it-right in their homes

By MRS GEORGE POOL

LIVING on a very small income always calls for courage and strict economy, even when one is in the best of health. But when sickness comes, and big unexpected expenses begin to pile up, it takes a stout heart indeed to face the bills without being filled with despair.

My husband makes a very modest living, but with careful management it was sufficient for our needs. We had no luxuries, but we got along fairly well—until I fell sick. Then followed weeks of worry and doctor's bills, and finally it was decided that the only thing that would really remedy my trouble was a very serious operation.

There were no two ways about it—I had to have the operation — so I did — although we had no idea where the money was to come from. My husband worried about it a good deal, and we both started trying to save, in order to pay the doctor, in time.

All this time I felt that I ought to find some way to help pay our debts, but I wasn't very strong and couldn't do any work that I would have to leave my home to do.

If I Could Only Find Some Home Work

I read the papers and magazines eagerly and considered various things I might do, but everything I thought of always had some big objection—either it didn't pay well enough or required too much effort for my health, or something.

Finally, one Sunday I was reading a magazine and saw a page advertisement that started with the words, 'Make Money in Your Own Home.'

I read in this article how women everywhere were turning their spare hours into dollars by making socks on a hand-knitting machine called the Auto Knitter. The firm agreed to take and pay for all socks made according to directions by owners of the machine.

This looked practical for me, as it was light work that I could do in the house, so I decided to write for particulars.

When the company's free literature came I studied it eagerly. It was so convincing and reasonable that I felt more certain than ever this was, indeed, the money-making home work that I was seeking. I had such faith in it that I decided to borrow money enough to order one of the "Auto-Knitter" machines. A friend helped me and I was soon the happy possessor of a way to make money and help pay our debts.

I Started Making Money Almost at Once

With the machine came a fine illustrated instruction book that showed what to do, step by step, and it wasn't long until I had mastered it and was turning out fine, well-knit wool socks to send to the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company in Toronto.

"In a month and a half I made, in all, 429 pairs of hosiery."

As soon as I had sent a shipment back came my pay check for the work, together with an amount of yarn to replace that used in the socks sent. The company was always very prompt and the work called for so little effort that I kept at it quite steadily.

In three months' time I had made enough in my spare time to pay back what I had borrowed and my large doctor's bill too. It made me very happy to be able to make extra money at home, for my husband stopped worrying. Besides, I knew the Auto Knitter would help us to have more comforts for our home in the future.

At first I worked only for the Company, sending them shipments of socks and getting my checks back promptly — but soon friends and neighbors learned that I had a knitting machine, and began to give me orders to do knitting for them. Before long I had worked up quite a little home business and could have done more if I had more time to give to it. I have never worked full time — only when I had it to spare — but in the first year I had my Auto Knitter I made $475.00.

Extra Money Problem Solved

Things went along much more smoothly now, although my health was still far from perfect. I was able to help my husband in making our living, as I bought all my own clothes and helped to run the house.

Then last October I had to have another operation. Of course I dreaded it, but this time the prospect did not fill me with despair as before, for I knew that the trusty little Auto Knitter would help to pay the doctor's bill—and so it did.

When I was over the operation I put an ad. in the paper and the result was surprising. I received more work than I could hardly do.

In a month and a half I made, in all, 429 pairs of hosiery of various kinds—men's socks, and boys' and girls' stockings. I also made several pairs of mitts.

The people were so pleased with my work that they kept coming back for more, and told others about me. Also three women who saw what lovely work my Auto Knitter did wanted machines for themselves and so I was able to sell three machines for the company.

I could write a good deal more about how the Auto Knitter has helped me but I have told enough to show what a God-send it has proved in helping me and my husband to pay our debts and live better.

We Guarantee a Permanent Market

Mrs. Pool's experience, told here in her own words, is simply one of many. Letters are continually coming in from men and women all over the country telling of similar successes in making money right at home with the Auto-Knitter.

The beauty of the Auto-Knitter home-work plan is that you never have the least bit of trouble disposing of the standard socks that you make on your Auto-Knitter. We enter into a contract, agreeing to take all the standard socks you knit and send to us, paying for them at a fixed guaranteed price per pair.

This contract doesn't restrict you at all. You can work for us as much—or as little as you please. If you wish to work for a home trade, selling the socks to local stores, or direct to your friends and neighbors, as Mrs. Pool has done, you are perfectly free to do so. But we are always ready to take as much of your standard output as you care to send, paying you good wages—on a piece-work basis—for the time you put in.

Write for Liberal Wage Offer

Of course you are interested. No matter where you live — on a farm, in a small town, or in the heart of a great city — you have the spare-time problem to consider. You want to turn your leisure hours into dollars. And so you would like to know all about the knitting machine that has meant so much to other people. By all means, write to the Auto-Knitter Hosiery (Canada) Company, Ltd., Dept. 433, 1870 Davenport Road, Toronto, Ont., and find out about the pleasant occupation waiting for you—Auto-Knitting. Learn what other folks are doing, and the substantial amounts that even a part of your spare time may yield you.

Remember that previous experience in hand-knitting is not necessary. An inexperienced person without special talent can learn to operate the Auto-Knitter, and turn out standard socks.

You will never regret writing for information about this remarkable machine. Send your name and address now, and find out all of the good things that are in store for you.

AIM TO HAVE THE PROGRAMME:

1. Seasonable
2. Balanced i.e. (a) an address or paper (b) a demonstration or exhibit with discussion following (c) and, if possible, a social half hour at the end, in all not more than two hours.
3. Cover the interests of all in the home.
4. Draw out as much local talent as possible.
5. Have as many members as possible taking part.
6. Interest both girls and women.
7. Be progressive from year to year.
8. Consider community interests.

THE STUDY OF THE HOME.

This may be encouraged by the president and committee drawing from the members suggestions as to what they would like taken up at the monthly meetings under such heads as:—food, clothing, housing, furnishing, cleaning, labor-saving, health.

The Study of the People in the Home can be dealt with under such sub-heads as,—the family, education, friends, division of work, financial arrangements, play and recreation, music, reading, manners.

THE STUDY OF THE COMMUNITY.

This may be taken up along such lines as:—Civics, the school, community health, neighborhood recreation, community beauty, neatness and progressiveness, church co-operation, school fairs, naming and beautifying country homes, cleaning and improving roadsides, parks, cemeteries. Short Courses and their desirability.

KEEP THE PROGRAMME BALANCED.

When the list of suggestions is complete, it may conveniently be arranged into three divisions:

1. Those topics which can best be dealt with in papers and addresses.
2. Those which require to be seen done, i.e. exhibits or demonstrations.
3. Those in which a number or all of the members take part, as roll calls, discussions, debates, spelling matches, games, community singing, the social half hour

From these three columns an attractive, well-balanced programme can be arranged to suit the season and the states of the majority, keeping in mind that the programme is not solely for those of literary tastes, the practical minded, the mothers, nor the girls, but "for the equal good of all".

Each month's programme should be so planned as to contain features one or other of which should interest every member. For example, where there is a paper or address, there should also be a demonstration or exhibit bearing on practical matters. Many people learn more from seeing than from hearing. Nor should the social half hour be neglected. The social mind needs to be developed in the country. There must be friendliness and sympathy to ensure co-operation.

HAVE AS MANY AS POSSIBLE TAKE PART.

This is good for the Institute and good for the members. It may be done by getting the members to take their turn in acting as hostesses for the social half hour, in responding to roll calls, taking part in the discussion, contributing to demonstrations or exhibits, and by deciding by ballot vote of all present when judging for prizes. Besides this, each should, of course, contribute what she can in the way of papers, talks or demonstrations to the programme; also as far as possible each should take her turn at acting on the branch Board of Directors.

COMPETITIONS, NOTICE BOARDS, SUGGESTION BOXES.

In some places the Institute principle of co-operation is being worked to a logical conclusion by encouraging competitions for standards of excellence rather than the old idea of competition against persons for 1st, 2nd and 3rd prizes.

For instance, all competitors who made 100 out of a possible 100 points would be considered as first prize winners, of 90 second, and of 80 third. This method has the virtue of raising the general standard of achievement in the community and of doing away very largely with the rivalries and jealousies of personal competitions.

An Institute notice board placed up in a store, post office, or other frequented centre, on which items of interest and forthcoming events are posted, has been found to work well in some places.

A permanent Suggestion Box at each meeting into which members may drop ideas and suggestions has been found a helpful feature also.

LET YOUR LIGHT SHINE.

Send your programme to the papers and write up bright, newsy accounts of your meeting for the local press.

HERE AND THERE AMONG THE BRANCHES.

Shelburne serving a large area, one of the best farming sections in Ontario, had long felt the need of a Rest Room for the women and children who had nowhere to wait except in the stores. The Town Council had made an effort to provide accommodation which had not been successful, so about two years ago they offered to equip two toilets, a lavatory, and provide an adjoining room, heated and lighted, if the Women's Institute of the town would undertake to furnish and maintain it, an offer which was gladly accepted.

The Institutes in the county joined with their contributions, and, with these, and funds from bazaars and sales of home-made cooking, the rest room was furnished comfortably and in good taste.

There is a paid attendant to clean the room daily, and the Town Constable keeps on the fires. The room is closed at 6 p.m. except on Saturdays when it remains open until 10 p.m.

The cost of furnishing was $100. and its maintenance amounts to $50. a year. The Rest Room not only serves its purpose as an accommodation but has been a stimulus to work for the Shelburne Branch, and the means of drawing together many of the Branches in the County.

The officers of one branch, justifying their claim to be considered in good standing notwithstanding small numbers, write as follows:

"We consider we do very well to keep ten members with two houses burned down, six vacant, and two bachelors living alone within a radius of four miles, and poor roads to travel on. However if we cannot get the grant on our ten members,—and it is practically impossible to get more,—we shall try to carry on without it as we do not want to drop our branch."

"Alliston had its heroes and we did not intend to forget them. What form was our memorial to take? We needed many things but most of all we needed a Library, and we wanted a memorial not only of stone and wood, to recall to us our victorious dead, but one that would give service to the living as well, so with this object in view, we started to work in real earnest on a Memorial Library.

We got in touch with Mr. Carson, Inspector of Public Libraries and he gave us all information regarding the establishing of a Library. We had on hand about $200.00 for a start. The active members of our Institute joined our Library Board. We rented a room, put in some furnishings to make it as attractive as possible, so that it might be a Reading Room as well as a Library. We bought one hundred and fifty dollars worth of books, being very careful in our choice, keeping our fiction down to forty per cent. We also got three Travelling Libraries from the Department, and with these we opened our Library.

We have endeavored to put on our book shelves only the best of books, and have been particularly careful of the class of literature our young people read. We have a paid librarian and our Library is open every Tuesday and Saturday afternoon and evening.

We put forth a special effort to make Canadian Authors' Week a vital thing in our town, to show our readers that we can get the very best right here in Canada. We have a Story Hour on Saturday afternoon for children from six to twelve, and have had an average attendance of twenty-two. The Story Hour is conducted by the secretary.

We have on our shelves over one thousand volumes and a membership of two hundred and sixty. Every returned man and his family are free members. If you could drop into our Library any Tuesday or Saturday night, I think you would realize just what it has meant to Alliston, and how very much worth while it has been to work for it.

It may perhaps interest Canadian Institutes to have an outline of the organization, which has been built up and the work which has been done during those four years.

First as to organization. The policy of the National Federation is settled and the executive committee is elected at the annual meeting. Each individual W. I. has complete self-government provided that it adheres to the general policy laid down at the annual meeting. Each W. I. may send a delegate to this meeting and may nominate and vote for the executive committee. At the last annual meeting there were 2,070 Women's Institutes, 1,300 delegates attended and 52 nominations for the executive Committee were received.

In addition each county has a County Federation, which deals with county matters, helps W.I.'s, forms new W. I.'s, gives all information as to speakers, educational facilities and generally does all the mothering of the W. I.'s, which means, very often, the difference between success or failure of the Institutes of that county.

The work of the National Federation may be divided into the following headings:

1. It has schools for voluntary organizers in Institute methods. There are now 210 Voluntary County organizers, who are appointed and trained by the National Federation on the recommendation of the County Federation, and who, on appointment, work under the direction of the County Executive Committee. This ensures that the W. I.'s follow the same broad principles and practises in all parts of the country.

2. It trains teachers in handicrafts, when no teachers are available from the Government Education authorities. This ensures that the W. I. members will, in time, produce work of a high standard.

3. It sends organizers to speak at schools or Conferences arranged by the County Federations for the instruction of presidents, secretaries, treasurers or members of Committee in their duties. As far as space will allow W. I. members are admitted to these conferences, as it is considered advisable for members to know the duties of their officers.

4. It arranges the work of various organizers, who now number only 5, and who only visit counties particularly in want of help.

5. It allocates various sums to each county from the Government Grant.

6. It publishes the Women's Institutes Journal called "Home and Country," which now has a circulation of 19,500. It publishes leaflets, a Handbook, etc. Each County Federation may publish literature if it wishes to do so, and many counties have a leaf of their own news inserted in "Home and Country".

THE HOUSE ON THE CORNER

By A. C. Pulver.

WHEN the roaring winds of a wintry night are sweeping across the fields and over the hills, bombarding the shutters with chill blasts from out of the North, and you are snugly secure indoors; comfortable in the cosy depths of the Grandfather chair with a seasoned briar going full steam ahead, and your stockinged feet, warmly braced against the friendly fender of the cheerfully glowing base-burner,—have you ever meditated over the beacon light, beckoning hospitably, through the inky blackness, from "The House on the Corner"?

If, perhaps, you haven't ruminated on the expressive significance of all that it symbolizes; then you don't live on a shadowy side-road, away from the sociable clatter and buzz of the main highway; but if it so happens, that the fell clutch of circumstance, has cast your lot on an obscure sweet-cloved pathway, through the township; far removed from the telephone and gas line, then "The House on the Corner," grows into your life, as a bulwark of defence, against the elusory foibles of daily destinies.

In one specific locality I know of, a certain House on the Corner plays a memorable part in the life of the community, and its removal would be akin to blighting the bloom of Faith, Hope, and Charity, and knocking the spokes from the wheels of progress.

This house is full of large-hearted people, abundance of good-will, and a telephone. The consortment represents a sympathetic asset to society far and near.

If ever a cold-blooded nickel-plated telephone grew warm from insistent and constant tinkling, then the telephone in "The House on the Corner," is red-hot most of the time.

It is a magic communicator, of the mishaps, sorrows and joys, of a narrowing circle of families. It has revealed to distant friends agitation, excitement, and perturbation, and has brought in pacification, calmness, and soothing appeasement. When old Mrs. Smithers up the road, gets a bad heart spell at twelve o'clock midnight; the alarmed Mr. Smithers, hastily tucks his flannel nightrobe into his overalls, and splashes down the road with a lantern, to "The House on the Corner". And when old Mrs. Smithers' daughter in town, has an urgent message for Mother, or a trivial communication, "The House on the Corner" is notified and someone cheerfully splashes up the road to the Smithers' homestead.

When Charlie Taylor's red cow gets the colic, Charlie goes on the double to the Corner House, and calls 3097 for the veterinary, some miles away. When Sandy McDougal wants to know how much hogs are worth on Monday morning, down at the station stock-yards, he makes a straight bee-line across the fields, to the self-same House on the Corner, and Sam Brown takes a short cut in the same direction, to find out what his balance amounts to, at the bank in town.

And when Dick Jones, from the big city, steers his eight-cylinder into the ditch on a slippery, sodden night, he gets down on his knees, and thanks the Powers that Be, that the light on the corner radiates hopeful rescue.

"The House on the Corner" is a stronghold of fortitude, and a disseminator of confidence and optimism.

By virtue of its very location, good works seem necessarily to flow from it. The Lady of The House on the Corner, is the first one called, to cheer the sick, and comfort the needy; and The Man of The House on the Corner, lends a helping hand to the lonely new-comer in the midst of strangers. It is a busy life, full of thrills, and suspensions, that the family in the House on the Corner, live. The House, itself is not a mark of stately pretentiousness in the landscape, but somehow it has "Home Sweet Home" written on the four walls, and in every nook and crevice. It is a real home, full of true greatness, and requires no large stage, and no gorgeous settings, to emphasize or attract attention to its inherent qualities. Perchance in the inscrutable system of that mysterious Thing called Life, "The House on the Corner", has not just happened to be there, but instead, is a Providential arrangement, in a very definite plan. Who can tell?

Assuredly, it stands out as a relevant factor, in a Great Scheme to assist one small collection of souls on their way.

the work more seriously" he said. "They settle down quicker and give far more attention to their work. And another thing, they are not intent on rushing off on the stroke of four o'clock to pink teas and pre-nuptial showers and although we do not mind these hurried exits once in a while they are rather too frequent and upset the dignity of the profession."

While one will agree that women may leave a bank or any other institution to get married and, in cases of opening branches in outlying and sparsely populated districts, there would be difficulty in sending a girl however efficient to fill the position—many women will disagree with the statement that members of their sex do not take the work seriously and that they "upset the dignity of the profession."

There is even a possibility that other professions and trades will follow in the lead of the banks, particularly so as there is a tremendous amount of unemployment throughout the world.

The Woman had been invited to take a motor ride with Mrs. Brown, a lady with more money than blood. The sedan brought its passengers in reasonably close proximity to Mrs. Brown's chauffeur, whom that lady addressed facetiously as "Willum," making many little jokes for his benefit, and including him to a great extent in the conversation.

Returned to the hotel Mrs. Brown linked her arm into that of the Woman, whispering confidentially, "You may perhaps have thought me rather familiar with 'Willum,' my dear, but you know he is not just an ordinary chauffeur. He eloped with his last employer's daughter!"

Why Do You Catch Cold?

THE germs of "air-borne" diseases penetrate almost everywhere. Just one room may contain them in millions. Whether or no you catch cold depends largely on whether the defensive forces of the body are strong enough to defeat the germs which attack you.

The golden law is: "Be well nourished"—strengthen your defensive forces with Bovril. In addition to its own direct nutritive value, Bovril possesses remarkable powers of enabling you to extract more nourishment from other foods.

MARCH is not a kindly month, although it may be needed to make the circle of the year complete. March tears our hair from the security of the net, and burns the cheeks when the sun and the wind are combining their forces. It is a perfect virago of a month, and no one is sorry when it breathes its last, even if April comes in with a shower.

Hence it is well to be prepared for March and not to take its lamb-like moods too seriously, for it can become of the wind and then we wonder why the face becomes so deeply brown, and lament the weather. Of course there is always the recourse to the cream jar and the soothing lotion. By the way, I wonder what we should do without the trees and the shrubs, when the sun and the wind have done their worst. There is the almond from which the healing milk is obtained which both softens and whitens; there is the olive which means suppleness and softness

The Price You Pay For dingy film on teeth

Let us show you by a ten-day test how combating film in this new way beautifies the teeth.

Now your teeth are coated with a viscous film. You can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. It forms the basis of fixed cloudy coats.

That film resists the tooth brush. No ordinary tooth paste can effectively combat it. That is why so many well-brushed teeth discolor and decay.

Keeps teeth dingy

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film. And, despite the tooth brush, they have constantly increased.

Attack it daily

Careful people have this film removed twice yearly by their dentists. But the need is for a daily film combatant.

Now dental science, after long research, has found two ways to fight film. Able authorities have proved their efficiency. A new-type tooth paste has been perfected to comply with modern requirements. The name is Pepsodent. These two film combatants are embodied in it, to fight the film twice daily.

Two other effects

Pepsodent also multiplies the starch digestant in saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which otherwise may cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer for acids which cause decay.

Thus every use gives multiplied effect to Nature's tooth-protecting agents in the mouth. Modern authorities consider that essential.

Millions employ it

Millions of people now use Pepsodent, largely by dental advice. The results are seen everywhere—in glistening teeth.

Once see its effects and you will adopt it too. You will always want the whiter, cleaner, safer teeth you see. Make this test and watch the changes that it brings. Cut out the coupon now.

A Great New Carillon of Bells Coming to Toronto—The rise of the Contralto, Jeanne Gordon

By Hector Charlesworth

THE completion at Croydon, near London, England, of an immense carillon or peal of bells for installation in the Metropolitan Methodist Church, Toronto, has aroused a great deal of attention on both sides of the Atlantic. The first trial of the bells in the form of a musical recital on them, which took place at Croydon a few weeks ago prior to their shipment to Canada, was attended by royalty in the persons of Princess Beatrice and the Duchess of Albany, the daughter and daughter-in-law of the late Queen Victoria. The progress of the bells has been the subject of much attention in the British illustrated press.

The city of Toronto, when this carillon is installed, will have three fine sets of what in colloquial language are termed chimes. One has for many years been installed in St. James Cathedral and within recent years a very fine set of bells capable of playing beautiful melodies has been placed in the Timothy Eaton Memorial Church some three miles away from St. James. This third acquisition is a gift to the Metropolitan Church by one of its oldest supporters, Mr. Chester D. Massey and they will little of them; with the growth of walled cities in Western Europe bells came into use for summoning purposes not only in connection with religion but warfare. The founding of big bells and the making of them in different sizes to produce musical scales seems to have arisen in the age of monasteries and cathedral building.

Singularly enough the bell-ringing as a musical art is distinctly English in origin and history. A carillon as distinguished from the old fashioned peal of bells, means a set of chimes which is operated by mechanical devices. Of such character are practically all of the important sets of bells in Canada; and such has been the traditional method in vogue for playing melodies on bells in France and Belgium for centuries. Monkish artificers showed a great deal of ingenuity in devising appliances with wires and levers to operate chimes in high steeples and towers. But in the English countryside there sprung up, nobody knows just when or how, a school of individual performers who learned to use bells almost like an orchestra, the music being made by a chief ringer and several trained com-be a permanent memorial to his late wife. The loveliness of the effect when the music of the bells is heard on a summer evening is not easily described.

Toronto does not stand alone among Canadian cities in the possession of noble chimes. Several of the older churches in Montreal are similarly endowed. The famous Church of Notre Dame has a set of bells that is famous all over America; and one of its bells, certainly the most immense in America, if not in the world, is a civic institution. It is known as "Le Grand Bourdon" and on the rare occasions when it is sounded its profound and resonant tones are so widely diffused that they drown all other sounds in the immediate vicinity, and are heard for miles.

The identification of bells with religious observances is a time honored practice among all Christian communities, although they do not seem to have come into general use until the early middle ages. In pre-Christian times humanity seems to have known very panions under his direction, who learned to ring what are known as "changes" and passed on the art from generation to generation in their parishes. Often this art was an hereditary calling adhering in certain families. Elderly men born in the smaller towns of England recall from boyhood persons highly skilled in this calling, though otherwise simple and unlettered individuals.

In Canada, however, it would be impossible to find trained hand ringers, so we have to be content with mechanical devices. The tones created by the two systems necessarily differ somewhat; for with the carillon or mechanical system, the sounds are produced by striking stationary bells with hammers; while in the case of hand-ringing the clapper creates the sound as it strikes the swinging bell. Necessarily the latter condition involves a great deal of specialized science and skill of hand among performers.

In that delightful early book by Sir James Barrie, which has almost been forgotten in the tremendous success which has attended "Peter Pan" and "Dear Brutus," the sketches called "A Window In Thrums," you may remember that the woman weaver expressed contempt for the small-handed woman and wondered how anyone could see anything admirable in a small hand. The community was almost strictly utilitarian, and a small hand did not make for success in the work of weaving and was consequently held in no esteem. As social standards have changed, and the urban woman has almost usurped the limelight, the small and dainty hand has come to be admired. The usefulness of woman's hand has been lost sight of in the consideration of its beauty. So often one hears the wail from the young housewife: "Just look at my hands! And they used to be so nice and soft!" Now, this may sound like a foolish cry, but the world would be a sadder place than it is, if woman had become quite indifferent to her appearance and comeliness.

The experienced housewife knows that it is possible to cook and do various household tasks and still have very presentable hands. There are several inexpensive and effective "preservatives" which keep the hands from aging. For instance, as we said last month, a bottle of vinegar near the sink will soften and whiten the hands which are shrunken and wrinkled after being in hot water. The use of a daily and nightly cream is not a folly, but a sensible measure to take in preserving the texture of the skin, for roughened hands are not only unsightly, but are more easily infected than those which are kept in comfortable condition.

Here is a home-made cream which is worth while. One-half ounce white wax, one-half ounce spermaceti, One ounce lanoline, One ounce coconut oil One ounce orange flower water, Two ounces oil of sweet almonds, tincture of benzoin, three drops. Mix all, adding the orange flower water and the tincture of benzoin last.

ELECTRICITY in Canada is now the cheapest and the best fuel known for cooking, water heating and lighting. This is due to the intensive development of our natural resources for the production of the wonderful "white coal."

But are you taking advantage of this cheap electricity? You are probably using it at night to light your home, but are you using it for cooking?

Do you know that electric current at 2 to 3 cents per K.W. hour is cheaper than coal, wood, gas or oil for cooking, and in many centres in Ontario the rate is only 1 cent per K.W. hour.

Thousands and thousands of Canadian women are today taking advantage of this wonderful source of cheap heat, light and power. Over 24,000 women throughout the world are using Moffat Electric Ranges for all their cooking. Wherever there's power you'll find a Moffat Electric Range. Moffats are safe, convenient, most economical in use of current. They are absolutely reliable, and require less renewal than any coal range. Tested and tried for nine years by the only stove manufacturer in America who made the first electric range. The Moffat is easy to operate and has many new ingenious safety and labor-saving devices.

The British hand ringers had a great many quaint traditional names which they apply to different combinations of bells, all of which have a definite significance for the expert; for instance there is the "Bob" or "Single"; "Double Bobs" and "Triple Bobs"; "Grandsire Triples"; "Caters" (probably from the French "quatre"); "Stedman" (named after a famous bell-ringer of the seventeenth century, Fabian Stedman) "Minor", "Maximus" "Surprise";—all of which terms are used by the "conductor" to direct the labors of his assistants. Formerly these used not only their hands but their feet, placed through loops in the ropes to achieve their effects.

Old though it is as an art, bell-ringing does not seem to have been codified as a branch of musical science until about three hundred years ago; but societies or guilds of ringers existed seven hundred years previously. There is in existence for his victory over Bonnie Prince Charlie at Culloden, the latter organization changed its name to "Cumberland Youths". Up to 1914 these two ancient societies were still in existence and included in their membership most of the gifted "change ringers" in England. There are also old provincial societies, especially one at Saffron Walden, Essex, founded in 1623, which still holds an annual bell-ringing festival. Incidentally it may be said that the commonplace phrase to "ring the changes" on such and such a subject, comes from the vocabulary of bell-ringing.

a patent roll issued in the name of Henry 111 in 1255 A. D. by which the Brethren of the Guild of Westminster "are appointed to ring the great bells there in the enjoyment of the privileges and free customs they have enjoyed there since the reign of Edward the Confessor."

After the reign of Elizabeth, when music in all branches began to be taken up scientifically, and treatises written thereon, allusions to the practice and methods of bell ringing became frequent. In 1637 there was founded the "Society of College Youths" to practise the art on the six bells of St. Martin's, College Hill, a church destroyed in the great fire of London, 1666. The society continued in existence however, and later another known as the "Society of London Scholars" was founded. In 1746, in compliment to the Duke of Cumberland fact. But her rise has been unprecedentedly rapid. The Metropolitan Opera House, owing to after-the-war conditions is the greatest centre of the art of singing in the world. Between it and the Chicago Grand Opera, America now possesses almost all the more eminent song-birds before the public to-day; for the very good reason that it is able to accord them much higher rewards than Europe. Under the circumstances Miss Gordon's rapid rise to a premier position within the brief space of fifteen months is phenomenal. Not infrequently do foreign singers rapidly attain high eminence on this continent, but in almost every instance investigation shows that they have already served a considerable apprenticeship in European opera houses that.

for instance, is the case of Jeritza, the reigning sensation of to-day as it was that of Galli-Curci five years ago. But Jeanne Gordon has found her place in the sun almost without an apprenticeship in operatic methods, without foreign training and without the adoption of a foreign name.

As a girl she was known as Ruby Gordon and is a native of Wallaceburg, Ontario, the only daughter of the late David A. Gordon, who was Member for West Kent in the House of Commons from 1904 until his retirement in 1917. She was one of eight children, the others being brothers, and was educated at Havergal Hall, Toronto, and the Toronto Conservatory of Music under Dr. Albert Ham, who taught her singing and theory, and whom she cherishes in high esteem as her original master. After graduating, she became a concert and choir singer in Detroit, the nearest large city to her Wallaceburg home. As she reached womanhood she developed remarkable personal beauty; and a gift for dramatic expression, which had manifested itself in girlhood, steadily developed. Two or three years ago Creatore, the band-master, decided to start a touring Grand Opera Company of his own, and set about looking for fresh and beautiful voices which would not cost too much money. For the sake of experience Miss Gordon enlisted with his forces and her talent not merely as a singer but as an actress amazed the experienced Italian routine singers who formed the backbone of the company. The rumor of her gifts reached the great impresario, Signor Gatti-Cazazza, of the Metropolitan Opera House who offered her an engagement. Her debut was made in the latter part of November, 1920, in the role of the aged gypsy woman, Azucena in "Il Trovatore."

Though very tall and lissome, Miss Gordon converted herself into an aged crone and acted and sang so superbly that she was called before the curtain again and again. This season she was promoted to a first position and has divided all the principal contralto roles in the more important productions with Madame Matzenauer a much older singer of world wide experience. Here she has taken precedence of many noted artists long identified with the Metropolitan. It was the writer's recent privilege to judge of her both as an operatic artist and a concert artist all within the space of five days. He was present at the farewell performance of the great Russian basso Chaliapin, in New York on January 26 when she sang the leading role in "Boris Goudonoff". Her beauty and aristocratic distinction as well as her noble singing led to her being called before the curtain again and again. A few days later, January 31st, she came to Toronto to sing under the baton of her old master Dr. Ham at the concert of the National Chorus; and the emotional power of her ballad singing as well as her personal magnetism, captivated every listener. Few indeed are the singers of any land who can boast of so sudden a rise to eminence, but everyone who has heard Miss Gordon recognizes it as a triumph of sheer ability.

Paint and Varnish

By Nina Moore Jamieson.

Righteous women who get their house cleaning done on schedule time, will give me a cold eye when I confess that I have only just finished mine. Finished today when the thermometer was steaming around the ninety mark, and the whole outdoors was about half-fried. The finish was with a paint brush and executed upon my little old wooden chairs. Wooden—well, I mean not upholstered, or cane bottomed, or leather-seated or otherwise diverted from the plain old Kitchen pattern.

We got these chairs years ago at a neighbor's sale, eleven of them at ten cents each. They are hand made, I am told, and are as solid as chairs can be. The worthy lady who originally owned them, had them painted a handsome black, but time and friction dissipated the paint, and they fairly shouted for a fresh coat.

I hope it may be generally appreciated when I say I bought a gallon of yellow floor paint not so very long ago. I say this with a feeling of conscious pride. A gallon—a whole gallon! And such a magnificent yellow! When I soused it on the floor around my oilcloth island, it was gay enough to dazzle the most worldly-minded person. Therefore I dimmed it with varnish stain—and turned to other lines of labor.

For painting and varnishing floors will give any one a weary feeling in the knees—except perhaps, some professional performer whose knees are used to the work. Mine weren't, nor was I inured to the fearful penetrating odor that goes with the business. "Turps," said the little paper label on the bottle, but the glass was in raised letters, and spoke of Irish whiskey, so it is hard to say whether the smell belongs to the Turps or the Irish, or the combination.

The paint can said nothing about itself except to give its serial number, and to state that it was floor paint of the purest, the finest, the most expensive, the most durable, the quickest drying, the longest lasting, the best-looking, the most utterly and completely satisfying kind known to man. It did not say that after the operation of changing the countenance of a fair sized room, the operator would have a twenty-pound headache and the whole house would reek like a paint shop.

No—it said none of these things, because the manufacturers knew that if they could sell their paint, and induce some zealous house wife to start dabbling in it, one gallon would never do her—never! That gallon has ensnared me. No new hat this season, no chocolates, no chewing gum. For you see, as soon as I painted the dining room floor, I saw that the pantry wanted a lick, and then when I came out to the kitchen, the shabbiness of that erstwhile satisfying place was most disturbing. More paint!

Not only did the kitchen floor need doing, but the ceiling—well, that ceiling! We have been using a lot of pine roots in the stove, and my excellent John always takes the stove lid off so that he can look in and see how the fire is getting on. Forthwith the pine smoke comes out to see how he is getting on, and that is how the kitchen ceiling gets so "grim-my"-looking, as Aunt Susan says.

I did not put yellow floor paint on the ceiling—that's where I had to plunge in for half a gallon of cream paint. Then the bristles began to peel out of my brush, and it took six pounds of butter to buy me a new one. However, we are progressing nicely, for the kitchen and the dining room are, of our eleven rooms, the ones we use most.

Having brushed up the most conspicuously-needed, paintable areas, the chairs next caught my eye. So I took out the five kitchen chairs, to give them a new face. This rested my knees, and took the cramps out of my back, for I set them up on a box and sat down on a stool beside them to work. The day was warm, heavy, sultry, and very little breeze was in the air, but still the outdoors openness saved me from poisoning myself with the fumes of that highly-recommended paint.

SPRING SUITS WITH VARIATIONS

BY CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

IN the Springtime a woman's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of suits. That's not exactly what Tennyson said, but it's what he might have said if he had been writing about clothes instead of love, because it's true. No spring wardrobe is "one hundred per cent efficient" without a suit. And this spring's suits are wonderfully versatile. A skirt and a coat no longer have the exclusive right to be called a suit. Your spring suit may consist of a jumper that is a sleeveless dress, or even a dress with sleeves in it, and a jacket or a hip length cape, when it becomes a frock suit.

This variety of type is refreshing; it carries us away from the monotony of sameness that usually prevails in the suits. It gives us two costumes instead of one, and either cape, jacket or dress are usually interchangeable with other wraps or dresses. This is an advantage for it gives us more changes, without really having more pieces in the wardrobe.

When the suit includes a guimpe dress, it is made of only one material, but when the dress has sleeves, quite often the top, that is the long waist, is made of some kind of silk, Roshanara crepe perhaps, and frequently of another color, grey, for instance with navy blue. The reason for the silk top is that the cloth sleeves would make the suit too warm for any but early in the spring, and the idea of the dress and jacket or cape, is to make a very practical costume for both spring and summer.

One might as well admit in the beginning that navy blue is supreme, and while fashion magazines speak of many materials, tricotine and Poiret twill are used for fully three-quarters of the models that will be found in the shops when the spring fashion openings take place.

Of course there'll be homespun tweed—real Canadian homespuns—and wool jerseys, both of which are top-notch where sports suits are concerned, and their merits should be considered before purchasing a spring suit.

But the regulation tailored suit of navy blue tricotine, has never been more dignified, attractive or wearable than are those of this spring. One reason for this is that the materials and coloring are both so beautiful. The tricotines, in even the medium priced garments, are beautifully fine and the colors are so clear. Then the trimmings are more conservative and better chosen. Last year it was the fashion to cover a suit with bugle beads which was rather foolish and inappropriate; but this year, there is an abundance of black silk braid, narrow soutache braid, strappings of self material, black floss embroidery, sometimes touched up with French knots of white silk floss, or perhaps metal rings with braid or straps of the material drawn through them. There is also metal thread stitching, which, while not new, is used by some of the best houses this spring again. Except on novelty suits, the girdles are very narrow, not more than an inch wide; but on one or two novelties which one has found while browsing around the show-rooms where advance models are to be found, wide satin sashes were used, one of them having white on the reverse side of the ribbon and deep black silk fringe across the ends. The sleeves are wide from the elbow down.

Misses coats are cut in box style, some of them very full in the back, almost like a cape, and there are cape coats also. One of these was virtually a cape in the back with the sides buttoning to the sleeves and in some inexplicable way forming the top of them while the unders belonged to the coat front. This model was in beige color.

Returning to the misses, whom we left rather unceremoniously, they have mostly elected to have Peter Pan collars which fasten with a single button or two string ties made of the material and terminating in a couple of small balls also of the material. For the sake of variety, there is the short Tuxedo collar which is open all the way down the front or fastens at the waist with a single button.

* * *

STRAIGHT line coats with just the suspicion of a curve under the arm, are what will be shown for the rest of women-kind. They will measure about thirty four or thirty-six inches in length and have a mannish notched collar reaching to the waist where it will fasten with link buttons and the sleeves will be long with a slight flare over the hand. Some of the seams are open to the waist and the linings are as attractive as the outside. That is one of the things to which one's attention has been called repeatedly this spring—the linings. Some are plain and some are printed but usually, they are of a very nice quality.

Some of the novelty suits are not more than twenty-eight inches in length and have three-quarter kimono sleeves and so much does one hear about suit jackets with capes hanging from the shoulder that they can scarcely be called novelties. They are very swagger looking.

But one might write indefinitely of tailored tricotine and twill suits so interesting are they, were it not that tweeds must have some attention. All winter long, women in New York have been wearing what they call homespuns, but there are homespuns and homespuns. There are the beautiful cloths made on hand looms by the women of rural Quebec, for which the American tourist has been willing to pay almost any amount of money. Like prophets, these goods have not had as much honor in their own country as was accorded them elsewhere, but if indifference survives the showing of Canadian homespuns, which we shall see this spring, then we must surely be lacking in appreciation of truly beautiful things.

Our Canadian manufacturers are also entitled to a good deal of credit for the very clever homespuns they are turning out in their mills, and many of the spring sport suits will be made of them. They will be in such colors as orchid, olive, canna, Dutch blue and jade green. Lovat shades will be used extensively and one must not fail to give notice that white will be ultra fashionable in all suitable materials. There is something about a white suit that suggests peacefulness and repose of spirit; we never should have thought of wearing a white suit during the war, and one cannot help but be glad that they have come into fashion once again, for they are like the harbinger of happier days.

Everybody in fashion circles has been on the qui vive over the knickerbocker suit. A Toronto man made the prediction that by next summer, every smartly dressed woman under thirty would have one in her wardrobe and would wear it, not only when she went golfing, hiking etc., but that she would be wearing it down town as she attended to the everyday affairs of life. One is not so sure that they will be quite so generally worn. They would be fine for the knocking about in the woods next summer.

Possibly some of you may wonder what a knickerbocker suit is any way that it should work such a transformation in feminine ideals, to say nothing of clothes. Well, it is simply a tailored tweed or jersey suit coat with a pair of knickerbockers instead of, or as well as a skirt; and by the way, some of the suits which go with it are "wrapped" around the figure, and fastened on the side. Some of the knickerbockers are made to wear with a belt and others fit snugly around the waist with buttons down either side. They are loose at the knee and gathered into a band, or else tight like riding breeches and button over the knee on the outside of the leg. It goes without saying that one wears a tailored silk shirt with this suit.

Plain and heather jersey cloth will be worn in sports suits.

BUT suits aren't all there is to the out-of-door, spring costume. There are capes; capes that are to be so important that they should be spelled with capitals and treated to the utmost respect. They are to be the vogue for spring.

They are turned out in the loveliest of Normandie and other soft finished

"To the Last Man," by Zane Grey, is a tale of a feud which lives up to its title.

This writer has become famous for stories of the desert and of the far places where man is face to face with Nature and life becomes stern and simple. Life in the lonely places has its sordidness, even as the life of the slums has its own problems and, in this latest story, Zane Grey shows us how grimly hatred can work its will in a small community. It is a dramatic narrative, and, of course, it will soon be a screen tragedy (Published by Hodden and Stoughton, Toronto, Price, $2.00)

"Their Friendly Enemy," a story for Girls by Gardner Hunting, (published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price $2.00), is an entertaining account of how two young girls attempted to "run" a paper in a small town and of atmosphere and filled with hairbreadth escapes.

"Conn of the Coral Seas," is the alliterative title which Beatrice Grimshaw has chosen for her latest story of the far islands of the Pacific. It is a tale of many perils, with this super-Irishman, Conn, the hero, who is expected to surmount all difficulties and brave all dangers. He seems to enjoy all the discomforts of the cannibal-inhabited region, and, of course, a heroine by the name of Devidre finds her way to the remote spot and gives him the opportunity to "rescue" a lady in distress. This is a thoroughly entertaining romance, fairly dripping with pearls—which line the walls and carpet the floor of a thoroughly mysterious cave. The descriptive passages are Miss Grimshaw's most vivid how a capitalist in the community made it his object to use the paper against the public interest. It is a realistic tale of to-day and there is about as vivid a description of a fire in one chapter, as you would find.

"The Wednesday Wife," by Juliette Gordon Smith, (published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price $2.00) is an unusual and well-told story of a household in Algiers. The anxious reader may fear that it is a tract in favor of polygamy, but you find that, in the end, the hero asserts the superiority of the "one-wife" creed, and makes Altra, the "Wednesday Wife," his sole consort. This is the more conveniently accomplished, as the spouses of "Monday" and "Tuesday" have died of the plague. It is a book convincingly Oriental in and picturesque work. Yet, after considering the natives and the crime waves, one is inclined to prefer Canada to Meliassi. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, price, $1.75)

"The Moon Out of Reach," by Margaret Pedler (published by Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto, price $2.00) is a story which centres around a foolish and attractive heroine of the name of Nan Davenant, whose love affairs are unusually tangled in their course. There is an artist who is very much a cad, there is a primitive cave-man kind of lover called Roger and there is, of course, a married one—Peter, who forms the trio of Nan's admirers. Peter is the best of them, and in the most kindly fashion.

"Yes, this is a Paramount Night."

WHAT do you do about seeing all the great Paramount Pictures?

You know that you don't like to miss the really great photoplays, the real works of art on the screen, those that set a stimulating standard for all the rest!

Do you let it go at wishing?

Seize these pleasurable hours that Paramount prepares for you. Telephone your theatre. Put the question straight: "Is it a Paramount Picture?"

People everywhere are finding this is the thing to do. There never was a time when there were so few good pictures from other sources. Good productions seem to be scarce.

There are about 1000 theatres in Canada to be kept busy. They cannot all have a Paramount Picture every day. But when they have one, you ought to know it. You do not want to miss a good film.

You see how important it is to telephone first, or to verify by theatre's advertisements or lobby display. The answer tells immediately whether the picture is the work of that unique cluster of talent drawn together by Paramount's unusual facilities.

Act today. Your telephone tells the day and the hour and the location of all the thrilling shows! Use it to your own advantage!

YOU'LL wear it all spring and summer!

There's real economy in a spring suit which you may wear in coolness and comfort all summer long.

And such a suit is this one, fashioned of Skinner's

All-Silk Satin

One needs no high-priced tailor to make this little suit. A dressmaker, or the clever needlewoman herself, may fashion it at home from a simple suit pattern. If you choose a three-piece suit pattern, you have both frock and suit at a surprisingly low cost.

The trimming is of soutache braid, designs for which may be easily obtained in any art needlework department. Your collar may be the youthful Peter Pan or if worn with fur neckpiece the collarless suit is good.

Skinner quality insures you more than one season's wear, too! There are 108 shades of Skinner's All-Silk Satin to choose from, and you may secure contrast by braiding it in another color.

"Look for the Name in the Selvage"

None genuine without it

If unable to buy Skinner's Silks and Satins in your community, write to us and we will see that you are supplied. Please mention the name of your local Dry Goods store.

"LOOK FOR THE NAME IN THE SELVAGE"

SPRING MILLINERY

BY C. M. STOREY

THE millinery buyers have been to Paris and home again. If there is one thing in particular for which we do not seem to be able to get along without Paris, it is inspiration for our headwear. The millinery buyers were the first to resume their Transatlantic buying expeditions, and many of them have been making regular trips ever since. There is something distinctive about French millinery, and it is not only the models they bring back with them, but also the inspiration they get in hat Mecca of Fashion, which makes the journey so worth while.

Spring hats are both large and small—trig little tailored hats to wear with the Spring suit, and larger ones with all kinds of curves and quavers in the brim, and a generous crown that fits quite closely over the head.

Nearly every wholesale and retail house that one visited showed a different type of small hat, which, of course, is something upon which we may congratulate ourselves, for we shall find plenty of variety in the millinery parlours when we start out on the important question of buying a spring hat.

In the first place do not be surprised if you find very few straw braid hats. There will be straw a-plenty, but it will

There are tricorues and bicorues in all their variations, and a few small pokes. One of the hall marks of the season's hat is the short back. Usually the back brim is about half the width be in the form of straw cloth—a fabric woven out of fine flexible straw, which lends itself to drapery or a smooth covering for a buckram shape. Then there is cellophane cloth and the genuine old-fashioned hair cloth, some of it almost as heavy as that which covered the old-fashioned sofa in the old-fashioned parlour of childhood days; also lighter weights, some of which are quite transparent. One also finds straw braids, used mostly on these early models as a trimming. Some are narrow like a cord and others half an inch wide with a gold or silver edging. These metal edges are to be very fashionable and are found on many of the narrow millinery ribbons. One model for which this is used was made of a copper-colored baronet satin in a boat shape with a coronet across the front, one-half of the coronet being covered with strips of the braid over-lapping each other showing the gold edge, and a large rosette of the braid over the left ear. Cellophane braids come in these narrow widths and are especially pleasing when combined with transparent crowns of tulle.

Many of the small hats have narrow, visor-like brims in the front which give a softer and more becoming line than where the hat rolls directly off the face. Some milliners have aimed at getting the same effect, with the pointed front, which comes out a little over the face, and then turns up sharply of the front and to get this effect a milliner will sometimes lay a pleat or two across the back of the brim and then tack a velvet bow on as if the pleats were there to support the bow, and incidentally, one has seen a wide front brim pleated in somewhat the same way to get the broad effect which characterizes so many of the medium and larger sized hats.

Most of the models shown so far are composed of one or the other of the materials named, but now and then one finds a Milan or picot straw used in the crown and straw cloth or mohair in the brim.

But if there is variety and novelty in shape and fabric there is even more in the trimming. There are feathers and flowers, and sea-shells and matches, and Chinese characters which may mean anything from long life and happiness to a laundry ticket; there are ivory cabochons and jet girdles, also crystals and rhinestones, each very decorative in its place

Milan straw with bead and silk embroidery

Perhaps the newest and most fashionable trimming that we see on the dressy hats will be what is known as bioux feathers. These are the plumage of the Chinese duck, given a slight cure treatment. While they feel crisp and papery to the hand, they are really very

It was the Cobweb Fairies of Old England who furnished the secret of the perfect fabric "DIAPHALENE." The clever little sprites, skilled in lacy cobwebs, cunningly combined the lustre of silk, the sheerness of nainsook, the firm texture of linen and the clinging softness of lace into this veritable dream-cloth. And because the fairies knew that HORROCKSES' name stamped on the selvage would mean that it was a super-quality in cotton fabrics, they allowed all "DIAPHALENE" to be so stamped.

his wife:—but we must not spoil the story. It is comforting to know that the writer does not resort to the sordid device of divorce to make the dreams come true.

"One," by Sarah Warder MacConnell, is a novel which deals with the struggles of a wife who desires to "retain" the affections of a husband who is given to philandering. Alethea is really very patient with her tiresome husband, Frederick Haviland, about whose charm we are told continually, but whose manliness is not in evidence. The book, indeed, is so utterly neurotic that the reader would like all the windows open after perusing the last chapter. Frederick's affections do not appear to be worth "retaining" and Alethea, herself, is too emotional to be anything but a bore. One longs for a good, old-fashioned tale with a hero and a heroine who "lived happy ever after," rather than this dirty and dismal story. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto, $1.75).

"The Hidden Places," by Bertrand W. Sinclair, (published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto, price, $2.00) is a story of war's aftermath which tells of the suffering of Hollister, a man whose face had become so torn and twisted through injuries received in the war that he was repulsive to the sight, although he was, in no way, crippled in strength. He had been declared officially dead and his wife had married again. He finds a refuge in the wilds of British Columbia, where the beauty of Nature went far toward restoring the shattered nerves of the hero. Myra, his former wife, appears on the scene and another and finer woman, Doris Cleveland, comes into the story and, through her physical blindness, becomes a comfort to the man who is in such great need of sympathy. It is a story of physical and spiritual conflict, with the hope of better things at the end.

Clean Your Rugs Clean at Home

Save yourself the cost and inconvenience of having your rugs taken up and cleaned twice a year. Don't let them remain dirty between times. Get a Hoover and enjoy the year around pride of ever-clean rugs.

Dirt gets into your rugs every day. Much of it sifts in deeply to cling and stay, immune to hand-sweeping. Rapidly it accumulates. Germs swarm in it.

Shoes press the soft rug nap upon this dirt, largely sharp grit. The nap is thus ground off. Your rugs grow threadbare.

The Hoover electrically beats out all such germ-laden, nap-destroying dirt from rug depths. By thus safeguarding health and preserving your rugs from wear, over and over it pays for itself.

In addition, The Hoover electrically sweeps up stubbornest litter, erects crushed nap, freshens colors and cleans by air—in one rapid, dustless operation.

Paint and Varnish

Little flies came and webbed themselves in upon the sticky surface. Mosquitoes sang and danced upon my more-or-less sunburned neck, and when I smote at them with my yellow-daubed fingers, I often missed them, but always got in a blow somewhere. One large patriarchal old fellow with a stinger like a garden hose, came and posed on my left wrist, until I made a swipe at him with my right hand, forgetting to lay down the brush, first. That's how the yellow floor paint got on my shoes, and skirt, and on the grass, and on the flowering currant bush. But sure, that's the life of the paint industry, so why should any one complain—except that the mosquito escaped, and afterwards wounded me severely on the ankle?

The five chairs took some time. They each had four legs to do, inside and out, and six or eight rungs. It is hard to make the paint stay on these miserable little surfaces, and if I keep on at this sort of thing I'm going to have a permanent scowl from looking so closely at them. Then the backs have a lot of wiggly little spindles in them, and there comes a time when the whole chair is painted and there isn't a blessed handhold on the thing to let a person move it by. I put my hand on the under side of the seat, and endeavored to carry them out into the middle of the lawn, so that they could dry in the sun, and still be out of my way.

Two went over to their destination, as pleasantly as you please, but the third dropped against me like the fainting heroine in a melodrama. And I knew a word to say, but I did not say it.

Of course, about this time, I thought of the chair in the pantry, and the chair on the verandah and the chairs in the bedrooms. They had to have their dose too. My enthusiasm was waning, but who would quit, for weariness, when it is only a question of painting chairs? So I kept on, going strong, until it came time to get supper.

That was yesterday. Today, with a darning needle, I picked out the embalmed flies, and the bristles from the brush, which had taken lodgings in the paint. Then, with the very same brush, I went at the varnishing. Of course the brush had been cleaned of paint in the meantime, washed, and dried. I cannot see that it is a bit better than the old brush, only that it has more bristles to come out.

Varnishing is most satisfying work. It covers up the little flaws in the paint, and gives an aristocratic, worldly-wise air to even the plebeian yellow paint. And it is easy. The varnish stain goes on with little whirls and flurries, and follows the track of the brush in delicate frost-like patterns.

Now, my chairs—Ah, if the man who shaped out the quaint rungs and spindles half a century ago, could only have looked ahead to see what those chairs would have come to! If he could only have known that telephones, and tractors, and automobiles, and electric light plants and airplanes would be every day affairs to them! He had no thought of the rural free delivery of mail six days in the week the year round!

He made the chairs for a low log house—it is standing yet. The great square timbers of it are still solid, and the old-fashioned fire-places have seen the time when they became unadmired in the changing styles—but once again are opened up and used. In fact, I believe the new owner of the house boasts about them to his city friends. Two fire-places, beams in the ceilings (say nothing about the white wash conscientiously applied to them by the original dweller in the house,) and oak floors!

Meanwhile, thank the stars the chairs are finished, and with them the spring house cleaning ends. Now on with the campaign! I must save up and buy more paint, for the handsome chairs are making the bed rooms look shabby, and I see that both the front hall and the back hall (and the stairs of course,) need more than a passing glance—and the whole outside wood work of the house begs for new covering!

Or if preferred, fine silk cord may cover the design couched down with metal thread.

9899—Misses' Overblouse. Designed for 14 to 20 years. No. 9904—Misses' Two-piece Skirt. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard. The costume in size 16 requires $2\frac{3}{8}$ yards 40-inch Canton crêpe for overblouse— $1\frac{3}{8}$ yard 54-inch Poirer twill for skirt. Distinctly smart for all sorts of sports wear are these silken overblouses worn with plain tailored skirts. Added smartness is given by the novel embroidery, in design 12596, which forms a deep border on the blouse and covers the sleeves from the elbow to the lower edge. Silk floss in shades of dull Egyptian red, bright blue and yellow may be used effectively with a touch of black to give tone.

9913—Misses' Jumper Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard. Size 16 requires $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards 40-inch crêpe de Chine for skirt and jumper—1 yard 40-inch Georgette crêpe for blouse— $\frac{5}{8}$ yard 36-inch satin for binding. Charmingly youthful in its line is this frock of crêpe de Chine and Georgette. The jumper forming a bodice effect is worn over the skirt and cut down low in front. The skirt forms a panel effect front and back while the sides are trimmed with bands bound with contrasting satin.

— $1\frac{5}{8}$ yard 36-inch satin. Paris sends us many frocks that combine as this does two silken materials and among the favorite combinations foulard and satin hold a prominent place. The dress slips on over the head, and the neck, in the smart bateau outline, may be finished with a cording of satin or foulard.

9911—Ladies' and Misses' Dress. Designed for 16 to 20 years for misses, and 34 to 44 bust for ladies. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard. Size 16 requires $2\frac{3}{4}$ yards 32-inch dotted swiss— $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard 40-inch organdy. There is a delightfully youthful air to this frock that adapts it to the needs of the young girl.

9900—Misses' Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{3}{8}$ yard. Size 16 requires $2\frac{1}{8}$ yards 40-inch beige Canton crêpe for blouse— $2\frac{1}{8}$ yards Malay brown Canton crêpe for skirt and cuffs. A separate slip-on blouse with wide sleeves set into large armholes is combined with a two-piece gathered skirt to form this good-looking frock. The blouse is elaborately embroidered in design 12667 to be carried out in single stitch embroidery in contrasting color floss. The embroidery forms a border on the blouse and above the cuffs.

9901—Ladies' and Misses' One-piece Dress. Designed for 16 to 20 years for misses, and 34 to 44 bust for ladies. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{5}{8}$ yard. Size 16 requires $2\frac{1}{2}$ yards 54-inch tricotine for dress— $2\frac{5}{8}$ yards 36-inch dotted foulard for blouse.

New Spring Styles Show the Charm of Variety

9851—Ladies' Long-waisted Basque. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. No. 9849—Ladies' Four-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 24 to 34 waist. Width at lower edge about 3 yards. The costume in medium size requires $5\frac{3}{4}$ yards 36-inch taffeta— $\frac{3}{8}$ yard 40-inch Georgette crêpe for yoke and cuffs— $\frac{7}{8}$ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The snugly-fitted basque, which closes on the left shoulder and under the left arm, is gathered at the underarm seams and has short one-piece sleeves that are adjusted in the armholes of a front-closing underbody. Another attractive feature of this costume is the round inset trimming-pieces to which the side gores of the skirt are gathered. Embroidery, in design 12601, trims the skirt and also the lower edge of the basque. It may be carried out in running, outline, or chain stitch with silk floss, embroidery wool, or metallic thread. Beading could also be substituted using steel, jet, or iridescent bugles.

9535—Ladies' and Misses' Dress. Designed for 34 to 44 bust, and 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{5}{8}$ yard. Size 36 requires $3\frac{5}{8}$ yards 40-inch Roshanara crêpe— $\frac{1}{2}$ yard 40-inch red Roshanara crêpe for collar and trimming. The only note of trimming on this simple one-piece dress is the chain-stitch embroidery, design 12668, which is applied to each side below the sash. It may be developed in rope silk or filo.

9864—Girls' One-piece Dress. Designed for 6 to 14 years. Size 8 requires $1\frac{7}{8}$ yard 36-inch China silk for underdress— $1\frac{7}{8}$ yard 36-inch pongee. The overdress has inset yokes which extend over the shoulders, and the lower edge of the dress is cut in pointed outline which forms an uneven hem-line.

9927—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard. Size 36 requires $4\frac{1}{4}$ yards 36-inch dotted foulard—2 yards 40-inch Canton crêpe for sleeves and side sections— $\frac{7}{8}$ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. The fashionable uneven hem-line is achieved in this frock by dropping pointed side panels below the skirt. The flowing sleeves and the side sections are attached to a front-closing underbody.

9763—Ladies' and Misses' One-piece Slip-on Dress. Designed for 34 to 44 bust and 16 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{5}{8}$ yard. Size 36 requires $3\frac{1}{4}$ yards 40-inch Moroccan crêpe— $\frac{5}{8}$ yard 40-inch Georgette crêpe for sleeves—

6 yards ribbon. The sleeves of this smart little frock are gathered to straight wristbands which are finished with bows and ends of ribbon. An allover effect is given to the upper part of the dress by embroidery, in design 12612, which may be worked in silk floss, embroidery wool, or metallic thread in running stitch.

cloths for which there are a legion of names; also in tricotines, Poiret twills, serges, Jersey cloths and homespun. There will also be capes made of the same materials as the dresses, Canton crepes, for instance, but they belong to the summer costume, rather than to that of the spring.

It doesn't matter much whether your cape is long or short, it will be in the fashion any way, and like the bottom of the skirts, the bottom of the cape is quite likely to be uneven. There is a trig, tight collar to which some one has tasked the jaunty name of Johnnie. This buttons right up to the neck, but may be left open if one desires, without spoiling the effect. But, mostly, the collars are large, some of them being gathered or pleated in the back and some are pleated all the way around and stand up around the neck like a picket fence. A few are cut square across the back with shawl fronts. There is really a great deal of variety in detail of both capes and coats this spring.

For convenience, there is a slash in either side for the arms and these slashes are sometimes finished with a cuff which is wider at the bottom than at the top, and if there is embroidery on the garment, it is very likely to be found around this slash. Many of these capes are braid trimmed and there is more diversity of color in the capes than in the suits, for while many of the capes are in blue tricotine, some are in pretty sand and grey shades, while most of the soft finished cloths, are shown in the beige, reindeer, taupe and earthy browns.

If one prefers a coat to a cape, there is a splendid variety to fall back upon. The cloths used are about the same as for the capes, the backs hang straight or have quite a generous sweep, the sleeves are as prodigal as the day is long and many of them have the trimming concentrated on the sleeves, the fronts are plain and are fastened with buttons sewn on in groups, as for instance, two at the neck and two more at the waist.

Sports coats, thirty-six inches long, made of polo cloth, tweed or fancy velours will also be there for your choosing—swagger looking garments with raglan sleeves, a mannish collar and large military pockets and buttons.

Then, there is the utility coat. Who has not possessed one of those English-looking man-tailored utility coats, does not know what she has missed. They have the irresistible virtue of never going out of fashion and rarely ever wearing out. But we no longer sing the exclusive praise of the English-made coat, worthy as it is, for there are many Canadian makes which are equally desirable. They are made of English and Canadian tweeds in beautiful soft textures and color mixtures, excellently tailored and faultless as to style. Also, there are English gabardines, rain proof, but without any rubber in them, which one does not hesitate to recommend to this discriminating woman.

Spring Millinery

pretty dripping over the brim of a hat, and are used in any quantity from a small mount or pin-wheel to a bandeau half way round the brim. The sea shells are among the most talked-about trimmings that one will see this year and come in many shapes and sizes from the little flat fluted ones to rather large snail shells. High coronets are completely covered with them and sometimes they are grouped together on the crown.

There are also a great many hat pins with ornamental heads used as a trimming rather than a utility. They are different from the hat pins we have been accustomed to. One of the new styles is of clear cut crystal and a great many have brilliants used in colored galalith.

Sometimes two hat pins alike in all but color are stuck at opposite angles on the front of the hat, as for instance, a model with a purplish crown and a brim covered with rows of blue and purple shot ribbon on which there are blue and purple pins. This was a Lewis model brought over from Paris for the opening, and because it came from so famous a maker, the use of different colored pins is important.

One of the smartest models among the more youthful styles was an exception to the rule, and made of navy picot straw entirely. The crown was dome-shaped and the brim up-rolling like a saucer, but very short across the back, and the only trimming, a bow of wide navy grosgrain ribbon with ends but no loops, and a band of the ribbon on the under-brim.

A pretty brown horse-hair model had a quill and ornament carved out of brown ivory, or possibly an imitation of ivory. An interesting brown Georgette poke had as its only decoration an uncurled short ostrich plume drawn through the crown at the back with the end of the plume hanging under the brim. A transparent horsehair in a rich walnut shade had the brim shirred over a tubular cord and a brown velvet ribbon bow on the back. The brim was rather wide and flat and the effect extremely pleasing.

The dressy hats are abnormally large and the side trimmings accentuated. Rumor has it that lighter colors are to be worn this spring, but nearly all the important models are in black, brown or navy blue. The large hats especially come in black, and the trimming is usually on the brim often over-hanging it, especially if it be ribbon or feathers. One of the large French models was of the heavy satin with a pattern embossed on it and a cire finish. This had an extremely wide brim and was worn slightly tilted instead of straight.

A little later there will be flowers. And such flowers! There will be "roses and lilies and daffy-down-dillies" and fruits of all kinds. Buyers returning from Paris say they have never before seen such flowers. The roses are large and crusty and the wild flowers as natural as if freshly plucked from the fields; also wheat, dyed to match the color of the hat and luscious looking fruits.

In the lighter shades one sees all the bright yellows, especially tiger lily, beige which is combined with navy, there is some grey, a great deal of white with black and periwinkle blue. Canna is the new red.

"and then—he kissed me!"

"The month's bills had been pretty high, business wasn't any too good and Bob was worried. So when he came home one night and found a beautiful new rug in the living room, he naturally was a bit cross.

"I admit we needed a rug badly but we couldn't afford it for months—particularly a beauty like this."

"But, Bob dear," I hastened to explain, "it cost only $9.00."

"For a minute he just stared. And then—he kissed me!"

You will be as amazed as this young husband at the economy of Congoleum Gold-Seal Art-Rugs. Though they reproduce the warm colorings and rich patterns of expensive fabric rugs they cost only a fraction as much.

And they are such a help to housewives in the matter of cleaning. Just a light mopping leaves the smooth, waterproof surface spotless. Compare these few seconds with the tiresome labor of beating woven rugs!

Another advantage—a Congoleum Rug never curls up or wrinkles annoyingly around chair legs. It lies perfectly flat on the floor without fastening of any kind.

Whipped Cream Cocoanut Cake

4 oz. butter, rind of one-half orange (grated), 3 eggs; 1 small cup milk; 1 large cup flour, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup cornstarch; 3 level teaspoons Magic Baking Powder, flavorings (vanilla and rose); $\frac{3}{4}$ pint cream; 1 small fresh cocoanut (grated), 1 cup sugar

Cream butter, adding grated rind of orange, then the sugar, working well in, then the well beaten yolks of eggs, and milk. Sift together the flour, baking powder and cornstarch and stir in gradually, then the well beaten whites of eggs, and lastly one teaspoon each of vanilla and rose flavorings. Bake in well buttered jelly tins in quick oven. When baked turn out and allow to cool.

Whip cream stiff, adding three tablespoons confectioner's sugar and one-half teaspoon each vanilla and rose flavoring.

Cover top and side of each layer with the whipped cream and sprinkle over the grated cocoanut. If unable to obtain fresh cocoanut use Baker's canned cocoanut.

There is a curious legend of ancient Greece in which we read that Psyche was assigned the difficult mission of descending to Hades to bring away a fragment of beauty in a box for the gods to sample and lo! when the lid was lifted, there issued—a vapor.

BEAUTY has ever been as elusive, as mysterious, as intangible as the legendary vapor. And mysterious it must remain. Through the ages, men's goddesses have been veiled, and the woman who would be the true artist of herself must know that piquancy is in concealment, not exposure.

THE Mohammedans have a saying that "To Eve, God gave two-thirds of all beauty," and beauty is the birth-right of every woman. But through the multiplicity of the ages we have departed somewhat from the ideal in the Garden of Eden, and if we place our mirrors in a good light and look at ourselves as critically as we look at another woman—we see the truth.

EVEN if we have that loveliest and most desirable and quite the most undependable thing in the world—Youth—it is seldom that our bodies are slim in just the right places. And the wisp of a corset that will coax away the tiny imperfections of youth without detracting one bit from our precious comfort, will save us, a few years hence, from the injustice of looking older than we are.

AGE is a treacherous and resourceful antagonist and when cold cream and massage dispel the evidences of advancing years from well-cared-for hands and face, age seeks revenge by a tell-tale padding of the hips and thighs. If we foolishly have attempted to keep, with exaggerated corsetry, a disproportionately small waistline at the expense of this other more important dimension, or have permitted our figures to unbecomingly sag through lack of proper support, we have put our birthdays where anyone can count them.

BUT just because you must wear corsets, there is no reason why other people should know that you do. This matter of designing for type is the whole secret. The Type Corsetry that Gossard artistry has created conceals itself from the appraising eye of your best enemy. Every type of figure has been individually studied and treated as a special problem, and the Gossards designed for your needs will coax, restrain, supplement—easily, gently, naturally, and bring you by hidden ways to the very most of which your figure is capable. Because they will not attempt to change you radically or make you conform to some fleeting style tendency not inherently becoming to you, you will never have that "tied-in, pinched-together look," that "corseted look," that is just as fatally ageing as its sagging uncorseted reverse.

WHY go on buying just "a corset," when at any of the best stores and specialty shops, a skilful corsetière will unfailingly select for you a Gossard that will make you look so much better and feel so much better, and be forever sure you are not missing something in the mirror that your friends see when you are looking the other way? The cost of Gossards is well within the price you would expect to pay for such superior artistry and workmanship, and they offer an unequalled value in wearing service that makes their purchase a true economy.

"THE Gift of Eve." So we have named a tiny book that is just off our press. It is not pretentious but it will be cherished by every woman who appreciates the importance of that quiet distinction that ever marks the woman of good taste. To you we shall be glad to send it, if you will trouble to write your request to our home offices at 363 W. Adelaide St., Toronto, Canada.

Gossard Brassières

EVEN if you are quite naturally "trim," a certain, sophisticated restraint above the low top corset is still the part of wisdom.

GOSSARD Brassières, like Gossard Corsets, are made for types; materials and shaping conform unerringly to individual needs. They are made for those women with a true perception of beauty and an appreciation of that faultless detail that is the certain stamp of superior quality. Their unusual wearing service alone will amply justify their nominal cost.

The LETTERS of a YOUNG BRIDE

May 10.

Dear Eleanor:

We have just returned from Bermuda! And to you, my dear, I am writing my first letter as Mrs. William T. Carleton. Bermuda! What a fairyland of dreams! I shall never forget it. The deep, crystal water—the age-old sea—the quaint little shops—the white-roofed houses. And best of all, the soft, silvery nights and the big silvery moon.

Billy and I are very, very happy. Sometimes I have to pinch myself to see if I am awake. Life is so different.

Can't you come to see us some time soon? Our apartment isn't very large, but I know we could find room for you somewhere. And I have so many things I want to tell you.

June 15.

Dear Eleanor:

Sorry to hear that you are so busy with your sewing that you can't come now. I can't imagine gay Eleanor at the sewing machine making her own clothes. Fortunately, I don't need a new thing this summer. You know father gave me the money for my trousseau, and it was wonderfully complete.

Anyway, it's lucky I don't need any new clothes—we've had to get so many things for the apartment. Billy said last night it seems as though we'll never get through buying the things we just have to have. He thought the firm would raise his salary when we were married—but they didn't and I know he's worried a little. He's such a dear. Come when you can.

September 27.

Dear Eleanor:

Such a week! Tuesday, Billy's mother called me up and invited me to come over to a tea she was giving Thursday afternoon. I knew who would be there and I simply had to have something new. So I got right on the car and went down to Blaine's. Eleanor, do you know what they asked for a half-way pretty afternoon dress? Sixty-five dollars! I went to four other shops and the lowest price I found for anything that I could wear was $49.50. Well, I didn't have that much to spend on a dress and I didn't have the heart to ask Billy for it, so on Thursday I put on that henna tricotelette I had a year ago.

But, Eleanor, when I got there and found all the other women with smart new fall clothes, I felt positively ashamed of my appearance. It seemed as though my dress had "last year" written all over it. No one said anything, of course, but some things are understood. I came home and just lay down and cried.

I finally decided to ask Billy for $25 extra, figuring that I could save the rest out of the house allowance. But when he came home he looked worried himself. He wouldn't tell me at first what the trouble was, but after supper he came up and put his arm around me and said, "Honey, do you think that you could cut corners a little next month? My life insurance comes due the 20th and it's going to be just a bit hard to meet it." Well, you can imagine how my own plans vanished when he said that. What am I going to do, Eleanor? I've simply got to have a few new things. What can I do?

October 5.

Dear Eleanor:

I guess I've read your letter twenty times. When I think of all the pretty new clothes you have, I fear I'm just a bit envious. But to think you've made them all yourself! And you believe I could do the same? Oh, wouldn't it be too wonderful if I could! And you say you learned at home? Why, I always thought one must put in years in a shop or go away somewhere to school to really become a dressmaker. But I shall know all about the plan you suggest in a few days, for I have written the Woman's Institute. Yes, I had heard about the Institute, but I never thought of it as meaning anything to me. Thanks so much for telling me. If 140,000 other women and girls can learn so easily at home, I am sure I can learn, too.

December 10.

Dear Eleanor:

Oh, yes, I know I've neglected you, but truly I didn't realize it had been two months since I wrote you last. But they've been such wonderful months. You see, I heard from the Institute just a couple of days after my last letter, and when I saw that here was exactly the thing I needed, I put in my membership and took up the Dressmaking Course at once. And within a week I was busy with my first lesson. Eleanor, I never found anything so fascinating in my life. One just can't help learning. And when I realized what it was going to mean to me I could hardly lay the lessons down.

At first I wasn't going to tell Billy, but how could I keep such news from him? And he was so interested. He said he thought it was a fine thing to have something so enjoyable to do afternoons. After all, why shouldn't a woman learn dressmaking, just like a man studies law or medicine—or business? Well, after the third lesson, I made the loveliest blouse. Billy says it's the prettiest I ever had, and think, it cost just $1.65 and really I couldn't duplicate it down town for less than $5.00. Besides, I've made two apron dresses, a camisole, the dearest negligee, and a plaited skirt, and now I'm at work on my first nice dress. I can hardly wait till it's finished.

December 16.

Dear Eleanor:

Oh, I must tell you. I wore the new dress to a party this afternoon and everyone said it was the most becoming thing I ever had. The girls insisted on knowing where I got it, and when I told them I made it myself they were simply amazed. Marion Holt wants me to make a dress for her. Imagine! "Madame Louise, Modiste!" I wonder if I could?

March 11.

Dear Eleanor:

My, but I've been busy. But let me go back to the beginning. The very day after the party Marion came over. Said she was really serious about wanting me to make her a dress, so I said all right, I would. You see, she never seemed able to find anything in the stores that was really suited to her type. But I saw just what she needed. One of the most important things I have learned from the Institute is the designing of dresses that are really becoming. You know—just the right lines, the right material, the right fabric and shade, and just the right touch of color and the right finish to make it distinctive. Well, I never enjoyed anything so much as planning and making that dress for Marion—and it was a beauty, if I do say it. Marion was so delighted she insisted on paying me $20 for making it and said she wanted me to make all her clothes in the future.

Well, that was the beginning of my venture. Others came and wanted me to make clothes for them, and the result is that every hour I have been able to spare from my own work the last three months has been taken up designing and making things for folks here in town. I've finished half my course with the Institute, I have more pretty clothes of my own than I ever expected to own in one season, and best of all, a bank account that's growing every day!

Dear Eleanor:

June 21.

It seems I always have good news to tell you these days. And this time it's best of all. Two weeks ago we bought the dearest little house out here in Maplewood and now we're all settled. When Billy first heard about the house he came rushing home one night, half in joy, half in despair. It was a wonderful bargain, but he had to pay a thousand dollars down.

"I've saved $600 since the first of the year," he said (you know he got a raise in January), "but where can we get the rest?" Well, I fairly flew up to my room, and down the stairs I rushed with my own bank book. Of course, Billy knew I had made some money sewing, but when I showed him a balance of $572, he just rubbed his eyes and stared. But I sat down then and there and wrote a check for $400 and put it in his hand. And—well—I couldn't get my breath for a minute—Billy was holding me so tight! And two big tears stood in his eyes. "Louise, dear," he said, "you're the greatest little woman in the world!"

So we're here in our own home, Eleanor. Tonight after supper we sat out on the porch—just quiet and happy—and the moon came up big and round and silvery and just seemed to smile its blessing. "It seems to me," Billy said, "I've seen that moon before—I think it was somewhere in Bermuda." "Yes, Billy dear," I said, "it's our honey moon. It's going to shine on us forever."

P. S. You really must come to see us now, Eleanor. There's a little room waiting for you, for I want to entertain—quite in state, if you please—the one who showed me the way to happiness.

WOULDN'T you, too, like to have prettier, more becoming clothes for yourself and your family for less than half what they now cost you? Wouldn't you like to have two or three times as many pretty dresses at no increased expense?

You can have them, for through the Woman's Institute of Domestic Arts and Sciences you can learn easily and quickly, right in your own home, to make them yourself at merely the cost of materials. You can save at least $25 on a suit priced at $40 in the stores, for every item of material it contains would cost not more than $15. On a dress retailing at $20, you can save $12 or $14. Even on a blouse or a child's frock, or a little boy's suit costing $5, it is easily possible to save $2.50 to $3 by buying the materials and making it yourself.

Are such savings as these worth while? What would it mean to you to be able to save half or two-thirds of what you spend for clothes each season? Think of the other comforts or little luxuries you could enjoy or the money you could put away.

There is not the slightest doubt about your ability to learn. More than 140,000 women and girls, in city, town and country, have proved by the clothes they have made and by the dollars they have saved and earned, the success of the Institute's methods.

"I have more pretty dresses than I ever had in my life," writes one young mother. "Just think, six new dresses and two hats, and last season I really shed tears for want of a decent dress."

Another mother, when she had half completed her course, made her daughter's complete trousseau. Altogether it would have cost $650 in the stores, but the materials came to just $189.15. "So you see," she writes, "I made the magnificent saving of $460.85."

It makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail, and it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day, or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or as little time to the course as you desire and just when it is convenient.

Besides learning how to make every kind of garment at a saving of half or more, you learn the all-important secrets of distinctive dress—what colors and fabrics are most appropriate to different types of women; how to adapt garments you see in the shop windows, on the street or in fashion magazines; how to design, plan and create original effects, etc.

The Institute's courses are so complete that hundreds of students, with absolutely no other preparation, have opened up shops of their own, and enjoy large incomes and independence as professional dressmakers or milliners.

Remember that every claim made by the Woman's Institute is borne out by its six years of experience in successfully teaching dressmaking, millinery and cookery in the home. The Institute is now the largest woman's school in the world. Its growth has been made possible only because it has rendered a service worth many times its small cost to every student.

Effectively Decorative Designs for Clever Needlework

12095—Embroidery or Beading Border

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12095, blue or yellow, supplies 3 yards of 1 1/4-inch border, 20 cents (1/-). This is a very decorative design for trimming children's garments, in colored embroidery, beads or wool in outline and

12425—The Use of Braid is Sponsored by the Mode

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12425, blue or yellow, 75 cents (3/6), supplies 3 yards of braiding border 14 inches deep and a yoke design to match. The yoke motif requires 6 3/4 yards of braid; one yard of border requires 22 yards.

12572—A Dainty Motif for Beads or Embroidery

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12572, blue or yellow, 25 cents (1/3), supplies four motifs 7 by 7 1/2 inches and six motifs 4 3/4 by 6 inches, also 3 1/2 yards of beading or darning-stitch border. The smaller motif is best applied to blouses while the larger one may trim the skirt.

The Pictorial Review Company's Crocheting Directions No. 254 A-B-C-D, 20 cents (1/-). The filet camisole yoke No. 254 D is unusual in design, and its simplicity makes it very appealing. It is made of No. 40 crochet cotton with a No. 10 crochet hook.

The Pictorial Review Company's Crocheting Directions No. 253 A-B, 15 cents (9d.). The scarf end No. 253-A shown in the center boasts a triangle of filet crochet work in a graceful basket design, the flowers and leaves and handle conforming harmoniously to the three-cornered shape of this attractive and dainty motif.

An attractive set of breakfast linens is No. 253-B. Hemstitching and filet crochet combine to give it a lightness of effect and a charm that is very unusual. The filet is made with No. 100 crochet cotton and a No. 14 crochet hook.

No. 254 A—A Filet Crochet Yoke in Pointed Effect

THIS yoke, which may be used for a camisole or nightgown, is made of No. 40 crochet cotton with a No. 10 crochet hook. Ribbon straps or crochet bands may be added. The filet yoke below is in basket and lattice design with crocheted straps. Both of these designs are excellent combined with crêpe de Chine for lingerie sets.

No. 254 B—Of Pretty Design is the Filet Yoke Above

No. 254 C—Another Yoke in Pointed Style

The lattice effect which is so extremely smart in the world of lingerie just now is part of the yoke design No. 254 C. The lattice squares alternate with an urn motif. Shoulder straps of ribbon or crochet bands may be added, or for evening wear elastic may be run through the top.

No. 254 D—Square-patterned Yoke

No. 253 A—Attractive Basket Design

Filet Crochet Motif for Scarf End

No. 253 B—Breakfast Linens of Charm

11347—An Excellent One-inch Border

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 11347, blue or yellow, 20 cents (1/-), supplies 4 yards of 1-inch border. For braiding one yard of border, 5 1/2 yards are required. Such a design would be correct on a frock or blouse, and is equally attractive in beads or French knots. Wooden beads, gaily painted, steel and crystal and glass, and colored sealing wax are some of the newer ideas in such decorative borders, adding the note of color and light that the mode demands.

12557—A Combination Bead and Embroidery Border

12614—A Morning-Glory Motif

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12614, blue or yellow, 25 cents (1/3), supplies 4 different embroidery motifs with one duplicate of each. These designs may be worked in darning or outline stitch in silk, cotton, chenille, wool embroidery or metallic threads. The circle motif could be covered easily with flat braid.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12557, blue or yellow, 75 cents (3/6), supplies 4 yards of 1 1/2-inch beading and embroidery border. The cross-lines may be beaded or outlined in rope silk. The apparent simplicity which is the chief charm of this design belies its actual elaboration. The beauty of the result, however, well repays the effort spent upon it.

AN increased interest in embroidery as a decorative note in trimming is to be observed on many of the smartest models now being shown. Highly colored silks, and with metallic threads and steel beads much in evidence, such needlework is the ideal medium for giving the needed brilliancy to every article of milady's outer apparel. The gulle is a favorite place for the introduction of this kind of adornment, and next in favor is the border on wide sleeve or skirt.

Pompeian Night Cream

The Cold Cream for Beauty

Why Is He Fascinated?

Such bewitching loveliness, such glorious beauty—no wonder he is fascinated. The rich, youthful color of her radiant skin but emphasizes the tenderness her eyes betray. You, too, should learn her secret of girlish charm and lasting beauty.

Every night before retiring she uses Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty). It brings while she sleeps the beauty of a soft, youthful skin.

Just try this simple treatment every night before retiring: First, coat your face thickly with Pompeian NIGHT Cream, patting it gently into the pores. Then, with a soft cloth remove the surplus cream, which will bring with it all the day's dust and grit.

Next, wring out a cloth or towel in warm water and lay it on the face. Pat it gently—do not rub. Now, rinse the face in cool—not cold—water. Dry without rubbing.

Then, again apply Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty), and leave it on the skin to "youthify" you through the night. It brings beauty while you sleep.

Pompeian NIGHT Cream is for sale at all druggists at 50c and $1.00 a jar.

69 USES—HEAD TO FOOT—CELLAR TO ATTIC

Cross-Stitch Embroidery

BY MARY W. STRICKLAND

IT is a matter of conjecture among craftsmen to-day as to what has brought about the revival of the cross-stitch embroidery, once so universally done, but which, for years, has been relegated to the attics and almost forgotten. Of late, people have awakened, either to the artistic value of their grandmothers' samplers, or merely to an appreciation of their quaintness and humor, and have brought them forth to decorate walls with their soft, faded beauty. Even this was done long before any one thought, or attempted, themselves to make use of the old stitch, a fact which seems strange when one sees how comparatively simple this stitch is and how very effective. Almost any one who can handle a needle should be able to do cross-stitch, but, of course, to execute really good things requires some artistic skill and an eye for good color schemes.

One thing to which might be attributed much of the newly awakened interest was an exhibition held in London, in the spring of 1900, by the Fine Arts Society, at which were shown samplers made during a period of two hundred and fifty years. These samplers were loaned from almost all quarters of the world, and the interest created by them was quite remarkable. Those who arranged the collection discovered that the samplers dated as far back as 1648, and that then occurred a sudden and earliest, and certainly the simplest stitch employed in embroidery. Originally it was used only on a canvas cloth with a square weave; but later, it was made possible to use any kind of plain material, by the aid of a coarse open-work canvas which is stiffly starched and basted over the desired material. The squares of this serve as a guide, and when the work is finished the threads of it can all be pulled out. There are several kinds of canvas stitch, but beside the ordinary cross-stitch, which is most used, some of the finest and most beautiful things are done in what seems a much more difficult stitch but which is practically the same thing. This is done on very loosely-woven linen, and the background is worked all over with cross-stitches, which, being drawn very tightly, pull apart the threads of the linen, giving it an open-work effect. The design is left in the plain linen.

The shape of the old samplers was according to the way the linen was woven: generally long, narrow strips, with rough, irregular selvages, and almost never hemmed across the ends. They were, at the very beginning, a sort of memorandum book for patterns, and were worked all over with portions of designs to serve as guides for future copying. There were no books of letters as we have now; so that all the different styles of letters which could be used in the marking of the household linen were perplexing stop. None can be found before that date, but they must have existed previously, for Mr. Marcus Huish of London, who has gotten out a very beautiful book upon the Exhibition, entitled "Samplers and Tapestry Embroidery," says that these earliest ones "are writ all over with the evidence that the sampler was then a fully developed growth, and these must have been the descendants of a long line of progenitors." We know that they existed long before the date given, from references which can be found in writings of earlier dates. Shakespeare and Milton both mention them, making it evident that samplers were common early in the sixteenth century.

More exhibitions, such as the one held in London, would, without doubt, bring back the best and truest ideas in cross-stitch. Some of our museums have splendid specimens of the different varieties of cross-stitch, which are not generally on exhibition, but which should be shown, as well as the old Japanese and Persian embroideries as examples of the work of our own people. Ruskin once wrote an article on the arrangement of a museum, setting aside six rooms "for the exposition of the six queenly and muse-taught arts: needle-work, writing, pottery, sculpture, architecture and painting." He also specified that the room for needle-work should contain beside rare old works, "The counter-panes and samplers of our lovely ancestresses."

Cross-stitch—or as it is sometimes called, canvas stitch—was probably the worked upon the samplers; sometimes in the form of Biblical texts, or quaint verses, or simply the alphabet. This continued for years, until some ingenious spirits began to decorate their samplers; first with flowers, and later, animal forms were added. Flowers lent themselves quite readily to the domestic artist, as they were less rigid in their outline than animals, and could be made into really graceful and pretty designs. Birds and beasts, however, become necessarily rather crude in outline when put on to canvas; but this very crudity only adds to the quaintness of the design and gives it a piquancy that comes as a delightful change after ordinary embroidery. The angular lines of antique jewelry and furniture are in course of revival, and why should not embroideries follow in the course? But in following, it is best to copy not only the style, but when possible, the designs themselves. It would be very difficult to improve upon these, and as there is an infinite variety, one can, with a little ingenuity, arrange them in very effective patterns. There are numberless pattern books to be had; generally, in this country, in little old-fashioned, out-of-the-way shops.

William Morris, who took an interest in all simple and lovely things, succeeded in dyeing the lovely old pinks, blues and greens, which seem faded in the samplers, although in reality they are not; but it is next to impossible on this side of the Atlantic, to obtain any of his silks.

The Transplanting of Ann Young

settled resolve. She finished dressing and went down into the kitchen and set about getting breakfast.

The air was fresh and cool. The dew lay heavy and each separate blade of grass glittered in the sunlight like a tiny jeweled sword. There was a sudden step on the porch, a shadow crossed the kitchen window and the next moment Andrew Vane stepped across the threshold. He went straight up to Amelia. His face, in spite of the gray about the temples, still retained something of its boyishness. He looked as he had looked that night long ago under the stars. He began to speak hurriedly. "I came to tell you, 'Melia, that I want you should stay on in the old house, jest the same, you an' your mother. It ain't goin' to make one mite o' difference. I—"

He got no farther. Amelia turned on him almost fiercely. The dish she held in her hands trembled. "You needn't say another word, Andrew Vane. D'ye think I'd stay on in this house when it an' everything in it belongs to you? I want nothin' that ain't my own by rights. This place is yours an' you're goin' to hev it. I guess 'twon't take mother an' me long to git our things ready. I couldn't never pay up to you ef I worked my fingers to the bone. The place is yours, Andrew Vane, an' you can hev it."

Amelia finished speaking and went on with her preparations for breakfast. Andrew Vane stood looking at her for a moment, then he crossed the room and went out again into the early morning.

Amelia was mixing something in a yellow bowl when her mother came downstairs. "What be you doin', 'Melia?" "I thought I'd jest stir up some cake." The old woman looked at her sharply. She sat down to the table, but ate scarcely anything for breakfast. Afterward she sat in her rocking chair by the kitchen window. She watched Amelia when she thought the latter did not see her. "What be you stirrin' up the cake for, 'Melia?"

"I thought mebbe we'd better hev a little in the house."

Old Mrs. Young was silent a few moments. Then she spoke again timidly, as if afraid of the sound of her own voice. "What be you goin' to do, 'Melia?"

"What am I goin' to do?" Amelia turned and looked at her mother. "Well, I guess there ain't but one thing to do as I kin see. D'ye s'pose I'm goin' on livin' in a place that don't belong to me? We're goin' away, you and me. We're goin' off to another town. We'll take the money that's in the bank. 'Taint much, but I reckon it'll keep us 'bout as long there as 'twill here. Then I'm goin' to do some o' that knitted lace."

Amelia spoke rapidly. She scarcely paused to take breath. The old woman looked up at her with a pitiful shrinking. "Oh, 'Melia, I can't never go. I can't never go, nohow."

"Now mother, there ain't no use o' you're goin' on so. We've got to go, an' we're a-goin'." Amelia's face was grim. She did not look at her mother.

"When be we goin', 'Melia?" "We're goin' jest as soon as I kin git ready. Tomorrow, mebbe."

"Oh, 'Melia, I can't never go." The old woman rocked back and forth. The morning sunlight filtered through the kitchen window and on the pots of red geraniums on the sill. The tar fields were flooded with the warm light. "Ef—er you only felt it to marry Andrew Vane, 'Melia—" Ann Young began, then she fairly shrank before the look in Amelia's eyes.

"Now, mother, you jest see here. I ain't a-goin' to hear one word. I don't want Andrew Vane an' I ain't a-goin' to hev him neither. There ain't no use o' you're sayin' anythin' more 'bout it. D'ye think I'm goin' to be beholden to any man?"

The old woman did not speak again. Amelia went about her work swiftly and silently. She had a man's strength in her thin arms and narrow shoulders. At noon she set out a lunch on the kitchen table. Mrs. Young did not eat anything. Amelia drank her tea and ate her bread in silence. In the afternoon she gathered together the few things they were to take with them. Her mother followed her from room to room. She cried now and then piti-

CHASING THE WINTER.

By Bertha E. Green

NEARLY every one believes in signs. With the reappearance of some winter-sleeper, or the return of some feathered friend from the South, you say: "Spring is coming soon;" or when the first shy woodland flower blossoms, you say: "Spring is here."

With many of us the Robin is the herald of Spring. It may be you look for the woodchuck, or the raccoon, to leave his den, or for the chipmunk to scold you every morning. Any one of them may mark the coming of Spring to you, but I listen for Sandy Andy.

He is a big fellow who seldom comes near enough to most of us to permit of anything like an intimate acquaintance. But he is not one bit shy about letting you hear what he has to say.

Gandy Andy is my pet name for the Canada Goose, and I listen for his "Honk! Honk!" that will tell me this winter will soon be over. He is the only weather sign of coming Spring that I have learned to trust, for he is not given to making mistakes.

It happens, somehow, every year, that I always hear him first at night. In his Spring flight, Gandy Andy travels as if he had no time to waste, and, with wonderful sureness, he follows his set course Northward through the darkness. "Honk! Honk!" comes the cry, and I know that he is leading the flock that is fanned backward and forward in line, like the spreading arms of a V.

He is not a tireless traveller, by any means, although a strong one, and seems to have certain places along the route where he rests on his journey from the far South. His nesting grounds are away to the North, and to most of us Gandy Andy is merely a "bird of passage." It is my familiarity with, and my nearness to one of these resting-places of his, that I owe many opportunities of seeing him at close range.

A large bird is he, three feet or more from bill to tail-tip, and with a fine spread of strong wings. Watching him as he stands with his two webbed feet well apart, you notice first the well-rounded head poised gracefully upon the somewhat long neck. The dark, brownish feathers of the neck and head are shown off well by the white patch, broad under the throat, and narrowing to a point up and back of the eyes. The body is somewhat heavy in appearance due partly to the magnificent feathered coat that Gandy Andy wears. The tail is square-ended, and dark, and the under part of the body as far forward as the legs, is white.

There is no mistaking him: one look will tell you who he is. You know him at once, too, by the hollow wedge that is the formation of every flock of wild geese in migratory flight. But above all, there is his harsh "Honk! Honk!" unmusical it may be, but none the less welcome, for it tells me that Gandy Andy is on the wing, and I know that Spring will follow fast.

fully. "Oh, 'Melia, I can't never go. I can't never go, nohow." She repeated the words over and over like a little child. "Ain't you goin' to take none o' the furniture, 'Melia? Ain't I goin' to hev my rockin' chair?"

"No, I ain't." "What's goin' to become o' all them portraits in the parlor? Your father's, too. I can't go, 'Melia. I can't go. I ain't never ben to any other place." Her voice had grown sharply querulous.

Amelia did not speak. She went about her work with the air of one who has known beforehand just what was to be done. The afternoon was soft and brilliant. The birds, building their nests in the eaves of the old house, flew back and forth with sharp twitterings. Across the way a man's figure moved back and forth in the sunlight. It was Andrew Vane at work in his fields. When the afternoon drew to its close their few belongings stood packed and ready. Neither woman ate any supper. They sat together in the sitting room and watched the sunset linger on the hills. It was still early when they went to bed.

Once, during the night, Amelia, lying with wide-open eyes, heard her mother's voice in its childish repetition, "I can't never go. Oh, 'Melia, I can't never go."

In the gray dawn the two women arose. Ann Young's old fingers shook as she dressed herself. After breakfast Amelia washed up the dishes and packed them away with the rest of the things. Then she put on her hat and sat down to wait. The gray mist lifted slowly from the fields. In the front yard the clove pinks hung heavy with dew. The color trembled on the hills.

Ann Young sat in her rocking chair by the kitchen window. She had on her best black dress and bonnet and a little shawl pinned about her shoulders. She rocked back and forth holding her cotton gloves tightly in one hand.

"You'd better set right here, 'till I come back, mother." Amelia rose. "I'm a-goin' down to see about a wagon. We'll go jest's soon as I git back. You'd better jest set still."

Amelia was gone longer than she expected. She hurried as she turned the corner of the dusty road and came in sight of the old home. The smell of the pinks reached her, sweet and pungent in the soft morning air. She went in at the kitchen door. The room had the strange stillness that the absence of a human presence always lends. The rocking chair beside the window was empty.

"Mother," she called. There was no answer. She went on to the front parlor. As she opened the door the damp, musty air struck her as with a chill. "Mother," she called again, sharply. In the silence her father's portrait and those of her mother's family stared down at her from the walls. She closed the door and went on upstairs. One by one she went through the empty rooms. Then she came downstairs again and out into the kitchen. A wagon had driven up to the door and stopped. Amelia went out and told the man to drive on. She went back and forth across the yard calling in a high shrill voice that carried far across the fields. Andrew Vane hoeing in his garden paused a moment.

It was almost an hour before she went into the house. The stillness seemed to flaunt itself in her face. She sat down in her mother's chair beside the window. The sunlight quivered across the sill and on the pots of red geraniums. She had not stopped to take off her hat and she still sat with it on. Her tall figure was sharply erect.

The sun climbed higher and higher. Long bars of light lay across the floor.

WHAT I SAID TO THE OTHER PATIENTS

"Nothing but the truth, you know. No Canadian would want to say anything else. How could you lie to the patient—the patient who trusts you and looks to you for help!

This does not mean that it is necessary to try to tell the patient at once all you know, or all you do not know. But what you do say let it be true. She is not asking you about yellow fever, but about cancer. Tell her about cancer.

So I told my terrified patient—"Now I am going to tell you all about it, and then you can judge for yourself. You are terrified because you fell down and bruised your chest, and it hurts you when you draw a deep breath, and some one told you that cancer often 'starts' from a bruise like that.

"First of all do you think that is likely? You have probably fallen down hard on the icy pavement once every winter at least and bruised yourself. Everybody else falls down every winter. I have fallen down and bruised myself three times this winter already. You have seen a good many winters, perhaps forty or more. So have I. Neither of us has ever had a bruise develop into cancer yet."

"If you read up the subject in all the medical books on my shelves in this office you will not find one instance of a bruise causing a cancer."

No wonder you smile. You have judged for yourself and you feel cheerful again. Relieved from its terror, your mind has begun to work again. By the time you get your March "Canadian Home Journal" you will have forgotten all about that bruise, and you will not be able to find the place.

Now let me tell you how Mrs. A., Mrs. B. and Mrs. C. protected themselves from cancer. When Mr. A. married Mrs. A. she had a little brown "mole" or "birthmark" or whatever else you like to call it, on her cheek. The A. family went on and prospered, the children came, they grew big, and Mrs. A. never thought about that little mole. She had too much else to do. But one day Johnny said to his Mother—"Mother, that little brown spot on your cheek looks bigger."

"Don't talk nonsense, John" said his father, "It isn't a bit bigger than it used to be, and you shouldn't make personal remarks about anybody's appearance, especially your Mother's." John blushed, for he was getting to be quite a young man, and said "Excuse me, Mother, you know I did not mean to be rude."

So John was excused, but before his father went to bed that night he did say to his wife that perhaps she had better go in and ask the Doctor about the brown spot to-morrow on her way home from market.

Wise man!

What did the Doctor say? He said, "No, I don't think it is of the least consequence. But there is only one way to be sure, and that is to get rid of it, and then you will never need to know anything more about it. They can just give it a few treatments in the X-Ray Department in the Hospital and it will fall off your cheek in a few weeks and leave the skin underneath as soft and smooth and red and white as the rest of your face and you will forget which cheek it was."

So that was what happened. They are very careful at the Hospital. They just applied the X-Rays to that one little brown spot and no where else. Mrs. A. went back in about a fortnight for another treatment. After five or six treatments the brown spot fell off one day when she was washing her face. The skin underneath was a little redder than the rest of her cheek for a few days. But very soon you could not find the place, and Mrs. A. forgot which cheek it was. Do I think Mrs. A. would have had cancer?

I do not know. What I do know is this. Whenever any such spot begins to grow you had better get rid of it at once. Then you will not need to know whether it is going to be a cancer or not.

Rontgen Rays, or X-Rays, were a wonderful discovery. Radium is as wonderful. Perhaps it is even more wonderful than Rontgen Rays in the treatment of cancer.

Now about Mrs. B. There was something that was not quite right. Never mind whether she was surprised to find one day that there was a wee little hard lump in her breast that she never had noticed before. Or did she notice that a wart had begun to grow bigger and feel harder? Or was there a tiny bit of discharge from one of the natural orifices of the body—a discharge that she never had observed before? Or was there a little stain of blood somewhere that she could not account for?

It may have been any one of these things, or it may have been something else. But it was something she did not quite know about. And she did not wait even one day. She went to see the Doctor that very afternoon.

And the Doctor said—

"Mrs. B., I am glad you came to me as soon as you noticed it. Will you tell Mr. B. that this little lump can be removed quickly and easily to-morrow, and that then you will be quite safe, as far as I can see? No, I do not think I would wait till next week. It would be easier and more satisfactory at the Hospital, and if your husband will call me up I will just arrange for it to-morrow. Yes, Friday is a good day. It will not hurt nearly as much as having a tooth out, and then we shall see that you are quite safe."

That was years ago, and Mr. and Mrs. B. have forgotten all about it.

If it was not a lump, but something else, the Doctor would have known just as well what to do about that "something else."

And Mrs. C.? Dear Mrs. Mary C., she was one of the best little mothers that God ever made. She came trembling that day. She said when she told her husband that she was going to my office that afternoon to show me the lump in her breast, he said to her, "Mary, I just feel sick at the thought of it. I am afraid it is cancer. I can't go out to work this afternoon."

"So I left him lying down on the sofa," said Mrs. C. "He took it awful hard."

"Well, never mind," I said. "Show me the lump and we will see what we can do."

Yes. It was a lump. But, thank God, it was not near that sacred place where rests the baby's head. It was tor!" She seized Hector with both hands.

"You go and tell William that it isn't true. Ask him if Annie Guay has been saying things to him this summer; and tell him that it isn't true."

She knew that William could hear every word she said; but he wasn't believing her. He was wondering how she knew about it if it wasn't true. He wouldn't understand if she said that she had seen it when she looked at him. Oh! what could she say? Hector was ready to be thrown at William like a stone from a catapult; but how could she throw him? Then she knew.

"Tell him," she said to Hector, knowing, oh joy! that every word would sink into what William described as his somewhat over the average ability, "tell him that Annie Guay told me things about him, but that I didn't believe them. Tell him that's how I knew. I guessed it just this minute. Tell him that she did the same to us both."

William understood; he believed without waiting for Hector to tell him. But William's understanding was a mere preliminary which, once it was over, scarcely engaged Vanessa's attention. Annie, whose appropriate demonstration remained, was a principle and a girl.

Poor Miss Guay wept after her mind had been thoroughly gone over and hung up to dry in a clear cold wind of enquiry. She had never suspected that Vanessa was capable of anything like this. How could a person of her experience be expected to know that Vanessa whose ignorance as far as she could judge extended indefinitely, could be intellectually so rough in the handling?

"You say it was a lie," urged Vanessa firmly. "Now you say you won't tell another."

"Don't you be so mad," sobbed the mental sufferer.

"I can be far madder if I want to be," interjected Vanessa, with a depth of unexplained meaning.

"I won't tell him any more about you," faltered Miss Guay, choking on her unwonted tears.

More! More about her! There was no possibility of doubting that Vanessa could be far madder. But as to what was then said, she never could remember, and Annie's account of it was too fragmentary.

* * *

"Oh, Mrs. Stetter, ma'am, I am so glad to see someone again who has always been kind to me!" Annie was ready to give her confidence now to anyone who would take it. "Oh Mrs. Stetter, oh ma'am, she said it would take more than a hundred years for lies to work out on me."

Mrs. Stetter sniffed; she wanted to have boarders, but when she had them she wanted them to know what a trouble they were. Glorious was the supper of which Miss Guay partook that night, while Mrs. Stetter stood by, forming a habit of disagreeing with the rest of the household when they thought twice about Annie. And in this indirect manner did Vanessa triumphantly contribute to a distinct reformation in Miss Guay's character. Vanessa herself never felt quite young again; but, nevertheless, if she had been Mr. Stetter, she would not have married his wife.

How Puffed Grains Disappear

The question with a million mothers is—Where do Puffed Grains go? Girls use them in candy making. Boys eat them like peanuts in the hungry afternoons.

For these are food confections. The taste is like toasted nuts. And the flimsy, flavory texture is to children a delight.

Keep them supplied

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice, however used, supply whole-grain nutrition in the ideal form.

The grains are steam exploded. Every food cell is blasted, so digestion is easy and complete.

• They are Prof. Anderson's inventions — the finest grain foods in existence.

Don't regard them as mere tidbits—just some regal breakfast dainties. What greater food can you imagine than Puffed Wheat in milk?

Be glad the foods are tempting. Before they came, most children got too little whole-grain diet. They can never get too much.

For between meals these are ideal foods. Digestion starts before they reach the stomach.

eralship and self-sacrifice, "for the public good and the advance of religion," if you will, as the Jesuit Relation puts it, had saved the colony.

The Hurons who had deserted and survived afterwards bore the news to the outside world, but confirmation came, strangely enough, from another quarter. Eight days after the end of the struggle there passed that way Pierre Radisson, one of the greatest of early Canadians, explorer, adventurer, and really the father of the Hudson's Bay Company through his later representations to London promoters. Radisson was returning from his fourth voyage, in which he had explored the Upper Lakes, when he came upon the remains of Dollard and his party after the Iroquois had done their worst and fled. "It was a terrible spectacle to us," he wrote, "for we came through eight days after that defeat, which saved us without doubt." "There was not a tree but was shot with bullets," he adds.

Posterity has recognized the dauntless heroism of Dollard. A few years ago, Mlle. Guerin, a Montreal writer, in recalling the magnificence of the incident, appealed for recognition by Canada, crying:

"Call back thy heroes from their graves and bid them live again in monuments of bronze and stone. Choose some bright spot where youth, throughout all time, may gaze upon heroic youth, and there in imperishable letters carve the name of Adam Dollard, Sieur des Ormeux."

The appeal has been answered. Both in Montreal and at the foot of the Long Sault monuments in bronze and stone do honor to the memory of Dollard. In Lafontaine Park, Montreal, a worthy memorial to Dollard was unveiled in June, 1920, and a simpler shaft was erected at Carillon. The Montreal memorial, has impressive reliefs and a group in bronze by Alfred Laliberte, the Montreal sculptor. The group presents Dollard with sword in hand, head boldly erect, courage and resolution in every fibre of his body, listening to the voice of French Civilization, represented by a woman standing behind and above him, with uplifted arm, urging him to avenge the death of his last companion, lying at her feet. It is a stirring and vitalizing record for all time of a venture which called forth the lion-hearted qualities of the early Canadians. At the top of the main shaft of the monument is a bronze figure of a head representing Canada. The altar piece on either side of the shaft is decorated with two low reliefs representing, "The Oath," and "The Departure of the Soldiers for the Long Sault," in both of which the solemn grandeur of the episode is feelingly and dramatically presented. At Carillon the simple shaft erected in the quiet village, a few yards from the river's edge, bears in relief a rough portrait of Dollard and another presentation of a symbolic head, suggesting Canada.

The human tide ebbs and flows past the major monument in Montreal, recalling the glorious exploit to the citizens of the metropolis, and the simple shaft gives dignity and fame to a village far from the currents of commercial traffic; and both form a worthy link between the Old Regime, with its wonderful color and still more wonderful episodes, and a day of settled, orderly life and too great neglect of the past. The end.

The Garden of Desire

"I don't blame the inhabitants for not getting out that way," Andrews remarked, peering downwards. "Surely you aren't going to attempt to go down there?" he questioned turning to Winthrop.

Winthrop was fastening the uncoiled rope beneath his arms. His face had on it an expression Andrews did not care to see—the rapt, aloof look of the devotee. And beside him stood Ito, stroking his beard and staring down into the valley. "It is long enough to reach that ledge there," Winthrop pointed. "And there seems to be easier going down below. Now, lower away."

He let himself over the edge of the cliff, and Ito and one of the men began to lower slowly. Andrews could see the grotesque yellow robe flutter from beneath the fur coat, as Winthrop spun around in mid-air. Then the rope slackened and he was visible, standing on the ledge.

"We can do it," he called up, making a trumpet of his hands. "There is a path downward."

"Truly devils live there," cried Ito, pointing with a contemptuous finger. A grey cloud had blotted out the valley beneath. "Devils," he repeated, "his features working convulsively, and those who mock at the temples of the gods."

He made a step forward, calling to Winthrop in a voice that was hoarse with passion. Then with a gesture of contempt, he flung the end of the rope over the edge of the precipice.

"Nevertheless will he mock the sanctity of the temples," he said grimly.

Andrews stood watching as if turned to stone. He saw Winthrop gaze at the coil of rope that hurtled by him; he knew that he had understood Ito's murderous action in the light of his menacing words. But Winthrop gave no heed to the hillman or his anger. Instead Andrews could see that he was peering through rifts in the cloud, at the Garden of Desire. And presently, with a wave of his hand, he started downward.

From the ridge Andrews watched him with fascinated eyes, as his figure grew smaller and smaller in the distance. The obscuring cloud had drifted away, and the wonderful coloring of the Garden of Desire now stood out like an illustration of the "Arabian Nights." With a fixed gaze Andrews stood entranced, until Winthrop—now a midget in size—waved a diminutive hand to show that the path curved. He swung to the right and in another moment was out of sight.

Andrews watched until there was no longer a possibility of his friend's return. Then in matter-of-fact fashion—for aloof from civilization men do strange things—he turned about to take vengeance on Ito. From the doing of which he was only prevented by one of those little things fools call accidents. In his eagerness to watch Winthrop he had unconsciously drawn perilously near the edge of the cliff, and as he swung about, his foot slipped and he fell forward on a sharp spur of rock. But for Ito's ready arm he would have rolled entirely over the precipice. He could feel Ito's clutch on his arm, then his head struck on the jagged rock and he remembered no more.

When he came to himself, after interminable days of pain, the little caravan was not far from Peshawar, and Ito was by his side. "The sahib has been very ill," said the chief of the hillmen gravely. "He must not talk."

Andrews looked at the scenery, which he vaguely recognized. The scoundrel then had saved his life, and had brought him back along all that dangerous road.

And Winthrop? He beckoned feebly. "Do you get the five hundred rupees?" he asked in a whisper.

Ito shook his head, his eagle face stern and set. "There are bigger things in a man's life, sahib, than all the gold in Krishna Lal's treasure-room," said he, with dignity.

Number Twenty-One, Crow Lane

Scarcely knowing what she was doing, Mrs. Burke went slowly downstairs. Tom looked up. "The letter. What does it say?"

"Letter," said Mrs. Burke, "what letter? Oh, how stupid of me! Sure, I forgot. It's nothing at all at all. Just a notice of an auction sale of books somewhere," she lied cheerfully.

"Oh, is that all? An auction sale. I don't think I shall trouble to go. I can't see any too well, and auctions are not what they used to be, Mrs. Burke."

The days sped on. The first of the month arrived, and quickly the calendar raced to the middle of November. On the fifteenth, Mrs. Burke made up her mind. There were only a couple of weeks left, and Mr. Tom must find somewhere to go. She waited till late in the evening, when he was most likely to be alone, then, with the hateful letter in her hand, she reluctantly descended the creaking stair and pushed open the door of the shop. There were no lights except for the fitful gleam of the dying fire, and it seemed unusually still, even for this time of day. Mrs. Burke stood for a moment listening, and then, suddenly, she heard the low dismal whine of the little fox terrier. She stole over to the shabby chair near the grate.

Old Tom was sitting there, staring into the fire, a happy smile on his face. The charred old briar pipe had fallen from his fingers and lay broken on the floor. Beside him, the dog crouched, a look of bewilderment in its big brown eyes.

For a minute Mrs. Burke bent silently over the chair. Then she sank down on her knees.

"I won't have to tell him, after all," she said simply. "Thank God!"

The Quitter Comes Back

"We were living over one of the richest veins of copper in British Columbia, honey, and didn't know it. The geologists traced it from the Crab Creek mine straight through the back of our farm. ('Our'—wasn't Tom a dear!). Then to cap that along comes the railroad with an offer for the whole thing. They want land for a station and sheds on the line of the new branch they're building. It's a long story and the railroad people wanted it all even before the news about the copper leaked out, but I was able to compromise; sold the back half to the mining company and the front section to the C. P. R. They can have it out. Now where'll we go and what'll we do?"

"Oh, Tom, I'm so glad. You deserve every bit of it. I wish I felt that I did. But," she said, very humbly wise, "let's go back, dear, to another farm just like that one. I won't be branded,—isn't that what your cowmen say?—as a quitter. (Tom laughed). I'm going to show these people here that I can 'make good'—I've heard you say that yourself!"

Puddings Which Win Favour

Puddings made with Carnation Milk win instant favour. For cooking add an equal part of water. Add more water if you want thinner milk. Use Carnation undiluted or diluted instead of cream for tea, coffee, dessert and cereals. It makes them more nourishing, too. It is just pure cows milk with part of the water taken away while the milk is fresh and rich, then sealed and sterilized. Use it as your milk supply. Buy it from your grocer in tall (16 oz.) cans or by the case of 48 cans. Write for Recipe Book.

Carnation Milk

"From Contented Cows"

The label is red and white

Cream Tapioca Pudding—1½ cups water, ¼ cup pearl tapioca, ½ cup Carnation Milk, ¼ teaspoonful salt, 3 tablespoonfuls sugar, ½ teaspoonful vanilla, 2 eggs beaten separately. Soak tapioca one hour in enough cold water to cover. Cook in a double boiler until transparent. Mix sugar, salt, milk and egg yolks slightly beaten. Combine by pouring hot tapioca slowly on egg mixture, return to double boiler and cook until it thickens. When thick remove from fire and fold in whites of eggs beaten stiff. Add flavoring and chill. This recipe serves six people. Always mix Carnation Milk and water thoroughly.

In the Carnation Cook Book you'll find tested recipes for eight delightful puddings besides a whole host of other good things to eat. Write the Carnation Milk Products Co., Limited, Aylmer, Ont. for a free copy.

A Variety of Recipes

A Sweet Sandwich—Slices of brown bread buttered and cut thin. Spread with dates stoned and chopped fine and mixed with chopped nut meats and moistened with fruit juice. These are delicious.

Sweet sandwiches can be made in great variety, in fact there need be no limit to the different kinds. Preserves of all kinds can be used for making dainty sandwiches, these should not be too liquid, or if they are, should be thickened before use with some macaroon or cake crumbs.

Sausage Sandwiches—Fry the sausage until brown on all sides, and when cool mix into it a little chopped celery, a few chopped pickles, and season with paprika and a little lemon juice. Spread thin slices of bread with butter and place on them crisp lettuce leaves, and then place the sausage between.

Tomato Sandwiches—Select very firm tomatoes, do not peel but cut them into thin slices with a very sharp knife, and spread on a clean cloth for a few minutes. Have bread which is at least one day old, trim off the crust, spread the end of the loaf with a little thick boiled dressing and slice thinly. When the requisite number of slices have been cut, lay on some of them the drained slices of tomato, dust with salt, pepper and paprika and cover with the remaining slices. Cut into the desired shapes with a sharp knife or fancy cutters and place in the refrigerator for one hour.

Tuna Fish Sandwiches—Cut bread in one-fourth inch slices, toast and remove the crusts. Melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, add two tablespoonfuls of chopped green pepper, and cook for five minutes, stirring all the time. Add two tablespoonfuls of flour and stir until well blended, then add one-half cupful of milk, three-fourths cupful of strained tomatoes, a pinch of baking soda, two cupfuls of grated cheese, and when the cheese is melted add one-beaten egg, salt, pepper, mustard and paprika to taste, then add one cupful of flaked tuna fish. When heated spread between slices of the prepared toast.

Salmon may be substituted for tuna fish in above recipe.

Fig Sandwiches—Chop one-half pound of figs, add one-third cupful of grated maple sugar, one-half cupful of boiling water, and the strained juice of one-half lemon. Mix these ingredients, and cook in a double boiler until thick. Spread between trimmed slices of buttered bread.

Pimento Sandwiches—Cut whole wheat bread in slices and spread with the following pimento relish. Mix one-half teaspoonful each of salt, mustard, onion juice and powdered sugar, add two yolks of eggs, then gradually add one-half cupful of olive oil. As it thickens add slowly one tablespoonful of lemon juice. Cook one-half cupful of shredded lettuce for ten minutes in one cupful of boiling water with one-half tablespoonful of vinegar and one-half teaspoonful of salt. Cool and drain. Then add one-half cupful of chopped pimentos and mix well together.

Oatmeal Wafers—Melt three tablespoonfuls of butter in one-third cupful of milk, when cold, add one cupful of flour, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of lemon juice, three tablespoonfuls of grated maple sugar, one-third cupful of rolled oats and one-half cupful of fine oatmeal. Mix together and roll very thin, cut into squares or bars, and bake in a moderate oven.

Hominy Gems—Pour one-half cupful of boiling water into a bowl, add one-fourth cupful of cooked hominy and one teaspoonful of salt, and allow the mixture to stand until the hominy absorbs the water. Then add one cupful of scalded milk, one cupful of corn meal, three tablespoonfuls of sugar and four tablespoonfuls of melted butter.

When cool, add two beaten eggs and three teaspoonfuls baking powder, and beat well, then bake in hot greased gem pans in a moderate oven until ready.

Potato Biscuits—Press one cupful of hot potatoes through a sieve, add four tablespoonfuls of butter, one-fourth of a yeast cake dissolved in one-half cupful of lukewarm milk, three teaspoonfuls of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, one beaten egg and flour enough to make a soft sponge. When very light add more flour and knead to a soft dough. Roll the dough one-fourth of an inch thick, cut out with a cutter, place on warmed buttered tins, brush over with melted butter, cover with another layer of biscuits, brush with melted butter, and put in a cool place until the morning. Let them rise in a warm place, and bake in a hot oven. Serve hot.

Drop Cakes—Beat one egg, add one-third cupful of sugar and beat again, then add one-half cupful of milk or water, one and one-third cupfuls of flour sifted with one teaspoonful of baking powder and a pinch of salt, lastly add one teaspoonful of melted butter. Drop by spoonfuls into smoking hot fat and when brown drain on kitchen paper and serve hot with maple syrup.

Baking Powder Biscuits—Sift four times two cupfuls of flour, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of sugar and three teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Cut and rub in two tablespoonfuls of butter, then add enough milk to make a soft dough. Roll lightly on a floured baking board to three-fourths of an inch thick, cut out with a round cutter, place on greased baking tins and bake for twenty minutes in a hot oven.

Breakfast Rolls—When making bread dough, reserve three cupfuls of the dough. Beat in four tablespoonfuls of melted butter and one-half tablespoonful of sugar, place in a buttered bowl, brush over with melted butter, cover and allow to rise in a warm place. Form into round balls, brush over with butter, let rise again, and place on buttered baking tins and bake in a hot oven.

Egg Biscuits—Sift into a bowl two cupfuls of flour, one teaspoonful of sugar, one-half teaspoonful of salt, and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Cut and rub in four tablespoonfuls of butter, add two beaten eggs, then gradually two-thirds cupfuls of milk. Mix well and drop by spoonfuls, one inch apart, on a buttered baking tin and bake in a hot oven for ten minutes.

Parker House Rolls—Heat two cupfuls of milk, when cool add one-half of a yeast cake dissolved in one-fourth cupful of lukewarm water, sift in two cupfuls of flour and one teaspoonful of salt, beat thoroughly and allow to rise in a warm place. When spongy add one tablespoonful of sugar, one-fourth cupful of melted butter and flour to knead. Allow to rise, and when double its bulk, shape into balls, lay on a greased tin, and when risen to double their bulk, press with floured handle of wooden spoon, almost dividing the roll. Brush one-half with melted butter, press the two halves together and allow to rise. Brush over with beaten egg, and bake in a hot oven for fifteen minutes.

Corn Cake—Mix and sift into a bowl one-half cupful each of flour and corn meal, one-fourth cupful of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt and one-half teaspoonful of baking soda, then sift again and add two beaten eggs and one-half cupful of sour cream and beat for fifteen minutes. Butter a baking pan and heat it very hot, pour in the mixture, then pour over three-fourths cupful of sweet milk and bake in a hot oven for forty minutes. Cut in pieces and serve hot with butter and syrup.

Table talks

By Mrs. Knox

Speaking of Prunes---

LET me tell you of an interesting table talk that I recently had at a club meeting. One of our members told me how each Monday she planned her menus for the following week. Then from her original ideas, cook books and magazine recipes she studied how to make and serve many old familiar dishes in entirely new and different ways, saying that my cook books had been most helpful in teaching her new ways of serving rice, fresh and canned fruits, left-over meats and vegetables, etc., which naturally was pleasing to me.

She gave me her original recipe for serving the old standby—Prunes—in a whip, by combining them with Knox Sparkling Gelatine. It is so good that I am giving the recipe below.

PRUNE WHIP

½ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
¼ cup cold water ½ cup sugar
1 cup prune pulp Whites of two eggs
2 tablespoons beaten stiff lemon juice 1 doz. chopped nuts

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes. Put prune pulp, lemon juice and sugar in saucepan, and bring to the boiling point, stirring constantly. Add soaked gelatine, stir until cool. When mixture begins to thicken, fold in whites of eggs beaten until stiff, turn into wet mold or paper cases, sprinkle with chopped nuts.

A Variety of Recipes

An Excellent Fruit Pudding.—Grate the rind of one lemon into a bowl, then add its strained juice together with one pound of currants, one-half pound of seedless raisins, one-fourth pound of chopped candied citron peel, one cupful of flour, one-half pound of bread crumbs, one teaspoonful of powdered nutmeg, one-fourth pound each of seedless raisins and chopped preserved cherries, four beaten eggs, one cupful of milk, one teaspoonful each of baking powder and salt, one-half pound each of chopped suet and grated maple sugar. Mix and pour into a well greased mould, cover with a greased paper and steam steadily for six and one-half hours. Serve hot with the following vanilla sauce. Cream together one-half cupful of butter with one cupful of powdered sugar, add one teaspoonful of vanilla extract, two tablespoonfuls of fruit juice, and beat well. Just before serving stir in one-fourth cupful of boiling water and one stiffly beaten white of egg and beat until frothy.

Carrot Pudding.—Scrape and boil one pound of carrots until tender, then drain them and mash them to a pulp, add one and one-fourth cupfuls of chopped suet one-half cupful of grated maple sugar one cupful each of currants, seed-then cool and bake in two crusts. To make the crust, cut and rub three cupfuls of butter into eight cupfuls of flour, add one cupful of sugar, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, and three beaten eggs. Mix and chill before using. Do not use too much flour when rolling out the pastry.

Mince Meat Roly Poly Pudding.—Chop one-half pound of suet and cut and rub it into one cupful of bread crumbs and three cupfuls of flour, add one-fourth cupful of sugar, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and enough sweet or buttermilk to make a stiffish paste. Knead until smooth, on a floured baking board, roll out, and spread a thick layer of mince meat over it, except one inch all round, which should be brushed with water. Roll up and tie in a scalded and floured pudding cloth and boil or steam for four hours. Serve on a hot platter with the following jam sauce:—put one-half cupful of water into a small saucepan, add three tablespoonfuls of sugar, and four tablespoonfuls of raspberry or strawberry jam. Allow to boil for ten minutes, then add one-half teaspoonful of lemon extract and a few drops of red color. Strain and use.

A Welcome Basket

ed raisins, seedless raisins and chopped candied orange peel, one teaspoonful of baking powder, two cupfuls of bread crumbs, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful each of powdered nutmeg, mace and ginger, three beaten eggs and one-half cupful of milk. Pour the mixture into a well greased mould or bowl, cover with a greased paper and steam steadily for four hours. Turn out and serve hot with ginger sauce. This makes a delicious pudding and some people prefer it to plum pudding. Another Method. Put three-fourths cupful of breadcrumbs into a bowl, add three tablespoonfuls of butter, one-fourth cupful of brown sugar, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt and one-half cupful of boiling milk. Allow these to stand for fifteen minutes, then add two grated raw carrots, one-half teaspoonful each of powdered ginger and nutmeg, one teaspoonful of baking powder, the yolk of three beaten eggs, and the stiffly beaten whites of eggs. Mix well and pour into a buttered fire-proof dish, and bake in a moderate oven until firm to the touch and nicely browned. Sprinkle with sugar and serve hot with custard sauce or hot milk.

Raisin Pie.—Soak three-fourths cupful of seeded raisins in one cupful of water for two and one-half hours, add one beaten egg, one cupful of sugar, the grated rind and strained juice of one lemon, and two tablespoonfuls of cornstarch mixed with one cupful of sugar. Stir and cook until the mixture thickens, Orange Pie.—Cream one and one-half tablespoonfuls of butter with one-half cupful of sugar, add the beaten yolks of four eggs, one-half cupful of milk, the grated rinds and strained juice of two oranges. Mix and bake in one crust. Frosting.—beat the whites of eggs to a stiff froth, add three tablespoonfuls of sugar and one-fourth teaspoonful of orange extract and beat again until smooth. Spread over the pie when it has cooled a little and return to the oven to brown.

Pumpkin Pie.—Line a square greased tin with pastry. Mix together one and three-fourths cupfuls of steamed and well strained pumpkin with two-thirds cupful of brown sugar, two cupfuls of milk, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, three beaten eggs, one-half teaspoonful each of powdered ginger and cinnamon, and one-half teaspoonful each of vanilla and lemon extracts. Pour into the prepared tin and bake for thirty minutes in a moderate oven. When cold sprinkle over with sugar, cut in pieces and serve. Squash can be used in the same way and makes a very good pie.

Prune Pudding.—Well grease a plain mould or bowl, and coat the inside with brown sugar. Wash one pound of prunes, and allow to soak in boiling water for one hour. Make a suet crust according to directions for roly poly pudding, and roll it out rather thin. Cut a round from this, and lay it at the bottom of the mould or bowl. Put a layer of the prunes, stoned, on the top and squeeze over it a little lemon juice, then place another round of pastry, pour over some honey, then more pastry, more prunes, and so on until the mould is full. The last layer should be of pastry. Cover with a scalded and floured pudding cloth, plunge into boiling water, and boil for four hours. Serve with lemon sauce. Dates may be used instead of the prunes.

Raised Cake.—Make a sponge at night with two cupfuls of sifted flour, one teaspoonful of salt, one yeast cake dissolved in one-half cupful of lukewarm milk, adding enough lukewarm water to make a thick batter. Beat well, cover and allow to rise in a warm place over night. In the morning cream together one cupful each of butter and sugar, add the grated rind and strained juice of a lemon, four beaten eggs, one pound of seeded raisins, one-fourth pound each of chopped candied citron peel and chopped almonds, one-half pound of chopped English walnut meats, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt and three cupfuls of flour. Mix all these with the sponge and turn into two buttered loaf pans, and set where they will keep warm until double their original bulk, then bake in a moderate oven for one and one-half hours. When the cakes between trimmed slices of buttered bread.

Pimento Sandwiches.—Cut whole wheat bread in slices and spread with the following pimento relish. Mix one-half teaspoonful each of salt, mustard, onion juice and powdered sugar, add two half cupful of olive oil, as it thickens add slowly one tablespoonful of lemon juice. Cook one-half cupful of shredded lettuce for ten minutes in one cupful of boiling water with one-half tablespoonful of vinegar and one-half teaspoonful of salt. Cool and drain. Then add one-half cupful of chopped pimentos and mix well together.

Lettuce Sandwiches.—Shred lettuce with a little salt and just a dash of paprika and lemon juice. Lay the lettuce on a thin slice of buttered bread, press a slice of peeled tomato on the top and finish with another thin slice of buttered bread. Cut into neat sandwiches and serve.

Chicken Sandwiches.—Chop cooked chicken up fine, add to each cupful of chicken, one tablespoonful each of chopped celery and parsley, one-half cupful of blanched and chopped almonds, and enough highly seasoned mayonnaise dressing to make a paste that will spread nicely. Spread between slices of buttered brown bread.

Another Method: Chop enough can-

are cold, ice with yellow frosting made from the yolks of two eggs, one teaspoonful of grated lemon rind and the strained juice from one-half lemon. Cook one cupful of sugar with one-fourth cupful of water until it forms a soft ball when tested in cold water, then pour gradually on to the yolks of eggs, beating all the time, then beat until thick enough to spread. Sprinkle the top with chopped coconut and chopped almonds. The other cake should be covered with the following frosting, beat one cupful of butter to a cream, then add gradually two and one-half cupfuls of sifted confectioners' sugar, beating constantly, then add three tablespoonfuls of strong coffee. Put the frosting roughly on to the cake with the aid of a fork, then sprinkle with chopped English walnut meats. If chocolate preferred to the coffee, omit the coffee and beat in two squares of melted chocolate, and flavor with one-half teaspoonful of vanilla extract. To keep the coffee strong reduce black coffee in a cool place until firm by boiling it until a thick decoction is secured.

Fig Sandwiches.—Chop one-half pound of figs, add one-third cupful of grated maple sugar, one-half cupful of boiling water, and the strained juice of one-half lemon. Mix these ingredients, and cook in a double boiler until thick. Spread ned or cooked chicken to make one and one-half cupfuls of meat add one-fourth cupful of cooked chopped tongue or ham, four tablespoonfuls of chopped nut meats, and one tablespoonful of cream, mix well and spread between thin slices of buttered brown or white bread.

Cheese Sandwiches.—Season butter with red pepper and mustard, and spread it on some plain crackers. Put a slice of mild cheese on the top, and cover it with another cracker.

Another Method. Season the butter as above, and mix into it an equal quantity of grated cheese, and spread a layer of this between two crackers. A little thick cream may be added to the mixture if desired. Almost any kind of cheese may be used for making sandwiches, and cream cheese is very suitable. Bread and butter may be used instead of the crackers. Cheese sandwiches are a very good accompaniment to a green salad.

Pineapple Sandwich.—Cut from stale cake oblong slices, or make small sponge cakes and split them open. Spread each piece with grated pineapple and press together, cover with powdered sugar and decorate with shredded almonds. Pass with these a cold soft cooked custard.

EDITOR'S NOTE. Who would believe such delicious hot breads could be made so easily and quickly! It will pay you to watch the magazines for this service to users of Royal Baking Powder. Here the Royal Educational Department gives concisely much valuable information, saving you time and money. On these pages you will find tested short cuts, new recipes, and many useful suggestions which are proving so helpful to the busy housekeeper.

ROLLS called "Little Royal Dinner Loaves" abroad and closely resembling yeast rolls, but taking one-tenth the time to make the popular Butter Cake, too, ten minutes from mixing bowl to table, and both made from plain biscuit dough! With a slightly different way of handling the same dough you can easily make them. "Light and little handling" is the rule for biscuits, but do not be afraid to knead the dough for rolls. Shape rolls into even, smooth pieces in any desired form, place on a baking sheet, or in muffin or gem pans, and let them rise in a warm place, just as you do for yeast rolls, only for about half the time, and then bake quickly. We have made hundreds of these rolls—they are truly delicious—the kind you cannot buy.

Baking too makes such a difference. Biscuit dough baked on a griddle, or iron frying pan, or even on an electric plate on the table, will give you light feathery butter cakes or "ovenless bread." Use muffin rings or biscuit cutter if you like, though shaping with the hands is all that is necessary; bake slowly until puffed way up and then turn and bake on the other side—ten minutes is ample. Split and butter while hot and serve immediately.

It is a satisfaction to butter a piece of corn bread that doesn't crumble. Try this delicious recipe for breakfast. It will be a welcome and wholesome change. Muffins, too, are always popular, but give your family "good" muffins with crispy crusts and feathery insides, without "tunnels." Do not always make them with ordinary white flour—try part graham, gluten, rice or corn for variety. Long beating of the batter becomes unnecessary when Royal is used and quick baking improves the muffin. Do not place the muffin pan too near the bottom of the oven but put on a shelf where the heat is more uniform.

Corn Bread

- 1 cup corn meal
- 1 cup flour
- 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
- 3 tablespoons sugar
- 1 teaspoon salt
- 1½ cups milk
- 2 tablespoons melted shortening
- 1 egg

Mix and sift dry ingredients; add milk, shortening and beaten egg; beat well and pour into greased shallow pan. Bake in hot oven about 25 minutes.

Biscuits, Rolls, or Butter Cakes

- 2 cups flour
- ½ teaspoon salt
- 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
- 1 tablespoon shortening
- ½ cup milk

Sift together flour, salt and baking powder, rub in shortening; add milk, and mix lightly to smooth dough; turn out on floured board.

Biscuits.—roll or pat out lightly, cut with biscuit cutter and bake in hot oven 12 to 15 minutes, or without rolling drop with spoon on greased baking sheet and bake as above.

Rolls. knead well to make smooth. Cut dough into small pieces to make rolls about 4½ inches long by two inches wide. Form each into smooth roll with square ends. Place on greased pans far apart and stand in warm place 20 minutes; brush with butter, and bake in very hot oven 10 minutes, brush again with butter. Bake 5 minutes and serve hot or after kneading cut into small equal pieces, roll in floured hands, let rise, and bake in muffin tins as above; or divide into smaller pieces rolled into balls, place three in each muffin tin, let rise, and bake as above for Clover Leaf Rolls.

Butter Cakes. after mixing to smooth dough divide into pieces of equal size; shape lightly with floured hands and bake on greased griddle, iron frying pan or electric plate; allow to brown on bottom, rise well, and then turn, baking on other side until brown and thoroughly cooked; or bake as above in greased muffin rings; or, instead of shaping in hands, pat out on floured board, cut with biscuit cutter, and bake as above. Split while hot, butter, and serve immediately.

Graham Muffins

- 1 cup graham flour
- 1 cup flour
- ½ teaspoon salt
- 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
- 1 cup milk
- 1 egg
- 2 tablespoons molasses or sugar
- 3 tablespoons shortening

Mix together dry ingredients, add milk, beaten egg, molasses and melted shortening. Bake in greased muffin pans in hot oven about 25 minutes.

An Unfailing Rule

- For biscuit doughs—
- 2 level cups flour
- 4 level teaspoons baking powder

This proportion is standard.

The Most Remarkable Child in History

BY CHARLES L. GARTNER

TEN years ago—in March, 1912 to be more exact—the most remarkable child in the history of the world was born. In March, 1922, he celebrates his tenth birthday and yet, in this short space of time, he has more than outgrown the infant class. If the truth be told, before the baby was four years old his daddy thought it best, for the welfare of the child and all concerned, to secure the services of a foster-parent. With the acquisition of his second papa, and the careful attention of his real father, the child grew so big that now his name is a by-word in every civilized country in the world, and more people worship him every day and night of the week than is possible to conceive. People who never heard of Washington, Napoleon, Paderewski, Shakespeare, Longfellow or the Prince of Wales, pay homage to this child. The baby—but he is only that in years—speaks the only language known all over the world—the language of the picture.

The "child" is the motion picture; the "daddy" is Adolph Zukor, and the "foster-parent" is Jesse L. Lasky.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to the true date of the birth of the motion picture. Although the blage it is not difficult to guess what the plot would be. Promiscuous distribution of rifles, revolvers, blank cartridges and a few horses, and the picture was finished with the exception of the filming of it.

When Adolph Zukor, then president of the newly formed Famous Players Film Company, announced, in 1912, that he had secured the services of the incomparable Sarah Bernhardt to appear in a screen version of her own stage success, "Queen Elizabeth," the amusement world, especially in America, laughed—and refused to believe. The announcement was almost universally accepted merely as a cheap means of getting publicity for the new company, and for its head.

This announcement was taken with so much incredulity because, at that time, there wasn't an actor or actress of any reputation who would perform before the camera. The majority of the legitimate state stars regarded the motion pictures as a cheap form of amusement, more of a fad than anything else, and slated to die quickly. No one was willing to risk his or her reputation by appearing in any film, as they were considered degrading. Adolph Zukor, who

The appearance of Mme. Bernhardt in "Queen Elizabeth" had the effect desired by Mr. Zukor and it was not long before the American stage stars were being initiated into the mysteries of a motion picture studio. The success of "Queen Elizabeth" prompted Mr. Zukor to film prominent players in their greatest stage successes, figuring that the thousands of people all over the country who were unable to go to the big cities to witness the performance of these successes, would be just as satisfied to see them enacted upon the screen. His suppositions were correct and for the first time the people of Jonesville were able to see the stage successes of our most prominent stars without travelling out of town.

With the combination of the Famous Players Film Company and the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Film Company in 1916, Mr. Zukor, who remained the head of the big concern, took another great step forward. With large resources back of them, this company released success after success until today it has become a well known fact that fully seventy per cent of the big productions put on the market are Paramount Pictures, the brand name under which the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation releases its productions. In fact four of the most popular pictures made in the last year, and which incidentally were NOT advertised as million dollar productions, are "The Sheik," "The Affairs of Anatol," "The Little Minister" and "The Great Moment" all Paramount Pictures.

These four pictures are representative of the progress of the motion picture for, while "Queen Elizabeth" was an excellent production, especially for the time it was released, the facilities for the making of photoplays to-day are so far advanced over those of 1912 that an apt comparison is hardly possible. Only in point of dramatic art does "Queen Elizabeth" stand out today, for this generation, and perhaps no other, will ever see the equal of Sarah Bernhardt, the magnificent.

Where the director of those days was frequently also the camera man, the director today is a combination of the artist and student of dramatics. And the camera man today is an expert, and one who takes his job as his life work, always striving to bring improvements into his calling. Where the background of "Queen Elizabeth" was merely painted scenery, the modern motion picture "atmosphere" is the real thing, many producers sending their companies to film stories in the exact locale. And where it is impossible to send the players to the exact spots mentioned in the story, thousands of dollars are spent in getting faithful replicas. This was the case in Paramount's "The Little Minister" starring Betty Compson, which had as its locale the little village of Thrums, Scotland. A complete Scottish village was built for this picture, and before production work was even started many weeks had to be spent in weary research work in order to get all the details of costumes, habits, etc., correct.

But the motion picture is still advancing, and it is not unreasonable to assume that, ten years from now, films of to-day will be looked upon to be as crude as "Queen Elizabeth" looks to us now.

An astronomer was entertaining a Scotch friend. He showed his visitor the moon through a telescope and asked him what he thought of the satellite. "It's a right," replied the Scot, who was an enthusiastic golfer, "but it's awfu' fu' o' bunkers."

A TRIUMPHAL SCENE

This shows Sarah Bernhardt as "Queen Elizabeth" in the film play originally produced in the year 1912

motion picture, as a motion picture, had existed for some years prior to March, 1912, it was on this date that Adolph Zukor presented to the world, "Queen Elizabeth," the first big five reel feature in which a famous actress was starred, and in which any great amount of attention was given to furthering the dramatic excellence of the films. "Queen Elizabeth" was a five reel picturization, with Sarah Bernhardt, of Mme. Bernhardt's greatest stage success.

Prior to the release of "Queen Elizabeth" the motion picture was nothing more than a much abused commercial product, manufactured by a combine which thought of naught else but personal gain. The movies in those days were so crude in action and dramatic quality that a favorable comparison between them and the modern motion picture feature is impossible.

The old time "thrillers" invariably consisted of a girl, a man in a soldier's uniform, about fifteen "Indians," and a lot of open country. With this assem-up to that time had been a theatre owner, had tried to get the producers to raise the standard of their productions, but they refused. Mr. Zukor resolved to enter the producing end of the business and accordingly formed the Famous Players Film Company in 1912.

Realizing the necessity, and also the difficulty, in getting good players to act in films Mr. Zukor thought that if he got just one prominent actor or actress to make a picture, the rest of the members of the profession would not hesitate to follow suit. After trying in vain to convince the American Theatians of the future of the motion picture, Mr. Zukor sent a representative to France to try to persuade the greatest of them all, Sarah Bernhardt, to appear in a picture version of one of her greatest stage successes, "Queen Elizabeth." Realizing that through the camera would be the only way of preserving a living record, for future generations, of her art, Mme. Bernhardt consented and appeared in one of the first five-reel pictures ever made.

A doctor who had been overseas for nearly four years during the war came in rather wearily the other day and seated himself with a sigh in the most comfortable chair in the living-room. "Tired?" questioned his wife, with a sympathetic movement towards the tea-cups.

"Thanks. I'll have a muffin as well." After a few moments, the refreshed toiler regarded the world more cheerily and even went so far as to say: "That's a pretty waist. What are those shiny things on it?"

"Nail heads," was the reply. "Did you have a hard day?"

"Easier than usual. It wasn't that, I've just met some chaps from England and France—and another from Italy—and they seemed to think that there may be another war."

"If there's going to be another war," said his wife impressively, "what is the use of bringing up our boys so carefully? You saw for yourself just what war means."

"I think those chaps were all wrong," was the reply. "If the women of the world will only bring up their children to be gentle and tolerant there will be no more wars. Salute the flag, by all means—but respect the other man's salute, too."

THERE is a curious feeling among all sorts and conditions of people regarding money from the Government,

"Yes" was the reply of a mature spinster:—"for a foreigner or for a Canadian who is not of Scotch descent."

THIS is a world of uncertainties in which anything unexpected may occur. In this column for February there appeared a sentence of reflection on the probability of woman's accepting bribes or being guilty of graft, in connection with matters political. The opinion was attributed to a man, who had, indeed, been even more cynical on the subject than we reported. He believed that woman would be easily tempted by an Easter hat or a new gown:—whereas, man would be nobly above such a bribe. There followed, however, a paragraph discussing this question:—but this paragraph was lost to sight when the page was made up. Consequently, an indignant reader who accuses us of sympathy with the cynical man, though she is quite excusable in her protest, is mistaken as to our own attitude. We believe that woman will bring more seriousness, a keener sense of responsibility to the act of voting than does her brother. However, we also believe that it will be long before many women will seek political office. Mrs. Ralph Smith has retired from the speakership of the British Columbia Legislature and Mrs. Arthur Murphy ("Janey Canuck") may thank her lucky stars that the British North or anything in the nature of public aid. "Yes, I believe in Mothers' Pensions," said a bright-eyed alert woman the other day. "I worked hard to get them for others, but I should work my own fingers to the bone before I would let any of my children profit by them."

Now, the speaker is a widow who was left fifteen years ago with three small children to support—for the amount of life insurance proved sadly inadequate for the family's needs. So, the mother worked in a variety of ways to provide for and educate the two boys and the only girl. The elder son is now a successful physician, the daughter is a dietitian in a Western hospital and the younger son has finished a course in electric engineering—and the mother, at fifty-two years of age, has recently written a play which has been accepted by the movies.

"But why would you have been so unwilling to profit by the Mothers' Pensions?" asked an inquisitive friend.

"Oh," said the Lady of Independence. "I'm a good Canadian of Scotch descent, and, if I can't support the family, it will be because I'm dead. But, of course, I think the Mothers' Pensions a very good thing."

America Act does not admit a woman to the Senate of the Dominion. Mrs. Murphy would be bored to death in the Senate and would give up the position in disgust, to go and hunt for coal mines in Northern Alberta or go fishing in the Peace River. Nothing so dull as the Senate for that "blithe spirit," Janey Canuck!

Of course there will always be a few women who will wish for political office, but, even in such instances, you will find their activities centreing upon matters of public health and child welfare. The women who do choose a political career will take their housewifely instincts with them and will set to work to make the youngest citizens healthier and happier. In other words, even in Parliament, women will "mind the children and take an interest in housework." Those who imagine that the feminine forces of Canada will go Bolshevik on "Red" are quite mistaken. There is no Madame Defarge in Canada—or, rather, there is no sisterhood of that type. In a constructive policy "For Home and Country" will be found the Canadian woman

You Needn't Have Gray Hair At Any Age

The smart hat you choose won't make you seem any younger if your hair is gray, which it needn't be. Science has perfected a safe, sure and easy way to stop graying hair and bring back and keep the natural color. This you can learn for yourself by accepting our free offer.

You take no risk, for the test is made on a single lock and results tell their own story. When you see how even and beautiful is the restored color and how easily accomplished, you will start at once to restore and beautify all your hair.

A clear, colorless liquid

Mary T. Goldman's Hair Color Restorer is a clear colorless liquid, clean and clear as water. Applied by combing—no skill or outside aid required.

No danger of the streaking or discoloration, which is worse than gray hair. There is nothing to wash or rub off—no interference with shampooing.

Beware of experiments

If you try to restore your hair with some unknown product and it doesn't turn out well there is nothing to do. The streaked, discolored hair which is so mortifying will have to grow out again and this is a slow process.

You take no risk when you use Mary T. Goldman's, which is a tested laboratory product, every bottle efficient and reliable, results always the same. Remember this when you are urged to try something just as good.

The Canadian Spirit

keep pace with the development of the nation. And I want to point out a few of the ways in which this "Spirit of the whole" may be shown.

On thing, and we have already intimated this, that would contribute largely would be Canadians all pulling on the same rope in the great tug of war when the interests of Canada are at stake. I would like to see one, just one, general election, where the old bludgeons of racial and religious differences were not wielded. Now, I do not know at first hand, for I have not had the opportunity to be amongst the people of the upper province to find out; but I have a sort of lingering suspicion, as Uncle Josh says, that one would find a pretty fair amount of Canadian loyalty there.

Politics at the present time is but a mere game. We have a few statesmen. And if some of the budding statesmen of our nation are at all anxious that their name shall go down to posterity, they will need to develop the "All-Canadian" spirit to its limit. And it will take a mighty lot of developing before it reaches the limit, believe me.

Now, the working out of this spirit of pulling together is the more necessary to-day, because we are fast becoming a nation of nations. I think if I were taking up my abode in some other country, and found upon my arrival there that the people were all working harmoniously, I should naturally conclude that it was a good place to live. If on the other hand, I found every fellow working for himself and the devil pretty close to the hindmost, I should just as naturally try to have a little Canada of my own right there. If, then, these men who are coming to our shores to make Canada their home, find a real "esprit de corps" when they reach here, it rather strikes me that they will be willing to allow themselves to become part of the concern.

There is no evading the fact, the so-called "Wop" is becoming a factor in our Canadian life, and our only safety lies in being able to assimilate him. He is the main good material, and we want to use him; but first and foremost we must see to it that he is a good Canadian.

In passing let me also say, that a serious menace to the "esprit de corps" in any body is the financial danger. The Savior of mankind was betrayed because there was a profiteer in the little group of disciples. "Judas was a thief and carried the bag. That tells the whole story, and the chief difference between this early thief and some of his twentieth century descendants is the fact that Judas had self respect enough to go and hang himself. In other respects they are much the same.

We thought, that is some of us thought, that when the war became a thing of the past profiteering would soon disappear. We regarded it as a sort of necessary evil; but like toothache and chilblains the profiteer still lingers with us, and is just about as welcome. And it is not all with the big concerns. In fact many of these who are in the limelight could not continue very well; but in many a country town you will find a Shylock behind the counter waiting for his pound of flesh. Not long ago I was being waited on by the proprietor of one of the leading stores in a certain town. The price quoted on the article in question was just about two hundred per cent. higher than it should have been. He was charging the price of four or five years ago and knew it, for when I demurred he offered to put the goods in to me at such a reduction that I was almost taken off my feet. Almost, for I did not buy.

We have mentioned briefly two of the things that go to make up Canadian Spirit,—a real appreciation of our land, and a spirit of unity. There are two or three other things, and then I have done,—for this time.

I think I may say without any danger of having it challenged, that the Canadian Spirit may be and should be exemplified in good honest work. And I may say right here I am not theorizing nor speculating. I have beheld with my eye and have heard with my ear, and my little quoter of gray matter has done the rest. Everybody knows how that a few years ago the working man was ready and willing to do an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. But those halcyon days are past; the storm is upon us, and men in many instances work much harder to get rid of good work than they ever did to work their ten hours for so much per.

Of course this is not true of all the working men, and I hope it is not true of even the greater part of them; but I have had considerable to do with laboring men during the last year or two, and while my prejudices were all in their favor, I came out of it wondering if some of them were ever bothered with that little contrivance known as a conscience. Perhaps they are not being worn now; at any rate in many cases they seem to be conspicuous by their absence.

An attitude like this is detrimental to all concerned. Let us commence with the employer. It is not a fair deal to take a man's money for eight hours work, and then put in about half that time. When I agree to work for a certain amount per hour, then my time during those hours belongs to the man who pays that per.

But it is not fair to the man who is doing the working. The man who lies down on his job, or who lies down alongside of it, is untrue to his better self. Every hour I have the privilege to work I am fitting myself to tackle something bigger and better. And the man who spends a part of his time watching the clock and thinking of the pay envelope is, one of these days, going to develop into a first-class parasite. Good honest work is a blessing; I know whereof I speak.

Yes, one of the big factors that must not be ignored in our national development is the matter of work. For a time after the war it was inevitable that strikes should take place. Everyone was uneasy, and men entered strikes in much the same spirit that they went to a ball game. But now these things are beginning to fizzle out, and life is settling down once more. Now, the big watchword is WORK! And whether it be in the office chair as an executive, or an employee at the machine, let every man feel proud of the fact that he is a worker. Only real work, brain or brawn, will turn the trick for Canada.

Let us speak of raw material. We would not forget the human material that goes across the border year after year to find work of one sort or another. True, some of it is raw enough. Nevertheless we need these young men and women here at home. It seems too bad that the average young man has such a hankering after the Yankee dollar; and in many cases he will work at something "over there" that if the same thing were shown to him here, he would have nothing but everlasting contempt for you. Oh, if we could only get the real spirit that we believe is in the heart of every true Canadian to assert itself. I wonder if some of this thing is not due to the early training, or lack of training upon the part of parents and others. The writer has lived for several years across the border and has often noted the manner in which the young people are taught their duty to the Republic. We know that we have just as good material in our young men and women, there is just as much loyalty as can be found anywhere else under the sun; but I fear that it is under-developed and lacks nourishment.

Why, in many cases, it is even held up to the boys and girls that if they wish to make good they must go to the States. We need a campaign of education along this line. We need to show our young people that Canadians have made good right here in their own Dominion. In most of the Sunday School literature to-day, which by the way comes from another country, the characters held up to the little ones are the great men of the Republic. Is a boy to be stirred to greater things, show him Abraham Lincoln; is truthfulness the theme, then there is George Washington and his little hatchet. And with all due regard to these great and good men, the Canadian halls of fame have portraits of men who "lived, felt dawn, saw sunset's glow" under an old bit of bunting we love to call the "Union Jack."

And the counters of the bookstores are piled high with all the yellow piffle imaginable from the cities of Uncle Sam, but in many cases if you ask for a Canadian publication, you are told that they do not sell well. Not long ago I asked for a certain Canadian monthly in a bookstore, and the enterprising (?) proprietor informed me that it was a poor seller. I wondered why, for I felt it to be quite the equal of corresponding magazines from New York. So I asked if he had ever handled it, and he replied, "No, but it is seldom called for." I could not help retorting, "Get your customer acquainted with it, and you will find them calling for it." It strikes me that if the grocers were to display common sense as some of the news stands, the people would starve to death in short order.

These then, are some of the things that go to make up Canadian Spirit. There are many other things, but these are a few of the most important. But they must be worked out in the life of the nation to be of any use. Otherwise they become a mere "scrap of paper." Let us get to work with a "strong pull and a pull together," for remember the Irishman was more than half right when he told a boy that his "past was all ahead of him."

A Variety of Comment

but to-day Canadian goods were marked. The recent rule that imported goods should be marked with the country of their origin had been withdrawn and the speaker suggested that the Local Council might do useful work by getting that rule put into force.

NOW that Canada boasts of several Cat Shows during the year, the recent proposal to establish a Cat Fanciers' Union is not so curious as it sounds. There seems to be no happy medium in the regard for the cat. It is either greatly favored or quite detested. Sailors seem to be fond of cats, soldiers seldom like them. Women are usually the cat fanciers;—and cynical men will say this is a case of affinity. "It may be all very well," says a writer in the "Montreal Daily Star," to combine with American Unions, but Canada is big enough to have a Union of its own, and our cats are as good as any other cats on the Continent. Indeed, they will challenge comparison with the feline tribe anywhere, on general principles. That cats are entitled to special protection on the score of their remarkable history and the high regard in which they have been held by people of prominence from the very earliest times, it would be easy to prove. Our worthy historians of ancient Egypt, Herodotus and Diodorus, assure us that for many centuries the cat was sustained in large numbers in the Nile Valley, was held sacred to an extraordinary degree, and was embalmed after death. There were special precincts provided for them, and within these they were fed on bread and milk and on fish from the Nile. Special lands were dedicated to them, and the profits of these lands, known as the cat-lands, were devoted to the care and feeding of the cats. This, it has been recently suggested by a writer in the "Contemporary Review" explain why cats love particular places rather than persons nowadays. It is a sort of hereditary instinct, an inheritance from their halcyon days in old Egypt.

"Even in modern times, this respect for the cat has been a feature of the Egyptian administration. The Kadi used to have all the homeless cats in Cairo fed at his expense, and one Turkish Sultan actually bequeathed a garden near his mosque for the special benefit of cats. We do not anticipate any movement on the part of the Government or civic authorities here along similar lines, but there are excellent reasons why the interests of the cat should be safeguarded, and if, by the establishment of a Cat Fanciers' Union, people can be taught any more than they now know about caring for cats, treating them kindly, and ensuring that they are provided for during holiday periods when the household goes away, then by all means let us have that union established. The rhyme about loving little pussie because her coat is so warm has, we fear, become in many ways a legend of the past. It is time it was revived as a cardinal truth to teach the youngsters of to-day."

away up near the shoulder. And—Yes—Joy—I saw a little black place on the centre of it. Quite a lump, too. But the diagnosis was not in doubt for a moment. It was an enlarged gland. One of these nice, sebaceous, oily glands that take care of the skin. The duct out of which "sebum" should have come had got accidentally stopped up. And the secretion had gone on filling the duct for a year or more. The duct had enlarged and got filled up, packed tight, and that had made the lump.

"Mrs. C., it is all right," I said. "This is a little gland in your skin that has got filled up and hard and I will just squeeze it out for you and then there will be no lump. It will hurt a very little. So a bit of soft gauze and a firm steady squeeze—there was a "popping" report—a little explosion under the pressure—and the lump was gone!

It was worth a thousand dollars to see Mary's face and no doubt one look at her husband's face would have been worth a thousand more.

So if you are afraid of cancer go to your own doctor to-day and get him to tell you all about it. What is it that makes you feel afraid? Tell him, and he will make it clear to you whether there is any real need for fear or not and what you can do to be safe and sure and not anxious or sorry. Do not neglect any warning about your bodily health. Do not pass over in silence anything about your body that is different from what it used to be, or that you do not understand.

The CLEAN TRAVELER

THE thousand-room hotel today advertises a thousand baths. Of all home comforts which luxurious modern travel provides, simple cleanliness stands easily first.

And this is the reason Fairy Soap, the whitest, simplest soap of all, is to be found in the traveling outfits of a large number of men and women. Cleanly folk, as they travel along, want to be doubly sure of the same refreshing soap-and-water comfort that Fairy gives them at home.

The almost-white floating soaps, which appeared a generation ago, pointed the way. Fairy Soap brought the idea to its ultimate perfection. One need only observe the households and clubs and Turkish baths in which Fairy is standard for baths, toilet and general cleansing uses, to understand why the Fairy fashion is extending in every neighborhood in America and abroad.

Fairy acknowledges no rival.

The Master Workman

BY BURTON RICHARDS

IN a long, low work-room hung with models of all sorts, at a bench in a dark corner where the sun never found his way, patiently worked a lad.

For months he had toiled on, carefully fashioning a curve, smoothing an edge, ever striving, ever hoping. Anon he questioned an old man who stood near him. He, too, was patiently toiling, though his shoulders were bent and his hands so trembling that he could not steady the tools.

"And is it truly so?" the boy said, as he had said so many times before. "If I fashion the wood my best, if I am careful here and here, if I should make a perfect work, would I see Him? Would I really look upon His face?"

"Aye, aye, Lad, I ween so," the old man made answer. "There be those that say the Master notes only a perfect work and then there be those that say He shows His face to them who only strive if so be they be earnest and faithful. I do not know, Lad," and the old man shook his head sorrowfully.

"But thou hast seen Him, the Master Workman, hast thou not?" persisted the child. "Brother Pierre said—"

"Aye, Lad," interrupted the other angrily, "Brother Pierre should not talk, —nay, nay," checking his speech.—"I will tell thee, Lad. Thou'rt fond of me?"

For answer the lad drew close to his side and pressed his head lovingly against the old man's shoulder.

"Aye, Lad," he said, "it is well," and laid down his knife and drew his iron from the edge of the fire and made as if he would sit and talk. The lad waited long in silence; when he could wait no longer, he said gently, "Why hast thou made nothing but these, Father?" pointing to rows and rows of bowls on the shelf above them. The first rows were rough, some of them imperfect to the eye, but growing each better than the last to the middle shelves, where were rows on rows of perfect shapes, fair, without blemish. Again some of the last fashioned had lost some of their grace where the trembling hands had failed in their purpose.

The old man looked up from his reverie with a glance of pride at his handiwork.

"Ah, Lad," he said, "that is the story. I will tell thee. It was long, long ago in the days of my youth. I was such a lad as thou, here, I had worked long, even as thou hast, cheered by the hope of a glimpse of that marvelous face which men have been willing to die for, having once looked upon. I had questioned, even as thou hast questioned, and they had told me, even as I have told thee, that the work must be without flaw and perfect in the Master's sight. On this day I had striven from early morning to near sunset, Lad, on a flower, a single last petal of the passion flower of our Lord's crucifix. I had but just time to finish before dark and I wrought very earnestly, for who might know but that night the Master Workman would choose to come in to see our work? Just as I was fashioning an exquisite curve that made me weep for the very chasteness of its beauty,—I love the carving, Lad,—a voice called me through the window. I paid no heed, for was I not fashioning for the Master Workman? Naught should hinder. Again came the voice and this time it was the voice of a child. 'Please, for the love of God, give food.' Outside the window stood a little lad, smaller than thou, Son, and a blind old man. I cried out angrily, 'Get thee gone. I work for the Master to-day,' but yet they stood and the lad pleaded. I looked at the flower, every curve calling me to its perfection, then I looked at the beggars, standing there, lone and hungry. Something in my heart stirred me to help. I rose and went toward the window. Halfway I turned back, so, Lad," and he turned his head to smile full upon the boy's eager face, "so, to look at the flower, and lo, it was red, Son, crimson as the wine in the holy communion. Then I stayed no longer, but hurrying to the bench I caught up a bowl that I had begun days before a piece of work but rudely hewn. With the chisel I clipped off a corner here, smoothed a roughness and not daring to look again at the flower I hastened to the town and returned with the bowl overflowing with food for the beggars. The old man blessed me again and again before he tasted the food but the child could scarcely wait for an 'Ave' so great was his need. I left the bowl with them. Darkness had fallen. I could work no more that night but I stole to the shop and crept in just to lay my hand on the beloved flower, to feel its beauty, to joy in the knowledge that I had made a wellnigh perfect thing. I thought, Lad, that must be worth the Master's notice. I sat by the bench, here, long, with my hand touching the precious thing, and so, sitting, I fell asleep.

"After long, perhaps, I woke gently, as one wakes under the skies with the breath of gentle wind. I was alone, yet a gentle Presence stirred among the woods and tools. I felt for the flower and lo, Son, again it glowed red on the crucifix like our Saviour's blood. I looked but saw no thing. I only felt a nearness of something sweet and pure and holy. Long I waited and the flower ever grew brighter until at last the Presence stood by me, and then, a voice, Son, that spoke to me e'en as I to thee now, a voice,—ah, Son, the beauty and tenderness of that voice"—and the old man paused as if loath to frame in common speech the glory of that remembrance. The lad laid his hand gently against the old man's cheek. He, too, was hearing the voice.

After a minute the old man resumed looking full into the questioning eyes before him.

"Ave, Lad, thou shalt know. The voice said, 'I have seen thy work. Well done, Son. Thy beggar's bowl is dear to me.'"

Again the man paused and laid his hand lovingly among his tools.

"Now thou canst see, Lad, why I have made bowls. I am always striving to make a bowl that shall bring me the joy of His face. There are many poor ones, but perchance, by and by,—I shall make one,—this one even here, perchance," and he took up the work which his aged hands were so painfully shaping.

"Ah if I only might see Him," the lad sighed as he turned to his bench.

THROUGH the long day they toiled, the old man full of hope, patiently guiding his tools with trembling hands, for might not this be the very bowl which should gain him the loved sight of the Master?

At night the bowl was done. In the eyes of the old man it was fair indeed. The others shook their heads and some even smiled, but he was joyous. "That will surely please the Master," he said, as he lovingly patted it and set it out on his bench that the Master should not fail to see it.

The Transplanting of Ann Young

The kitchen stove stood black and cold. At noon Amelia arose and went out once more into the yard. "Mother, mother," she called over and over again, and her voice had in it a sharp note of pain. As she stood there in the noontide hush Andrew Vane came across the intervening fields. He had his hoe in his hand and he looked at Amelia, inquiringly. "It's mother," she began. "She's been gone since early this morning. I've been all over the house an' she ain't there. I don't know of anywheres else she could hev gone to."

Andrew Vane asked no questions. "You'd better go back in the house, 'Melia. I'll go over an' hitch up an' see what I can do. Don't you worry."

Amelia stood watching him as he went back across lots to his own home. Then she turned and went into the house. She sat down once more in her mother's rocking chair beside the kitchen window. In the middle of the afternoon she got up and made herself a cup of tea. She drank it hurriedly and took her place again at the window. She sat on dully all through the long afternoon. The air held in it a strange, expectant hush. The shadows lay still on the summer fields. At sunset she went upstairs. She was gone some time and when she came down again she built a fire in the kitchen stove and put on the teakettle.

The light waned on the far hills. It was just dusk when a little, bent figure came trembling across the yard and up to the kitchen door.

"Oh, mother, where hev you been?" Amelia's voice was high and strained.

Ann Young stood in the doorway, a pitiful little figure. There were wisps of hay in her thin gray hair, and her best black dress and bonnet were covered with dust and cobwebs. Her face was streaked with dirt. "Oh, 'Melia, I couldn't help it. I run away. I've been a-hidin' up in the barn loft. I got to thinkin' after you'd gone an' I couldn't stan' it no longer. Oh, 'Melia, I hadn't never been anywheres else in my whole life. I've been up there hidin' all day. I heard you a-callin'. I couldn't help it, 'Melia. But I've come back, an' we kin go now, can't we?"

She stood there, a little shrinking figure in the fading dusk. Amelia Young went up to her and put her hand on the old woman's shoulder. "You come right into the house, mother, an' take off your things an' set down in the chair. I've unpacked all the things an' put 'em back where they b'long. Now I'm a-goin' to get us some supper."

Old Mrs. Young began to cry. "Now see here mother. Don't you go to cryin'. You'll feel better after you've had a cup o' hot tea." There was a step on the porch and a sudden shadow fell across the floor as Andrew Vane stood in the doorway. "I'm goin' to make a batch o' warm biscuits, too. I've got the table all set, an' Andrew, you'd better come in an' hev some supper."

The Master Workman

Just then there was a commotion at the other end of the room and the voice of the lad, sobbing piteously. "Ah, my cup, my beautiful cup,—I surely hoped the Master would see it, my beautiful cup, it is gone,—"

The lad had been working for days on a tiny cup, delicately curved and thin to fragility, a marvel of skill for so young a workman. So beautiful was it, that the older workmen had stood by at times to watch the work. The lad had just taken it to the smoothing table and returning had but touched it lightly against a bench and had shattered it. His grief was pitiful.

"If the Master Workman comes to-night I shall have nothing on my bench, nothing for all these days,—" and his sobs arose again.

The old man turned thoughtfully toward his own bench and looked lovingly upon his bowl.

After all were gone that night, a bent figure stole into the work-room in the moonlight and hurried to the bowl. It was the old man and he had come to make the supreme sacrifice. Twice he lifted the bowl and twice he replaced it. "The lad is young," he murmured, "and I am old. The bowl is fine, it is my best. If the lad could see the Master's face,—but I love the lad,—" and he quickly took up the bowl and bore it tenderly to the lad's bench and set it there. "Such a fine bowl for a lad," he said to himself. "The Master must like it."

Then, lest his desire should change him, he turned to hurry away. There was a stir, a glory in the room, a pæan of joy in his heart. A radiance filled the air and at last he stood face to face with the Master Workman, and in fullness of love he fell asleep there in His presence.

Your Heritage From Eve

Nature intended that women should be beautiful—it is part of the Great Plan. Every woman has inherent beauty that should be cultivated. Let Elizabeth Arden be your guide. She is the "counsel in personal loveliness" for the social leaders of Europe and America, and recommends these preparations for a good complexion:

VENETIAN PORE CREAM—reduces coarse pores and refines a relaxed skin. $1.
VENETIAN ANTI-WRINKLE CREAM—keeps the face smooth and unlined. $2.
VENETIAN CLEANSING CREAM—melts on the skin and rids the pores of all impurities. $1, $2.

Write Elizabeth Arden a frank description of yourself. She will send you her booklet "The Quest of the Beautiful" with personal advice.

Anecdotal

IN his amusing book, "More Bulls and Blunders," Sir J. C. Percy tells the following. A well-known character in the West died, one of ready wit, but not possessed of the best habits for success in life; yet his wife, sorely tried, kept things going with some show of comfort. She wept and showed great grief at the funeral, and wished to lie in the grave with him. When the last sod was planted, the mourners retired to the inn that stood close by the graveyard, and the usual comforts were resorted to by the chief mourners. One man paid special attention to the widow, and at last, taking courage in both hands, said, "Now, Mary, there's no use in breaking your heart for poor Mick that's gone. The likes of him was not within the four walls of the world, but I have been thinking of how he could to some extent taking with him a small hand-bag. The train happened to be very late in arriving, so the M.P. engaged a room at the first hotel he came across. When the servant showed him to his room he noticed that the man did not seem very inclined to leave, and was looking at him somewhat suspiciously, so at last the M.P. asked him if there was anything he wanted to say. "Please, sir," said the man, "my instructions are, when a man hasn't any luggage, to ask him to pay in advance." "But I've got luggage," indignantly retorted the M.P., pointing to his little hand-bag. "I know, sir," answered the man meekly, "but you've stayed too long on that already."

be replaced to you by offering myself, joining our bits of ground together, and what with the litter of pigs and the few pounds I have in the heel of the stocking it might make up to some extent the loss you have had." Mary wiped her eyes, and with bent head and swaying body mournfully replied, "Tom, I'm deeply grateful for the tender words you have said to the poor broken-hearted widow in her sorrow this day, but I am sorry you spoke too late, for Pat Doolan offered me the same consolation at the wake last night, and there, in the prsence of the corpse, I couldn't refuse him."

A certain Member of Parliament was to speak in a town up north, so he travelled up from London over night, merely sole him, but without avail. Presently a sympathetic old lady came along. "What's the matter, little one?" she asked.

"Got my new trousers covered with dust," sobbed the boy.

"But they're clean now, dear," continued the lady.

"I know they are," wailed the lad.

"Then why do you still cry, child?"

"Cause mother wouldn't let me take 'em off when she dusted 'em."

Nothing So Beautiful

As a wealth of well-groomed hair

Nothing so beautiful and nothing more easily attained—if you know how. Satiny, silky, glossy hair is the reward of intelligent care. Follow the suggestions we give you here and prove it.

Begin by learning how to shampoo, for this is all-important. The first step is a bottle of Palmolive Shampoo, the blend of palm and olive oils. Use as directed and watch results.

First is the wonderful softness you have never before experienced after washing. There is none of the usual harsh dryness and flyaway brittleness.

Your hair is wonderfully silky in texture, with a beautiful satiny gloss. Most important, your scalp is healthfully cleansed from every trace of scurf and dandruff. Ordinary shampooing doesn't get these results. They come from the action of palm and olive oils, the softening, soothing cleansers discovered 3,000 years ago in ancient Egypt.

Olive oil for gloss—palm oil for richness

Olive oil possesses softening qualities which neutralize the drying effects of washing. Palm oil contributes body, richness and lasting qualities.

In combination they produce a thick, mild, profuse, penetrating lather which softens the scalp and reaches every root and hair cell.

This lather loosens the dandruff scales, dislodges and dissolves them, leaving the scalp and hair free to function healthfully.

The greatest benefit

This thorough removal of dandruff, which doctors call seborrhea, is most necessary, as even the accumulation on healthy scalps injures the hair.

The dry, oily scales clog the roots of the hair, preventing proper nutrition. Soon the hair begins to fall out. The blend of palm and olive oils you get in Palmolive softens and penetrates the scales, loosening the cap-like accumulation.

Gentle massage forces it into the tissue of the scalp, leaving it healthfully purged and clean. Hair shampooed with Palmolive is never dry, harsh and brittle. The blending of these soothing oils leaves it soft, glossy and silky.

Trial bottle free

We will gladly send you a trial bottle of Palmolive Shampoo, free, if you will write a postal-card request. Just say "Send me the free trial bottle of Palmolive Shampoo" and sign your name and address. It will come to you by return mail, accompanied by a valuable book of directions for simple home treatments which beautify your hair and help it grow. Address Dept. B-260.

Keep That Wedding Day Complexion

The blushing bride of today should be the blooming matron of tomorrow, retaining the charm of girlhood's freshness to enhance radiant maturity.

For bridal beauty should not fade, nor the passing of each anniversary be recorded on your face.

Keep the schoolgirl complexion which graced your wedding day, and you will keep your youth. With a fresh, smooth skin, no woman ever seems old.

The problem of keeping such a complexion was solved centuries ago. The method is simple—the means within the reach of all.

Cosmetic cleansing the secret

To keep your complexion fresh and smooth you must keep it scrupulously clean. You can't allow dirt, oil and perspiration to collect and clog the pores if you value clearness and fine texture.

You can't depend on cold cream to do this cleansing—repeated applications help fill up the pores. The best way is to wash your face with the mild, soothing lather blended from palm and olive oils, the cleansers used by Cleopatra.

Science has combined these two Oriental oils in the bland, balmy facial soap which bears their name. You need never be afraid of the effects of soap and water if the soap you use is Palmolive.

How it acts

The rich, profuse lather, massaged into the skin, penetrates the pores and removes every trace of the clogging accumulations which, when neglected, make the skin texture coarse and cause blackheads and blotches.

It softens the skin and keeps it flexible and smooth. It freshens and stimulates, encouraging firmness and attractive natural color.

Oily skins won't need cold creams or lotions after using Palmolive. If the skin is inclined to dryness, the time to apply cold cream is after this cosmetic cleansing.

And remember, powder and rouge are perfectly harmless when applied to a clean skin and removed carefully once a day.

Don't keep it only for your face

Complexion beauty should extend to the throat, neck and shoulders. These are quite as conspicuous as your face for beauty or the lack of it.

Give them the same beautifying cleansing that you do your face and they will become soft, white and smooth. Use it regularly for bathing and let it do for your body what it does for your face.

Not too expensive

Although Palmolive is the finest, mildest facial soap that can be produced, the price is not too high to permit general use on the washstand for bathing.

This moderate price is due to popularity, to the enormous demand which keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night, and necessitates the importation of the costly oils in vast quantity.

Thus, soap which would cost at least 25 cents a cake if made in small quantities, is offered for only 10 cents, a price all can afford. The old-time luxury of the few may now be enjoyed the world over.

EDITORIAL CHAT

THE April issue of this magazine comes to you in an essentially spring-like garb. Perhaps the delightful young person perched among the blossoms is a little in advance of the season; but you may consider her in the light of a pleasant little prophetess who wishes the world to know that spring is at the door. In the matter of seasons, you may have noticed that we have changed from the old times very much and are actually introducing straw hats in February. In fact, ever so many brides of the last month of winter had hats of navy-blue straw, to match the going-away suit. I don't know why brides insist on going away in suits of either nigger-brown or navy-blue; but, if you will write to Miss Storey about it I've no doubt she can explain, for she tells us about the fashions in four whole columns every month, and I have noticed that what she says comes true. Of course you are interested in the fashions, if you are a woman reader; and perhaps you'll notice what interesting pages of knitted or crocheted goods we have been getting. There is no use in denying that every woman is more-or-less interested in what goes into a hope chest. You know that, if you are not going to be a June bride, yourself, this year, you are going to make a camisole or some other dainty bit of lingerie, for a girl who has chosen the loveliest month of the year for her wedding. Wherefore, give heed to our pages, where the fancy things in needlework are displayed:—and your friends will have reason to bless your good taste and industry. There are many pages within our covers which will make you friends of ours; but there are no pages which will make more lasting attachments (so we have discovered) between publisher and reader than those which deal with "the styles." It is my fond belief that Eve must have been terribly lonesome without another woman to talk over fashions in fig aprons with her.

* * *

THERE are two writers who have more than once contributed to the pages of this magazine who are sending out books this spring:—and we are rather glad that the writers are women—Miss de la Roche, who belongs to Toronto by birth, and whom her New York publisher calls a "new American writer," has written many short stories and has now gathered some of these into a connected narrative called "Explorers of the Dawn." You'll miss one of the most unusual books of the year if you do not read about the adventures of the Angel, the Seraph and John:—and if you wish to know more about this delightful trio you'll find a paragraph or two in "The Book Corner," where we try to say a few words about the "Silent Friends" who come and tell their stories and impart their wisdom. John and his two small brothers are among the best and brightest who have come and we hope that you will give them a place at your fireside.

Then Miss Pickthall, whose book of poems, "Drift of Pinions," is one of the most exquisite volumes of verse produced in Canada, has written a novel, "The Bridge," a tale of the Great Lakes, which is a remarkable achievement in imaginative prose. Miss Pickthall was born in England, but has spent most of her life in Toronto and calls herself a "Canadian" in writing to "The Century," her New York publishers. We may come to the conclusion, then, that this writer, who was born in England, who spent her girlhood years in Toronto and is now a resident of British Columbia, has definitely adopted this Dominion—which proudly claims her as a daughter. Miss Pickthall has recently sent us three stories for publication in the Canadian Home Journal, and we are sure that our readers will find them of absorbing interest. Watch for "The Blossoming," when the May number comes.

* * *

THE articles by Mr. Collier Stevenson on the various apartments of the house are continued in our April issue, and you are asked to step into the "Cheerful Dining Room." The rooms, as pictured and described, are all delightful:—but wouldn't you just rejoice in having all your meals for the summer months in such a dining-room as that which opens on a fair stretch of woodland? The walls, and the ceiling, we are told, are finished in a flat paint of a light ivory tone, while the wood-work is enamelled a slightly deeper ivory. We like to hear that the straight inner hangings are of a cool, quiet sea-green and we're quite sure that the mahogany furniture, upholstered in dark brown Spanish leather is all that it should be. The other dining-rooms are, doubtless, most attractive, also, but we insist on the one with unpatterned rugs and sea-green hangings:—with dashes of terra cotta as a brightening element. The other rooms will follow, in due course, and we know that you will find each article of interest.

The serial, "The Idol of Youth," which opens in this month, is one which should be of the deepest interest to everyone who has an adventure-loving heart. It is not everyone who can dash about and rescue distressed damsels and win wagers from American plutocrats all in one evening, Russia, England and Monte Carlo have their place in these opening chapters:—and the heroine, "La Mysterieuse," is as fascinating a young creature as any dauntless hero might desire to win. Just what is going to happen at Monte Carlo we do not know:—but there are lost pearls and a wrecked, historic biplane—to say nothing of a wonderful dog named "Petro"—and you'll not be bored by a single page of this mile-a-minute Story.

* * *

YOU all know the old saying: "Let me make the songs of a nation and I care not who makes its laws." That is only a way of saying that music must be a part of the life of the community. This magazine is fortunate in having, as the writer of the musical department, Mr. Hector Charlesworth, who is known, nationally and internationally, as an authoritative critic on matters of music and drama. In our April issue Mr. Charlesworth writes on "Making Music Safe for Democracy," considering the present movement for the spread of communal music. This subject is one in which all our readers are interested and should be helpful as giving the most advanced ideas and plans in connection with a movement which means the pleasure and enlightenment of the community. The article which Mr. Charlesworth wrote for us a year ago on "The Mendelssohn Choir" was reproduced in February for every programme of the cycle, a recognition of the accuracy and discernment of this writer on the happiest of themes.

Makes paint look like new

The real naphtha in Fels-Naptha makes the dirt let go, and brings back the bright, fresh, clean appearance to painted woodwork.

Helps the washing-machine

It pays you to chip Fels-Naptha into the washing-machine to get the benefit of naphtha. The real naphtha in Fels-Naptha loosens the dirt before the washing-machine starts its work. Then the Fels-Naptha soapy water flushes away all the dirt.

For fine lace curtains

With no other soap can you wash lace curtains so snowy white and with so little effort as with Fels-Naptha. It soaks the dirt loose, and safely makes all filmy fabrics thoroughly clean.

Be sure the soap you use has real naphtha in it. Smell it! The clean naphtha odor proves there is real naphtha in Fels-Naptha.

Takes spots from rugs

How easily and quickly Fels-Naptha cleans and brightens rugs, carpets and draperies! The naphtha dissolves grease, loosens dirt and restores perfect cleanliness.

The double cleaner for easier housecleaning

Quickly, thoroughly and safely, Fels-Naptha makes everything it touches clean, sweet, sanitary. And a thoroughly clean home means better health for the family.

Because Fels-Naptha is splendid soap and real naphtha, combined by the original Fels-Naptha method, it gives a soap-and-water cleaning and a naphtha cleaning at the same time. That makes it different from all other soaps.

Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naphtha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naphtha in a way that brings out the best in these two great cleaners—a way that has never been successfully imitated! Begin using Fels-Naptha today.

FREE If you haven't had an opportunity to prove that Fels-Naptha is a superior soap for the laundry and all household cleaning, send for free sample. Write Fels-Naptha Soap, Philadelphia.

Soft blankets and woolens

White and fluffy they come from a Fels-Naptha wash! The real naphtha in Fels-Naptha loosens the dirt; the soapy water flushes all dirt away; the naphtha vanishes, carrying all odors with it. Then the woolens are clean through and through.

"Oh, so do I. Let us have patience and wait till we can start out free. But Ross, tell me about this drill and how it works. I never saw one."

"You must come over to-morrow and see it for yourself. It's quite a ponderous piece of machinery, run by a gasoline engine, and it requires three men to manage it. I'm rather interested in machinery, and am sure I could undertake a job myself. I was glad of the chance to come with Mr. Cox, as I knew you'd be here. In fact, that is why I offered for the job."

"Mr. Temple is extremely anxious to get a well. He had a machine similar to this one there last year, and he has spent hundreds of dollars on it al-

"It's a dear little dove-grey house, nestling on a green hillside above a broad blue lake, dotted with white sails. There are windows on all sides, and quaint little gables in the roof. A veranda runs nearly all round. Rambling roses and clematis, jasmine and ivy twine around the veranda pillars, and ferns and flowers fill in every odd corner. Little flower beds and pretty shade trees dot the sloping lawn. A flower-bordered pathway winds down to the rocky shore, where wild flowers and grape vines run riot and have their own sweet way."

"There are not very many rooms in this little house, but every one is neat and bright and altogether homey. The front door opens into the hall, the folding doors lead from the hall into the brightest of parlors on the right, and on the left—"

"Oh, wait a bit," he interrupted. "Don't slur over that parlor, please. I want to see it."

"Well, little Witch Hazel," he whispered. "How would you like to exchange your city office for this?"

ready, but it seems there is no water on his place. I heard him tell Mr. Cox that if he would undertake a contract to dig a well, he would pay three hundred down for the job, but not a cent if the undertaking proved a failure. Mr. Cox wouldn't agree to those terms, it seemed too risky."

A fire of excitement suddenly kindled in Hazel's eyes. "Three hundred dollars!" she exclaimed. "That's the very sum you say you need to start our little house. O Ross!"

An answering spark kindled in the grey eyes that met her own. "That very thought has been haunting me ever since," he smiled; "but Girlie, it's too perilous a scheme for me to entertain. I can't afford to lose. Let us forget it. Come, tell me about your little home of dreams—the kind of home you'd like to have. Let's just amuse ourselves awhile."

"That will be lovely," she answered with a low, happy laugh, nestling contentedly against his broad shoulder.

And do you know, Ross, the rod would turn for me. I'd like to see if I could find any water at Mr. Temple's."

"You would, eh?" laughed Ross. "All right, so you shall. I'll cut you a hazel rod, and we'll go over at once if you say so. And see here, if you can find water over at Mr. Temple's, I'll hire the outfit and take the contract."

"Ross! Will you really?"

"Cross my heart."

What madness was this that had so suddenly seized upon them both? Had the moon bewitched them?

Both were pale and somewhat tremulous when, half an hour later, they lifted the latch of Mr. Temple's garden gate. To the group on the veranda Ross laughingly stated their errand.

"Jiminy!" ejaculated Mr. Temple. "If Miss Drew can locate water on this place and you will dig down to it, I'll add another hundred. But mind, sir, not a red cent unless you produce the goods."

"I quite understand that, Mr. Temple," replied Ross, "and I accept your conditions. However, the whole project hangs on this little hazel switch."

"Exactly. Let's get that question settled right away. Miss Drew, are you ready for operations?"

Miss Drew was ready, and the whole household, ten persons all told, followed her lead across the moonlit grounds—hither and thither, forward and back, "every which way."

At last—oh! thrilling moment!—the hazel turned, surely, unmistakably, in the fair diviner's hands. There was some excitement and much laughter, for no one except Ross and Hazel took the matter at all seriously, and they managed to hide their intensity of purpose in the general hilarity.

Early next morning the drillers tapped a water spring at Mr. Todd's, and before the day was out the apparatus had been transferred to Mr. Temple's back garden, where a hole had been dug a few feet down to the rock.

Two days of steady work brought no result. With what feverish energy Ross worked! And how many a pleading prayer went up in silence from the girl who listened to the incessant clang! clang! clang! of the drill!

Early on the third day a small part of the machine broke. As this could not be repaired or replaced nearer than Woodbury, Ross saddled Mr. Temple's fastest horse and rode himself on the errand.

On his way back, his eye was suddenly caught by a "For Sale" notice on a gate opening into what appeared amid its shrouding trees to be an attractive residence.

"I'll just have a look at it," he thought, "and see if the good folks can give me a drink."

Having tethered his horse he walked slowly toward the house. Although he was sure he had never been there before, the place looked strangely familiar. "When or where have I seen that dove-grey house with its veranda and cambering vines?" he mused.

And then it came to him in a flash—this was none other than Hazel's house of dreams. In every particular it agreed with her description. Surely she must at one time have been here and fallen in love with the place—indeed, it was a loveable abode. But the price would no doubt be far beyond his reach.

He went to the front door, and rang the bell.

When a buxom little o'd lady came to the door, he enquired in as casual a tone as he could command, the price of the house.

"Oh," she said with brightening eyes, "just step into the parlor, sir, and I'll call Mr. Moore. He'll tell you all you want to know."

Into the parlor of dreams he stepped, where he was soon joined by a little old man with white hair and bronzed face. "No, the place ain't sold yet," he said. "I'm jest askin' a thousand for it, but I must have the cash down as we want to move right away. It's worth a sight more than that, but—"

Ross scarcely heard the remainder of the sentence, for he was in a fever of suppressed excitement. A thousand dollars—only a thousand for this lovely home! Whv, he couldn't build a crude new house for that, and this home, so

CNE-AM WILLIAMSON

CHAPTER 1.

La Mysterieuse.

IT WAS Sunday, at Bournemouth. And I was just back from Archangel. I wanted to let out howl after howl, or stand on my head, or do something else even more unusual for a young man to do on the West Cliff in Bournemouth on Sunday.

What I did do was to walk mildly beside my great Aunt Sarah Talbot with somewhat the gait of a hare conscientiously constrained to keep step with a tortoise. It was after church (oh, yes, I'd found the pages of the hymns!) and the idea was to have a pleasant stroll till luncheon-time— I mean dinner time, because it was Sunday, when earnest middle-class stomachs refuse hot food at night. If we didn't fall below our present pace we should do a good quarter mile and back to Aunt Sarah's hotel (where I was visiting her) in the half hour remaining before one-thirty.

Aunt Sarah is a splendid woman, and has always been good to me. When my father and mother were killed in a railway accident while I was at Sandhurst, and left me with next to nothing, she would have paid to keep me on there, if she hadn't objected to the army. Instead, she did what she thought best: got me a job in a nice bank. The bank was at Wimbledon, where she lived. I didn't love Wimbledon, after Sandhurst, and I hated the nice bank. Even worse Aunt Sarah's eight-roomed villa, Marlborough Lodge. But it's an ill war that blows nobody good! The Great One broke out when I was twenty; and on August 4th, 1914, I bolted for the nearest recruiting office.

Since then, France, Belgium for me!—and after getting over a Blighty, Russia! Now I was back in England, and demobilised.

Dear Aunt Sarah had had to waive her prejudice against fighting, for her country's good; but she said it would break her heart if I wasted my God-given future in the army; and she'd invited me to Bournemouth to talk over plans.

God hadn't given me any future yet, and I thought secretly that wasting it in the Army would be better than anything Aunt Sarah was likely to propose. Still, a lot of that future depended upon her. If I were a good boy she promised to leave me eight hundred a year. Besides, I was grateful for what she'd done already, though I hadn't liked much of it at the time. Which is why the hare suited its pace to that of the tortoise, though no interest had been expressed in its late adventures in Russia.

When we'd discussed the sermon (it was Aunt Sarah's unvarying rule to discuss the sermon after church, before turning to worldly subjects) she said, "Well, my dear boy, how wonderful an English Sunday must seem to you, after all these years that the locusts have eaten!"

"It does," I answered with truth. "No locust would eat an English Sunday."

Aunt Sarah gazed at me with large, puzzled dark eyes. But she did not reprove my speech, because it was indubitable that English Sundays were not food for insects. Instead she made a remark suited to my youthful intelligence, that Sundays were pleasant at Bournemouth.

"I think," she went on, "I should have taken this holiday for your sake, Christopher, on your homecoming, even if dear Doctor Gibbs hadn't ordered me a change of air after my influenza. I always feel the sea has such a solemn influence upon the spirit, or should have. And that's a blessed thing to start with in picking up the broken threads of life, as you're about to do. How does it make you feel?"

"Makes me feel as if I want to fly," something in me leaped up and blurted out.

"Oh, my dear boy!" exclaimed Aunt Sarah. "I trust you don't mean that. I hope and pray you haven't set your mind on adopting the career of—of an aer-e-o-naut."

Yes, she pronounced it like that. I gulped. As a matter of fact, I'd meant nothing but madness. It seemed like tempting Providence, however, not to take up the gauntlet, which happened to materialize in the form of a black kid glove dropped by Aunt S. at the moment.

Handing it to her I said, "I've always wanted to fly." And the sound of the words convinced me that I really had.

"I'm afraid I can't help you to take any such step," she warned me firmly.

"It wouldn't be exactly a step," I quibbled.

"What would you call it, then?"

"A—jump to glory."

Aunt Sarah didn't criticize the definition. She merely said that the good news she had up her sleeve for me was about the bank. Her old friend Mr. Dobson, the manager, had not only kept my place open according to agreement, but would give me a rise. I should begin life again as assistant cashier. "What did I think of that?"

I thought it was beastly but Aunt Sarah looked so kind and fat, like a beneficent bag, that I hadn't the heart to hurt her. I said it was decent of old Dobson, and sounded like a cushy job all right. But the Something untamed in me which had snapped out that it wanted to fly was now roaring in its cave against Dobson. I knew that Ypres and Archangel had spoiled me for a Wimbledon cashier, and that, even if I drove Aunt's white transformation in sorrow to the grave and forfeited all she had to leave I would not go back to gaol—I mean the bank—unless, perhaps, with a black mask and a revolver, to hold up the staff.

By this time we'd tottered home to the hotel, which was situated—so to speak—at the back of the Front. We all stoddged ourselves with too much roast beef, Yorkshire pudding, and apple tart. Aunt Sarah then, retired to her room for a "few winks," as coffee didn't agree with her, and I settled myself in what was advertised as the "lounge hall," with an illustrated Sunday paper and some Russian cigarettes—a souvenir.

Suddenly, among the epidemic of unattractive brides and actresses with intensive smiles, my eyes lit on a thriller.

It was the photograph of a bigish biplane (make undecipherable to my ignorance) displayed in a kind of open Place, in front of a gay looking building of wedding-cake architecture, and surrounded by a particularly smart crowd of men and women.

Underneath the picture was an announcement: "Sensational Lottery at Monte Carlo. The celebrated Mascot of the famous dead airman, Sacha Kapieha, to be raffled for the benefit of French and Polish War Orphans. See page 3."

Monte Carlo! The look of that sunshiny Place, and the Casino, and the crowd, (to say nothing of poor Sacha Kapieha's aeroplane) sent a shock through my blood which relieved that roast beef, Sunday-afternoon feeling.

Ever since a Wimbledon neighbor had taken the vast sum of one hundred pounds from the Casino, and our parson had preached a sermon at him with a text condemning the flesh pots of Egypt, I had yearned to go to Monte Carlo. It was a place not to be mentioned except with condemnation before my Aunt, just as one wouldn't be rude enough to laud red rags in the presence of a respected bull. But secretly, for seven years (I was under eighteen when Mr. Jenkins of Willow Road, Wimbledon, came home with ninety-eight pounds in cash for himself and a fifty-franc Algerian shawl for his wife) I had felt that if I could go to Monte Carlo I should have some extraordinary run of luck. I'd even dreamed of the place on cold, wet nights in the trenches, to wake with a start and find that the "run" was that of a rat over my nose. Now I was seized, actually stabbed, by the sharp conviction that I'd only to get to Monte Carlo to annex that Mascot of Kapieha's for myself.

How easy to learn to work it, and then—and then—

And then, I heard a couple of waiters gabbling behind a screen.

It was a tall screen, separating the "lounge hall" from some humbler haunt where coffee was poured into cups and placed on trays; but it was not a thick screen, and the subdued voices of two vaguely Swiss youths distinctly reached my ears.

They were speaking a kind of French, which was also vaguely Swiss, if not German.

"I'll give you my tip from Ten for your turn with the next dinner of La Mysterieuse," said Number One.

"Her next will also be her last," replied Number Two.

"What? She is to be turned out of the hotel?"

"Not immediately. But Madame has given her notice that, if she cannot pay at least the bill of week before last, she must leave on Wednesday. Meanwhile, after to-night when dinner is supper and consists of cheap, camouflaged scraps—only one meal a day will be served: breakfast."

"Mon Dieu! Pauvre petite Mysterieuse! She herself told you all this? She has confided in you?"

"Not in the least. Does she look like confiding in me?"

"Ah, I have not seen her these many days, not since she has retired from public view. She may have changed—her pride weakened."

"She has not changed, my handsome camel! I heard what I heard when Madame chatted to the cashier just now, as I took them their coffee in the room behind the office."

"But—this makes sick the stomach! What will become of La Mysterieuse? Has she nothing to sell?"

"I suppose that everything is sold."

"There is always the dog. It is a queer dog, but of a type loved by the English. I heard, while she still walked out with him, that it is a beast of fine points."

"Ah, I judge that La Petite would sooner die, and have the dog die with her, than sell him. And a dog one cannot pawn."

"Well, this is sad beyond speech! If I had savings, I would pay her bill. Do you think the story has leaked out in the hotel?"

"I think not, for I have heard no talk of it. People come and go. Those who have seen her are now few. Doubtless these few believe she has la grippe, like most of the clientele who disappear; or that she has left, quietly."

"You are perhaps right. But you have not answered me. Number Ten will give a good tip. He goes to-morrow morning by the fast train."

"Humph! When I sell something I prefer to know what payment I am likely to get. When Ten has departed—"

"But you say that to-night is the last dinner of La Mysterieuse. After that it will be too late."

"There will be three breakfasts."

"La Mysterieuse is for breakfast deep in her pillows, and one sees only the top of her head."

"Even that is better than most women's faces. Such hair!"

"For dinner I must make a firm price. My minimum is eight shillings. Will Monsieur Ten run to that? Or if not, will you guarantee the sum?"

"Sacred Chimney! But you are a miser—what the English call skinflint."

"I am not. It is you who wish to grind my nose. Bien! It is finished. For that word, skinflint, I will have no dealings with you."

Upon this followed a slight crash as of crockery. Broke also a word, short and sharp, last heard by me in the trenches. Then silence. But I had forgotten Monte Carlo and poor Sacha's wonderful aeroplane, which I could win if I were on the spot.

I would have sacrificed my ticket for the lottery—if I'd had one—for a sight of La Mysterieuse.

CHAPTER 11.

"It's up to Me!"

WHAT is more, I determined to have the sight, if it could be bought, wangled or noddled.

The only way, was through the man who held the power. I had to see him in order to know which one he was, since I couldn't ask each waiter in the hotel. "Are you the lucky beggar who serves her last dinner to La Mysterieuse?"

I jumped up. I whirled behind the screen. Only one living thing was visible in the passage thus revealed to me. It was picking up bits of a broken cup, and mopping the floor with a dirty napkin.

Was this the Johnny who wished to buy the turn, or the Johnny who had refused to part?

"Look here," I said, "I was sitting out there close in front of the screen, and heard you talk. I understand French, even your French, and heard your chat with your pal. I am intrigued. Are you the fellow who wouldn't sell—"

"No, Monsieur, I am not," replied the waiter, as he lifted himself from a crouching position and brushed crumbs from his knees. "I am not that stinky pork, I am the other he."

I was disappointed. But I might have known that the weaker vessel would be forced to clear the wreckage!

"Oh," said I, "The lady you were discussing sounded attractive!"

"She is, sir; though I fear unfortunate."

"I'd give a pound to be her waiter this evening," I remarked.

"Ah! 'T would be difficult to manage, sir," returned the vaguely Swiss youth.

"Not very. I could hand you the sovereign and you could renew your offer to your friend at a higher figure—say ten shillings instead of eight. Naturally you'd keep the change! I'd serve the lady in your place. And you needn't fear I'd disgrace the cloth. You yourself couldn't behave better."

"Monsieur is ingenious!" remarked the young man.

I smiled. But he wasn't the first who'd paid me that compliment. Any success I've had in the war and out, has come through being fairly ingenious in tight places. Among other things got in that way, was my M. C.

"Is it a bargain?" I pursued.

"I will do my best," replied the Swiss. "This is a small hotel, and I am just beginning in England my career. For me, a pound is still a pound!"

His career! He'd begun: his, while mine was trembling in the balance! I almost envied him. And to him a pound faithfully remained a pound while I, with no clear prospect now I was demobbed, would fling a sovereign away for the glimpse of a face maybe not worth a shilling!

The Swiss promised to come back as soon as possible with news, and I agreed to wait. No one had picked up the paper I'd dropped, and I had the aeroplane to return to; which was well, as the waiter's "possible" wasn't "soon."

Sacha Kapieha had been a Polish airman, flying for France in the war, and his machine had been of his own invention, or anyhow he'd made several improvements on another successful type. Just what the improvements were I was too ignorant to know; but Kapieha's record as a flyer was high in every sense of the word, and might have been more brilliant if a certain mystery had not been officially guarded concerning him till the last. That "last" happened to be the very day before the Armistice, when Kapieha was killed.

I was in Russia then, driving a tank; and if I'd heard how Sacha died I had forgotten. Now, in the paragraph that went with the picture, I learned that he'd been shot in a night-bombing expedition, but by a superhuman effort had brought his machine back over the French lines, and lived till he'd landed her, practically uninjured.

Kapieha's invention not having been taken up from the model, by the French Government, the inventor had built a test machine at his own expense. Its astonishing success being demonstrated, construction had begun on a grand scale; but Kapieha had continued with his own plane, which he believed in as a mascot. In a will he left all his decorations and this machine to a relative (not named by the paper) but the heir had never come forward, and could not be found. For such an eventuality, however, Kapieha had provided. If his possessions—including his plane—were not claimed within a year after his death, they were to become the property of France.

One year and a half had now elapsed, for six extra months' grace had been given, and the famous machine would be the second prize in the great lottery for the benefit of French and Polish War Orphans organized by the Administration at Monaco, who had bought the plane from the French Government. The first prize—offered by the Administration itself—was a hundred thousand francs; but Sacha Kapieha's "mascot" (to be on show in the Place du Casino for a fortnight, before the sale of tickets began) was the sensation of the lottery. Many new visitors would be attracted by its presence at Monaco; and the generosity of the Casino would doubtless be repaid a hundredfold. I'd read all this half a dozen times, and brooded over the photograph of the Mascot, when my waiter appeared like a cheap Geni from behind the screen.

"The other fellow has sold me his turn with the lady's dinner, for twelve shillings," he informed me. "For myself I have left only eight."

I increased the eight to ten; and received instructions.

Dinner on week nights was at seven. But supper on Sundays was an hour later. Meals upstairs were served fifteen minutes in advance, not to interfere with the dining-room work. My man would carry the tray to the third storey, where the room of La Mysterieuse was situated; and I was to be on the watch near her door, Number 32. There the tray would change hands, and—the rest was up to me!

"If I may advise, however," went on the Swiss, "Monsieur would do well not to reveal himself as an admi—as a fellow guest. Mademoiselle is not in good luck, though the number of her room is a favourite one at Monte Carlo, as I have seen myself. But she is of a strange pride. And if she were not disagreeable herself, she might invite her dog to be. He is a large dog, of the type of bull."

"Thanks," I returned, "Once a waiter always a waiter—anyhow, for this even-

There was, it seemed, a certain competition in the matter of annexing chairs. Neither title, age nor profiteering counted. What you did was to arrive before others, squat firmly in the chair you wanted, and place books, (not knitting bags on Sunday) upon seats adjacent, according to the number of your party.

I had promised to keep Aunt Sarah's favourite corner for her; but she couldn't have trusted me with a sure trust, for she descended the stairway into the hall at precisely three forty-seven.

She was superficially smooth and sleek; but looked as people do look when they've been lying down, and want you to think that they've read or reflected rather than slept.

"Good boy!" she purred. "You haven't forgotten!"

"I had. But it was not necessary to explain. I was nephewly, and a few minutes later we were feeding a top layer of toast, cake, and blackberry jam to that sleeping dog, our Sunday dinner. For the time being it continued to doze, however, so we were good-natured; and while Aunt Sarah was sweetening her disposition with jam, I cautiously introduced the subject of La Mysterieuse.

"I was here in the hall reading," I explained, "and heard—er—a couple of men talking about some weird sort of girl in the hotel, shut up in her room, and never comes out; not got a penny, but owns a valuable bull: I mean dog."

"Oh, a horrid looking sort, was she?" I sympathized.

"Not precisely that. I'm a very truthful person, as you know, Christopher." (I know, from sad experience. She always told the truth, as it seemed to her, about other people, mostly myself, and my friends). "The moment I set eyes on that young woman, afterwards known as the Girl with One Dress, I said to myself, 'There's a creature who'll have a career, if she hasn't begun to have it already!' There was something about her, you know: an atmosphere. But I must admit, she was what many frivolous sort of people might call pretty. As for dress, it was handsome. Or it would have been, when it was in fashion. I heard ladies here who keep up to date with the modes as I don't pretend to do, say it must have been made as long ago as 1916. Even to my eyes it had the air of being outgrown."

"Oh, then the girl's very young?" burst from me before I'd stopped to think.

Again those dark eyes regarded me; full, heavily fringed with thick straight lashes like a cow's, though less liberal in outlook. "You seem to take an interest in her?" perceived Aunt Sarah.

"One must talk of something," I said.

"There are subjects, and subjects," I was reminded. "Especially on Sunday."

"Isn't the girl a Sunday subject?"

"I have nothing to live for—except Petro—and you see he was ready to go with me."

ing. That was my intention, even without your hint. But this Mademoiselle—I heard you calling her 'La Mysterieuse.' She must have a name, I suppose?"

"Her name in the hotel visitors' book is the last one that could be hers," said the youth. "It is Miss P. Smith, London. But you have only to look at her, sir, to see that she is not a Smith nor from London."

"Where should you say she is from?" I enquired.

"Doubtless Heaven knows," was the shrugged reply. "But Bouremouth is not completely Heaven! No one here can tell anything of the lady, where she came from, why she came, or who she is. All we know is that—that—she is, sir, very remarkable."

"Very beautiful, you mean?" I wanted to know.

"Monsieur will judge."

That also was "up to me!"

By this time it was three-forty-five; and no matter what shuffling Sunday might make in meals, tea was immutable. Though the world (according to most newspapers) trembled on the brink of bankruptcy, tea at the Bouremouth Homeland Hotel would appear in the hall at the hour of four.

Aunt Sarah turned a searchlight glance on me, but no Innocent of Pharaoh's time could have looked more open to the day.

"I suppose," she said, "they must have meant the Girl with One Dress."

"The Girl with one dress?" I echoed.

"That's what we ladies got to calling her," my aunt explained, "when she'd been here for over a fortnight and always appeared morning, noon and night, in the same frock. Also hat. At first we supposed her luggage must have been lost. But if it was, it's never been found. We imagined she must be waiting for someone. Surely she isn't still here? Everybody thought that she and her terrific dog had gone—at least ten days ago. Neither have been seen by mortal eye since."

I said nothing concerning the eye of the waiter; and, indeed, spread myself as thickly with indifference as Aunt Sarah spread jam on buttered toast.

"I don't know," I replied, "except that the talk sounded as if she were in the hotel, in dashed—I mean very—hard luck; going to be turned out because she can't pay her board, or something."

"Quite likely," remarked my Aunt. "She looked that sort."

"I shouldn't pick her out—judging you have done so, the Girl with the One Dress certainly appeared young, if nothing else. Her name was given as Smith—a circumstance suspicious in itself, as you would realise could you meet her. She might have been anything except Smith."

"I see," I said. I didn't exactly. But I hoped to.

CHAPTER 111.

The Girl with One Dress.

I went for a brisk walk at five, and returning at seven passed Aunt Sarah, still in the hall. She invited me to sit down with her and introduced Captain Christopher Malet to a Miss Pinch, whom my Aunt fancied because she taught in a Sunday School, and mentioned her income of a thousand a year. I soon excused myself, however, on the plea that I must dress.

"It's Sunday, Christopher," Aunt Sarah reminded me. "We don't dress for the evening on Sundays."

"I do," I said, for evening dress was obligatory if I hoped to look like a waiter.

"Indeed?" breathed my Aunt in polite reproval. "And where did you learn to do that?"

"In the trenches," said I in despair. "What—they dressed in the trenches?" squeaked Miss Pinch, aged almost anything from thirty to a hundred.

"On Sundays," I insisted. "I suppose you've heard of Dress Parade?"

Both ladies were silenced if not convinced.

At the appointed second, or a little before, I was waiting in the obscurity of a narrow corridor that ran into the main one close to Number 32. A few uneasy moments passed, and then I saw my fellow conspirator bearing towards me with a tray.

"This is all," he explained in a hoarse whisper. "I am not allowed to serve meals in courses to Mademoiselle. Don't let the plateau fall when you knock, or there will be the devil!"

With this last warning the big, flat oval of iron, covered with a not immaculate napkin, was deposited upon my outstretched palms, and my partner fled mouse-like by the way he came.

A glance showed me that the supper of Miss Smith was as obvious as she was mysterious; a slice of cold roast beef rouged by the juice of a small bit of beetroot; a square chunk of cottage loaf; a pallid morsel of "shape" sicklied o'er with Somebody's egg powder custard; and a glass of water.

Poor girl! I thought. And my heart bled for her like the beetroot, as I bumped the edges of the tray against a panel instead of knocking.

"Come in!" called a voice from the other side—a rather delicious voice if one could judge by two words; and then something hurled itself upon the door.

Could it be she? Had she, faint with hunger, fallen—perhaps swooned? Great Heavens!

It was difficult to turn the door-handle without dropping the huge tray which held the small supper, but I managed. (My ingenuity again!) And it wasn't the girl, but a richly brindled bull-dog—oh, a bull-dog of bull-dogs, a super bull-dog—who had shaken the door in its frame.

He squarely barred the way, and I realised that I should be at a disadvantage if obliged to defend the lady's supper and myself at the same time. But some of my best pals have been bull-dogs. I took it for granted that this one had common sense, and grinned at him. He grinned back, decided to let me pass, and pushed the door shut with his face, a neat trick.

Then, as I wheeled round a battered Japanese screen, I saw the girl.

She was sitting on a sofa with her feet up. She had not got on the One Dress. She was wrapped in a kimono, and her hair was down. "Such hair!" as the waiter had said.

The Kimono had seen its best days. But she—she was entering hers, so young was she, just on the threshold of womanhood while past the crudeness of flapperhood.

I saw in a second why she couldn't be Smith, or of London. She couldn't I thought, be of anywhere in England. She looked up at me with long eyes that were jade green in the cold electric light. And all that hair, tumbling over the kimono in wavy lengths, was dark as shadow that floats reddish-purple among cedars of Lebanon at sunset. She had the longest lashes I ever saw. They curled up to her low, straight eyebrows. Her nose was of a proud daintiness, her lips full, the short chin firm. It wasn't a sweet face, though it might be sweet. There was something wild, almost fierce about the girl, like the wildness of a trapped bird.

She stared at me. "If I'd known it would be a new waiter, I wouldn't have let Petro go to the door," she said. "He might have taken a dislike to you."

"Dogs don't," I answered. "Where shall I put the tray, Miss?"

"Will you pull up that bamboo table?" she asked, indicating with a delicate yet strong little hand a specimen of furniture never seen except in mean hotels.

I obeyed. The girl still stared. "I see why dogs don't take dislikes to you," she said. "You look more like a soldier than a waiter: an English soldier."

"I am—I mean, I have been a soldier, and I'm English all right," I replied.

"Where were you fighting last?" she wanted to know, as I removed a book from the bamboo abomination, and set down the tray.

"Russia," I said.

"Russia!" the girl, who had been reclining on pillows taken from the bed, bounded up to a sitting position. Petro approached her and asked with his eyes whether I were to blame for anything. I should have pitied myself if I had been!

"Poor darling, he takes too good care of me!" his mistress cooed. "Waiter, please give him that piece of meat on the plate. Then he will know you are kind, and he won't worry."

"But—but—if I give it to him, what will you have Miss?" I forgot myself far enough to ask.

"Oh, I don't like meat!" she explained. "I shall have plenty, with that bread and the rest of the stuff. Besides, Petro must eat; he is big and needs nourishment."

"You, though not big, also need nourishment, Miss," I ventured.

The girl shrugged her thin shoulders. "Nothing matters much about me, any ever they were—no doubt she had given mostly to the bull-dog.

"Do you think I'm hungry?" she sharply questioned.

"No—o, Miss," I stumbled. "But I do like to see people have plenty to eat. This wouldn't be a supper for me. I'd be pleased to find you something better."

La Mysterieuse smiled, showing delightful little white teeth; also two deep dimples, one in each cheek. "What would you find for me?"

I wavered. But remembering that excited start of hers at the word "Russia," I rashly said, "Caviare."

The girl's green-grey eyes sparkled. "Could you really get me caviare?"

"Yes, Miss," I assured her. But mentally I ransacked Bournemouth on a Sunday evening for caviare, and failed a hundred times.

"Strange you should have mentioned it," she murmured. "It's the thing I like

He was here. There were other reasons, too. It's a long story. But I'm forgetting you're a waiter. You are really going to find me some caviare?"

I took the hint and blotted myself out.

On the way downstairs, two steps at a time, I made up my mind what to do. Stopping at my own cupboard of a room, adjoining my Aunt's, I grabbed a hat and an overcoat (converted British Warm) and while the gong wailed a chilly invitation to cold meats I made a rival noise by banging the front door.

As I did this, I was conscious of having caught a glimpse of Aunt Sarah gazing at my cloaked figure as at a ghost. What would she think, what would she say when I came back, was past praying about. But I'd cut German barbed wire at night in my time, with star shells splashing about the landscape, and on the Sabbath Aunt Sarah would hardly dare out-shell a star shell, on any provocation! I should live her down somehow.

The weather had changed, and one of those buffeting north-south, east-west winds that good old England can mix up in January tried to push me back into Aunt Sarah's arms. But I bolted into the teeth of it, steering for the sole place in Bournemouth where one might count upon caviare on a Sunday night.

CHAPTER IV.

Russian Caviare.

I HAD been in the place only two days but I'd spotted one hotel whose, front of serene splendour assured the world that it would never fail in any requirement. Caviare was a requirement! Besides, having been driven by boredom to read a newspaper list of visitors, I had seen at this hotel the names of enormously rich Americans, and other duchesses. I had also seen Rolls-Royces sailing up to the door, depositing people who looked as if they would shout for caviare instead of bacon for breakfast.

The lordly hotel in question looming half a mile from where ours squatted in unlicensed smugness; but my legs are long, and I sprinted there, despite the wind, in seven minutes. Once in the hall, I threw off my air of haste, and strove to resemble a demobilised duke as I asked to see the head waiter.

It was eight o'clock, and dinner was about to begin—real dinner. I was ushered into a dignified dining-room, and brought face to face with the authority demanded. Gasping, we recognised each other. He had been Belgian interpreter with our lot when I was at Ypres.

Steele determination to refuse me a table (if asked for) fled from his face. He could have thrown himself on my neck. I almost did throw myself on his. But there was no time to waste in caresses. A few seconds of gush, and I broke it to Monsieur Tiedelmans that I hadn't come entirely to see him.

"We never needed ammunition on the Ypres salient worse than I need some Russian caviare this pip Emma," I told him. "You've got caviare, haven't you? Don't say no! I can't bear it."

Tiedelmans was not a man to show surprise. He looked no more than gravely reflective. Then he said, "Unfortunately the last pot of Russian caviare has just gone up to the private sitting-room of Mr. Henry S. Horden, the American automobile millionaire. He arrived yesterday, on a tour of England. You have heard of him?"

"Yes," I replied. "Do you think, T., he's had time to eat it yet—I don't mean England, but the caviare?"

"Scarcely time," said T. (our old name for Tiedelmans at Ypres)—"But—"

"But any instant it may be too late. For heaven's sake, save me, old top!"

"Monsieur le Capitaine, what can I do?"

"Send up word that he mustn't eat the caviare—it's gone bad—will poison him. Jove! I'll tell him. Send me. I'm a waiter. What?"

"I cannot say the caviare is bad," groaned T. "The honour of the hotel—"

"Once I get in the man's room I'll make it all right—I swear I will, on my honour, which is as much to me as the hotel's is to you. See?"

He did see. A rabbit-youth on his staff disposed of my hat and coat. I was told to go to a door on the first floor, nearly opposite the lift. The number more. I care more for Petro than myself nowadays.

"She's had an unhappy love affair!" was the thought that jumped into my head. And it was a rude, unwelcome thought. It seemed to spoil things somehow, to butt goat-like into a dreamy place of enchantment, leaving no room for romance, only for awkward regrets.

The one thing I could think of to say—or rather, the one thing I dared to say—was, "I might bring a bit more food for you, Miss, if you could eat it."

She looked up at me with an odd look; and now that the first surprise of her strange beauty had cleared away, I saw that the girl was starved. It was merely because her bones were small and perfect that she had any beauty left. There was no colour in her face. The full, passionate lips that should have been red were but faintly pink; Such food as had been sent grudgingly to her room since the beginning of her troubles—what-best to eat. For years I haven't tasted it."

"You'll taste it to-night," I promised. And I meant to keep my word, if I had to snatch the stuff from the mouth of the Mayor himself.

"Go then," said the girl. But she stopped me at the door. "How did you happen to suggest caviare?" she enquired.

"From being in Russia, I suppose," I floundered.

"Perhaps you thought I might be Russian? Well, I'm not."

"No, Miss?"

"I'm Polish. That is, I'm half Polish. The other half is American. But I know Russia. I know it too well! I've been a prisoner there—a sort of prisoner. Were you?"

"No, Miss, but I had a couple of narrow shaves. You didn't have your dog with you?"

"No. If I had, I shouldn't be in Bournemouth now. I came to fetch him.

HIS week-day rut was to puncture his time on the machine that relentlessly registered the defaulting minutes, after eight A. M., of the clerks of the London Mercantile Company, then to climb his stool and total columns, until six P. M. freed him to take the Clapham bus to a bandbox house in an endless street of pea-alike bandbox houses, where a noisy supper preceded an innocuous evening, followed by a bed disputed with a younger member of his large family. This was the January to December routine, broken by far-between holidays of minute-hoarding and searching for excitement, two summer weeks of pretense at the seaside, and an occasional afternoon purloined on that pathetic appeal of the unimaginative, "Family funeral, sir." Freedom he knew only in the abstract as the theme of popular songs bawled in the cheaper music halls. With fear he was better acquainted. It had been caned into him at the boarding school; it had thrived on anæmia; a vulgar-tongued mother ruled the fatherless boy by it; then the office had increased it—the junior clerks imposed on the trembling anxiety of the office boy to give slaving satisfaction. (It was not for them to know the distressful necessity of the weekly eight shillings to the family oil cruse.) Afterward, when he himself climbed to a junior clerkship and thence to his own ledger dignity, fear was increased proportionately by the large horde of eager applicants for his berth.

In the common destiny of his kind, luck accompanying him, he had come into the desk of second clerk and in his turn made some starveling feel the weight of authority. Then had he gone easily to bald-headed harmlessness, down through years of alarm-clock, bus, fog, ledger, daily paper, and Sunday church, with evanescent flashes of the soul-world—worrying yearnings of things felt within, strange discontents, revolts, impotent snatches at immortalities. Also had there been one short love affair that had ended in nothing. And so had his soul atrophied in the commonplace.

But abused nature was stirred to revolt by Stanley's "Darkest Africa" and the cheaper magazines. Everything published about the country he read with avidity. The foreign advertisement columns of the daily paper became his chief interest. And so for four months did he beat against his walling environment. Then, at last, came the advertisement he looked for; so cleverly cunning in its alluring vistas of sun, and palms, and blue skies, and open air, hour-to-hour bliss, that half England—the freedom-singing half—must surely have tendered their services. The gist of it was that a book-keeper, ambitious and fond of out-door life was wanted for tropical Africa.

To his application he received a reply asking him to call at the offices of the Royal Sokoto Company. This he accomplished through another resort to the family-funeral fiction. The offices of the Royal Sokoto Company were edified and upholstered as befitting the headquarters of a company that was a government in itself. The anæmic book-keeper tried to fill a sumptuous arm-chair while the chairman-director, an Earl in person, passed on his final approval—mostly a matter of impressing the applicant. During the interview he was addressed by the great man as "Mr. Gridley." Then, as being "the one selected out of thousands," he signed away three years of his life to whatever disposition in swamp and pestilence the company might wish to make of him, and solemnly coupled his signature to that of the Earl and witnesses—James Bright Gridley. The middle name he had hitherto been rather ashamed of as an affectation, but he resuscitated it now with peculiar satisfaction. He then returned to the offices of the London Mercantile Company and "gave notice." This was the only occasion in which he had ever met his employer without fear or servile "sir." He made the most of it. The two weeks following were spent in glorious preparation. And then, at last, he stood on the hurricane deck of the Warragona, a real deep-sea ship, and, extracting every ounce of sentiment out of the occasion, said good-bye to the Old Life, its dreary days of petty nothings and self-submergence, and eagerly faced the New. He was mentally occupying the centre of a staged dream.

His fellow passengers consisted of an artillery major, two "palm-oil ruffians," a mining prospector, an orchid hunter, and a long, raw-boned Scotch Australian outbound to the Royal Sokoto Company on a second term of service. Amidst these the book-keeper sidled, ecstatically intoxicated, a gentleman among gentlemen, and utterly impervious to the snickers of the stewards and the bloody stories of the Oil Rivers with which the purser delighted to stimulate fright in the bosoms of the over-confident.

Remarked the purser, cheerfully: "We ship your sort every out passage, but I don't ever see 'em returning; though last trip we did pick up a bag of bones at Old Calabar, which we heaved into the Bay of Biscay."

Columbus, however, did not sight America with more suffocating heart-throbs than James Bright Gridley suffered at the first far-away glimpse of Teneriffe and the hilly coast-line of Stanley's Africa. Thereafter the Gold Coast, the Ivory Coast, then the Fever Coast, held him in entranced absorption over the taffrail. His mind, freed of its figuring gymnastics, was open to sensation, con-him during his career on the Niger. But beneath this miserable outer garb lay latent values which Walker never owned; a submerged temperament and ideals, born partly of weak day-dreaming, which now saved him from the whisky debauchery of his companions, in spite of his desire to propitiate their esteem, and later preserved him inviolate in the common bestiality of the exotic, foul-reeking world of the jungle, where he was tumbled with Walker after five weeks of Romance.

It was raining when the Warragona reached its destination and sided to a rough jetty piled with trade gin. It rained as they hurried to a sheet-iron store over which lived the agent and his three assistants. And through the nightmare of the weeks that followed it continued to rain—torrential, down-pouring, slashing, deluging rivers; while low overhead stagnated a heavy pall with no hint of the tropical sun and blue skies that had enticed the book-keeper from the ordered walks of civilization. It was, indeed, as if the Creator had overlooked the Niger Delta in the first divisioning of land from water, and of the waters above the firmament from the waters below the firmament, and was on his shrinking soul snarling contempt. And Walker took keen delight in penetrating his junior's disgusts and fears and playing them up. Thus one morning he happened on the book-keeper taking his precautionary quinine tablets. He caught his elevated arm ere the hand reached the mouth, and, digging iron-sinewed fingers into the soft flesh, swept the palm clear. "Good boy," he taunted, "follow mamma's directions; five grains night and morning; wrap himself in flannel; wear 'm cholera belt; avoid the night air." He caught up a whisky bottle and swallowed generously of the raw spirit. "That's the stuff to fight fever. Drink, you fool, drink!" The other drew back. "By God, I say you shall drink!" He caught the book-keeper by the collar. The latter swung on his heel, dodged, and freed himself—then, white-faced, drew his revolver and levelled its swaying muzzle on his tormentor. Walker sobered momentarily, drew himself stiff, and waited. Suddenly he laughed, and, focusing the other's eyes to his own bloodshot glare, reached out and took the gun from the unnerved hand. He emptied the breech into his pocket, then handed the weapon back.

"Take it, you fool, and thank your damn baby cheeks that you are alive. Little boys, mind, must not play with dangerous toys."

In his former existence, had he read of it, the episode would have fired the book-keeper to discontent with the templation, and reflection. But the wonder of it was oppressive; those wide sweeps of blue, restful, lazy sea, the distant white surf-line, the bleached coast with its pantomimic suggestion of life, the starry nights, the golden sunlight and the reality of hitherto hearsay flying-fish. Then there was the whole long, blessed day for idleness, broken only by bugle calls to a sumptuous table and attendance.

To the others, when they began to notice his presence, Gridley was also object of curiosity; and to his fellow officer of the Company a butt for much vicious sarcasm. Walker and he had come to regard one another, finally with nothing less than temperamental antagonism. His obtrusive happiness jarred the other's bankrupt enthusiasm; his morning gymnastics and careful dressing, and his pleasure in such simple things as sunsets and tornadoes tantalized the elder man's whisky-promulgated buoyancies. Then, too, the cockney's years of servitude had dressed him in a miserable garb of petty economies, and a class snobbery that on one side made him absurdly condescending to the stewards, and, on the other, affectedly familiar with his betters. Walker dubbed him "Little Tupn'y," a name which clung to finishing the task now. Vast bodies in oily flood flowed before the factory and lapped over the squelching swamp. The air was filled with blinding sheets of it; the swamp exhaled it in poisonous vapours. It dropped in heavy pearls from a walling, foliating mass of vegetation—fronded palms, tree ferns, giant mahoganies, knotted mangroves, and delicate cottonwoods—all draped in creeper and vine, and one monotonous washed green. It penetrated blanket, and mattress, and suit-case. It half smothered the human-like shrieks of parrots, and gave to the eerie night-cries of the jungle a choking gurgle. And it submerged the book-keeper in a drear, dreadful despondency.

Fearful as was the aspect of nature, however, the society to whom Walker contemptuously introduced him as "Little Tupn'y" was far more terrifying. Vainly did he labour to extract humour out of the coarse jokes hurled across the plank table to which they sat to "chop" under undisguised, sheet-iron roofing, to interest himself in the brutal stories told, and sociably to swallow drink for drink, and give vacuous laugh for vacuous laugh. Such efforts served only to clothe him in an ingratiating toadyism, and brought down tame commonplace; but now the actual made him miserably afraid, filling him at the same time with impotent rage against Walker. And he had long hours in which to nurse his hate—for though the agent had assigned to him his duties, they were of the old dreaded routine without the former mental activity. At six A.M. the factory rose to three sharp beats on a cracked ship's bell. They assembled in the barren "chop-room" to a canned-goods breakfast, then each man went off to his work. Gridley had been given a gang of savages—naked, muscular, smelling, happy giants, any one of whom could have choked the life out of him without effort, but who sweatingly obeyed his piping orders as they unloaded strange cargoes from shallow-draft stern-wheelers which came puffing in from the unknown. He moved among them, a quaint figure in high-topped rubber boots, enveloping raincoat, and waterproof helmet, under which his mild blue grey eyes stared in a manner that showed the mind behind trying to grasp the new forces of life in which he laboured. So he checked and baled cargoes of glutinous rubber, loads of tusks and hides, barrels of shea butter, holds of kernels, and casks of palm oil—the whole emanating a rancid odour that impregnated the humid atmosphere of factory and compound. At regular intervals "gin-tanks" of twenty thousand tons nosed their prows into the delta's stagnation, and their cargoes of barter goods, transferred to stern-wheelers, were scattered to the barbaric world up river, where rumour said the sun shone brightly and there was also loneliness.

All the long, sodden day did the book-keeper live the "outdoor life" that had looked so enticing in the advertisement. Then at night he retired to his board walls and crept under his mosquito curtains to his floor mattress; not to sleep, but weakly to surrender himself to fearful contemplation of his three years' contract, and shrinkingly listen to the carousals of whites and their native women on the other side of the thin partitioning—shrill quarrelling, drunken endearments, or a foul curse, maybe, and a flesh-softened blow, followed by a manny's squeal. During long hours of wretchedness and revulsion the book-keeper lay there helplessly alive to such things. At other times the night would be alarmed by the watchman's sharp clanging of the ship's bell; and Gridley would turn out pell-mell with the rest to glimpse a canoe disappearing through the mists, hear a monotone chanting and tomtoming, see the blacks huddled in fright and whispering awesomely, and catch the indifferent comment of the agent: "Those ju-ju wizards again—who have they taken?" He would then creep back to his mattress and lie there in trepidation, visioning the bleached bones of the fetish grove in the hidden recesses of the jungle. Always, too, was rest broken by racking fits of fretful delirium. Sometimes the book-keeper investigated, and stayed to nurse—replacing the blankets fevered hands impatiently thrust off, administering hot lime drinks, and soothing the muttering, groaning recital of the shameful drama that had exiled the sufferer from a loved home. In the white dawn, the victim, finding him at the bunk-side, and recognizing in the heavy eyelids the night's vigil, would reach out an attenuated hand and gulp his thanks.

As time passed, indeed, and they learned more of him, the factory began to respect the book-keeper's aloofness. Not Walker, however—but he was shortly removed to the world up-river receiving orders from the Agent-General to accompany a cargo of new, small-silver coinage which the Company had shipped out in the hope of ending the bloody barter-quarrels which arose from the then clumsy approximation of exchange values.

With Walker gone, Gridley's spirits might have tended even toward something like cheerfulness. But one of the small colony happened to die just then—dropped out in whisky and fever delirium while the book-keeper nursed him in the hell of the jungle night. In all his life Gridley had never looked on death before—only the black trappings of it as it crawled in solemn pomp through London's traffic. His mother, careful soul, had seen to it that, like other children, he was properly inculcated in the creed, catechism and ceremonial of the orthodox English faith—but in the face of this terrible reality it fell from him somehow like a miserable vanity. Fearfully, and with morbid interest, he saw the naked, ebony figures shape out a rude coffin by the light of a hurricane lantern; at dawn saw the coffin dropped into the reeking mire of the swamp, himself reading the prayers for the dead from the Episcopal prayer-book; then joined in the whisky debauch in which the others tried to drown fear. But never for a moment did the intoxication touch the seat of his misery. His heart seemed to be beating against a wall of utter realization and horror. A nausea sickened his whole being—an insistent, gnawing hunger for the old city canons of windows and brick, the clack-clack of the streets, the clattery cheer of luncheon tea-cups and luncheon society, the voice and emanating presence of a white woman—a hunger at once physical and psychological that ate up his strength. And there were times in the weeks that followed, when the rooms rang with their nightly carousals, that he fell impotently to hopeless, uninspired prayer, much as a cureless consumptive will take to a patent medicine.

At last his misery-face got on the nerves of the agent. The first romance-seeking victim dropped from a "gin-tank" was seized and put in charge of Gridley's savages, and the book-keeper sent up-river to await the orders of the Agent-General.

The journey was accomplished on the stern-wheeler, Yetoga. It seemed to be an unreal world through which they passed. Magic isles, glimpsed fancifully through blanketing rain, rose silently off either bow and slid astern to rise again next moment in exact reproduction of palm, treefern, and mahogany. The book-keeper, at first, misdoubted the pug-faced Nubian captain's pilotship. But on the second day they struck the main current of the Niger and were shortly steaming between straight walls of foliage, which in turn gave place to high-grassed plains. In five days they came to Ajaba, a collection of sheet-iron stores and offices dropped into the fork of the river and its tributary. Here lay the yacht of the Agent-General.

The book-keeper presented his letter and waited in a trepidation that re-with old flintlocks. The whole composed a long black line of native canoes.

For the first time in his meagre life Gridley now found himself free of over-riding authority. He looked back along the snaky line of his command and his complete happiness lacked only an audience. The seventeen days were an ecstatic extravaganza. There were wonderful, soft-white, hushed dawns; there were long reaches of forest, lasting for whole days, where the canoe-men put aside their paddles and drew up stream by pulling at overhanging garlands. In the haunted depths, filtered in golden sunlight, monkeyland chattered and birds called to one another in drowsy notes, and gorgeous orchids and splotching patches of bright colour laughed from the shadows. Or, maybe, the river lost itself in broad, stilly, shimmering lagoons, dotted in feathery-plumed pampas islands at whose edges crocodiles dozed, half in, half out of the water, while across the quasi-painted scenery, swans, as from out a Japanese embroidery, came with lazy flop of wing, and long necks outstretched, challenging homage instead of marksmanship. Or again they reached the blue mountain that had

He was greeted with a sneer. "Why, it's Little Tupny! Has it lost its mamma?"

Through the book-keeper's frame vibrated a cold wave of rage, hate, aversion. He stepped to the mattress and silently thrust the orders of the Agent-General into the other's hand.

Walker read, then looked up in surprise. Quickly followed a thoughtful frown. He rose to his feet leisurely, still thinking. Then he spoke:

"Well, I'm glad you're here. Another day of it, and I would have turned the place over to the niggers. I'm sick to death of the hole." He spoke meditatively, arranging his words, and in a conciliatory tone. He pointed to his baggage, corded in a corner of the room. "I got my stuff ready—I can't stand the damned silence—I was cut out for company. You, now, will get on all right here."—He looked at the book-keeper, reading his anxiety to be in possession, and his old fear and dislike of himself. He cleverly played up that anxiety and fear in his next words. "I suppose you will want to take stock, which means a week's hustling and headache. I've got the balance sheets ready—looked to slip away at once; expected my relief would be an older officer of the service who would know how to handle this thing."

The book-keeper was surprised into offguard by the friendly manner of his enemy. Besides he was most anxious "to play the game" according to custom, to live up to the traditions of the Company, to be "gentlemanly." So he was beguiled into taking over, without an accounting, huge stores of cloth, salt, umbrellas, pomatum, rubber, palm kernels, gum-arabic, gutta percha and capsicum; also three iron-bound cases of small-silver coinage. Walker airily referred to these just before they went to the office to sign the papers:

"There's five thousand pounds there in those cases. Seeing that I was quitting the job, I didn't trouble to give the stuff out. You have only to see that the seals are intact."

So all through the transaction did the mind of the elder man dominate the younger's. The book-keeper moved in a dream, indeed, consumed with his feverish desire to be alone and happy. Finally Walker, with his cases of whisky and his O-K'd balance sheets, scurried away, and the little cockney king was enthroned. It was a real enthroning, too, compared with his previous state, a perfect realm of wonder and freedom into which he had come. His interpretation of it, however, was coloured rather by the melodrama of the cheaper magazines and the Africa they had inculcated in his imagination. Yet the life of the compound was calculated to feed romance.

Through the gates, from sunrise to sundown, flowed a kaleidoscopic pagentry that seemed to come from out the ages. The stone age was represented by a line of bearers armed with flint-headed spears and arrows, and staggering under the weight of the commerce of a petty chieftain. From the old testament of childhood, as it were, stepped wild-eyed John-the-Baptists, sages of the desert, with doleful prophecy and malediction; stern-faced, jutting-browed, high-cheekboned, swarthy Jobs, who squatted, cross-legged on the white-man's veranda and held forth to the fun-loving Negroes of the compound on the delight of the cooling palms, bubbling fountains, and hours of Heaven awaiting the Faithful; and sun-bronzed, sculptured Ruths, black-lashed, modest-eyed, balanced urns on buoyant heads, calabashes of herbs under spangled arms, or perhaps a picaninny athwart a graceful hip. Or, leaving biblical times, came ragged minstrels with piping reeds from out the court of King Arthur; and, occasionally, an emir, splendid, disdainfully incurious, white-robed and turbaned, booted and spurred, and flashing a jewelled sword hilt—a figure of the crusades, sitting his white stallion with perfect horsemanship, and contemptuous of the Negroes' taunts of "bushman" flung from the security of the white-man's law. Or it was a picture of Rome—Fulani, fierce, bare-headed, sandalled, and togaed, evoking in the book-keeper discontent with an education that called the inner sanctum of the head of the London Mercantile Company. But the Agent-General was a man of broad experience and sympathy. He made the book-keeper his guest while he figured out his disposal of him. Quietly he was studying his man. The result was evidently favourable to Gridley, for he was next day assigned to Oroko as agent. The big man took down a chart of the Royal Sokoto Company and discovered Oroko to him. With his finger on the spot he gave directions.

"Walker is at present in charge, but he has sent down his resignation. You can get away at once, say, at dawn to-morrow. You should do it in about seventeen days. I'll give the depot agent instructions to have canoes ready for you. Walker can come down by the same canoes. It would be wise to avoid the river villages on your way, as some of the chieftains might hold you up for 'dash.' You know what I mean, of course—exchange of presents."

With these brief instructions, the book-keeper set out in the gray dawn. He was accompanied by a little army of relief for Oroko—coloured clerks, compound labourers, and a guard armed loomed dimly for days against impossible sunsets—then raced rapids, and skinned ugly sunken rocks with the book-keeper holding his breath and determinedly keeping his fingers from clutching the gunwale, so full was he of the pride of race and the importance of example. Thus the days passed, stirring his heart to strange sensations which he struggled painfully to digest. Moments there were, too, of real danger, when inquisitive hippos nosed around the frail canoes, or when the bloated, bow-legged chieftain of a clustering patch of rude huts, sliding down the river bank, demanded gin for the privilege of crossing his comic-opera kingdom. At last they sighted Oroko—a collection of white-washed sheds floating the Company's flag—and Gridley pushed forward, eager to begin his reign.

It was noonday siesta when he arrived and deep silence held. He passed into the compound gates unchallenged, and walked up to the house centering the sheds. Poking his nose into the offices and living rooms he eventually happened on Walker, sprawling on a mattress and bestially surrendered to a whisky bottle.

A GREAT BENEFACTOR

By JEAN GRAHAM

FAR eastward in the blue waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence lies the smallest but not the least of Canada's provinces. It is "The Island," to all its sons and daughters, and no other can equal it. From Prince Edward Island have come President Schurman, until recently the head of Cornell University, Ithaca, New York; President Falconer of the University of Toronto; the well-known novelist, Mr. Basil King; Sir Andrew Macphail, author and professor;—and that delightful teller of girls' stories, Lucy M. Montgomery. There was another "Islander" whose name is "writ large" in the benefactions bestowed by him on the educational institutions of his native land:—and, in years to come, no name will be remembered more gratefully by hosts of Canadian students than that of Sir William Macdonald.

academic careers, have devoted much of their fortune to endowing institutions which mean courses in university training for all aspiring students.

It must have been a sense of gratitude to his humble Alma Mater, the little academy at Charlottetown where he secured his modest share of education, that impelled Sir William Macdonald, after the Government had raised it to the dignity of the Prince of Wales College (without being able to meet all its needs in the way of buildings and equipment) to present the College with an extension that more than doubled its accommodation and enabled it to do such sound educational work that, at the recent centennial convocation of McGill University, no less than seven of its graduates were among the fifty-two distinguished men selected from two continents to receive honorary degrees.

THE gifts of Sir William Macdonald to McGill University made a total of more than twelve-and-a-half million dollars, most of which was given during Sir William's lifetime. While the Faculty of Science was possibly the dearest to Sir William's heart, every Faculty benefited during his life and after. McGill's Agricultural Faculty, Macdonald College at Ste. Anne de Bellevue (four of the main buildings of which are shown) was built, equipped and endowed at an expense of more than six million dollars. The McCord Museum building was purchased at a cost of $142,000, while the Macdonald Park site, now occupied by the Stadium and the students' park, was purchased at a cost of more than a million and presented to the University. Students' activities received other gifts from this princely donor, as the McGill Union testifies.

Every gift to an educational institution, whether large or small, indicates on the part of the donor an appreciation of "the things that are more excellent" and a generous desire to give the next generation very opportunity for wider culture. When gifts have reached the proportions of those bestowed by Sir William Macdonald, it is only just, however, that the magnitude of his liberality should be emphasized, since it must indicate the ruling purpose of his munificence.

Sir William Macdonald was no sentimentalist. He disliked effusive thanks and he was reticent toward the public. He sought for no place in the limelight and was not easily enthusiastic in speech. "Deeds, not words" might well have been his motto, and many a story is told illustrating his aptitude for acts rather than orations.

The well-known Montreal journalist, Mr. J. A. McNeil, tells this story to illustrate Sir William's practical appreciation of academic demands.

"A piquant story, showing the promptness with which Sir William acted when any crisis arose may serve to illustrate his true friendliness to the cause of education. A residential property encroaching upon one corner of McGill's somewhat cramped grounds came upon the market, in order to settle an estate. Thus, before the University authorities could arrange to finance its acquisition, there came the announcement one evening that a local syndicate had purchased it as a site for a fine hotel. Sir William Peterson, at that time the Principal of McGill University, hurried to Sir William Macdonald and laid the case before him. The latter showed but perfunctory interest at first; but as the agitated Principal expatiated upon the indignity which would be done the fine campus flanked by the noble group of buildings, given by Sir William, the Highland blood asserted itself. 'I'll not see McGill made the backyard of any hotel,' he declared. 'Leave it to me, Peterson?' The next morning he entered a bank of which he was a director and of which a member of the syndicate was a leading official. 'Tom,' he said; 'I hear you've bought the Joseph property for $142,000.' 'Yes, Sir William. I want it for the University.' 'I'll give you $142,500 for it. Send for the notary.' But, Sir

Education is valued to-day in a sense hitherto unknown. The great revivals of learning of the past affected, as a rule, but a small band of students:—but the educational movements of to-day are directed by those who strive to reach all. A college should mean the real democracy, for there is no royal road to learning:—and the honors are won by work and perseverance. It is the glory of a young country, such as ours, that some of her successful citizens to whose youth was denied the opportunity for Success in the realm of finance was Sir William Macdonald's in so marked a degree that it soon was in his power to make what gifts he chose to institutions evoking his interest and sympathy. To McGill University he naturally turned, as a field for his educational benefactions, to such substantial purpose that there stand to-day a group of buildings, as noble a monument as man might wish, a living memorial of the man who took thought for the equipment of the student of to-morrow.

Through Arched Windows

By F. O. Call

Illustrated by E. J. Dinsmore

I dwell for a short space in a lofty tower
With four arched windows open to the four winds of Heaven.

Tall and slender they are,
Lancets of light piercing the gray stone walls.

Through one window I can see a pathway,
Rough-hewn and rugged winding among the pines
Over a steep hillside.
And men go up and down the whole day long,
Some gaily and lightly,
Others staggering under their burdens,—
But no one tarries.

Beyond the second arch there lies a pleasant valley,
Where lovers wander side by side,
Or loiter in the gray-green shadows.
Some for a short hour,
And some through lingering years.

And through the third arched window
I see the sky-line of the purple hills,
Where dawn comes down to rest its shimmering wings,
And I catch a glimpse of flowing water,
Gray and blue and gold.

And through the last I cannot see at all,
For it is darkened by a crimson curtain
That hangs in heavy folds across the casement;
But in a crevice of the window ledge
There grows a tiny flower,
That burns a clear blue flame against the dark.

And thus I see life, love, beauty and death,
Framed in the carven stone of my lancet windows;
But I would not see all that lies beyond,
For I can dream that the rough path leads to the door of home,
Or to a shadowy hollow in the hillside,
And that beyond the purple hills and in the far-off valley
There lie enchanted gardens,
And the shining river
I know leads onward to the sea.

But the tall darkened window
Brings me more wondrous dreams than all the others,
For I believe some day the small blue flower beside the casement
Will burn the curtain with its steel-blue flame,
And I shall see more radiant visions Than all my dreams have brought me through the years.

DANIELS was speaking when Nona entered; and since he had his back to the door, it was not until he noticed that our glances were directed behind him that he became aware of her presence. He stopped, and Mr. Leigh asked:

"What is it, Nona?"

Her answering smile included us all, as with that graceful swaying walk of hers she crossed the room and seated herself on the arm of her father's chair. Daniels' piggish eyes lighted at the sight of her, and his gross countenance twisted into what he doubtless considered a particularly ingratiating expression. He glanced at Mr. Leigh inquiringly.

"My daughter," said the latter simply.

It was an explanation rather than an introduction, and Nona seemed faintly puzzled as she bent her head in acknowledgment. It crossed my mind that though Daniels had introduced himself in the course of our conversation—the casual sort of talk which takes place between strangers encountering in the lounge of a summer hotel—he could not possibly know our names. If he realized the fact, it seemed to trouble him not at all, for he answered Nona's nod with a fatuous smirk that increased the vague dislike which I already felt toward him. Nona's fingers began to play with a lock of her father's hair, and through her lowered lashes she glanced at me as she spoke:

"Daddy, will it be all right to go to the Pavilion with Ron for a little while? It's such a glorious night—and I haven't had a dance for ages."

Mr. Leigh looked across at me with those grey eyes of his which never seemed to vary in expression. He spoke slowly:

"I don't know, daughter. The doctor said absolute quiet, you know."

"Oh, but daddy!" Her voice held that persuasive, caressing inflection which would make it impossible for any man to refuse her anything. "That was nearly a month ago, and now I'm as strong as I ever was. We won't stay long—just a few dances. Please, daddy!" her arm slipped round his shoulders, and she pressed her cheek against his hair.

A faint smile curved the lips behind the neatly trimmed beard. He spoke indulgently:

"I expect it's getting pretty dull for you youngsters now that everybody's gone. All right—trot along; only mind, Nona—no later than ten."

"I'll remember." She flashed me a triumphant smile as she stooped to kiss his cheek. "I'll be ready in about twenty minutes, Ron," she threw over her shoulder as she swayed across the room.

Daniels took his eyes from the doorway as he disappeared. I think he was about to make some comment, but he noticed something in Mr. Leigh's manner which made him change his mind; and after a brief silence he plunged, without any invitation on our part, into the narrative interrupted by Nona's entry. It was a tale extraordinary enough in itself; but coming from his lips as he sat there, stodgy and commonplace, puffing complacently at a fat cigar, its adventurous ring was utterly incongruous. He represented himself as a roving gentleman of fortune who had been stranded in Shanghai when the Russian revolution broke out. In his own brain (and one searched the thick-featured countenance in vain for any vestige of intelligence) he had conceived the scheme of hiring a squad of camera men and securing a cinematographic record of this gigantic political upheaval. He at once set about the forming of a syndicate; and though at first he was laughed at for his pains, the downfall of the Kerensky regime and the entry of Russia upon her experiment in Communism had worked in his favor, and eventually he had secured backing of half a million dollars. He set out upon his journey with half-a-dozen assistants; and I am sure that during all his arduous journey from Vladivostock to Petrograd—and I found it almost impossible to believe that anything under Heaven could induce him to undergo the physical hardships he described—his imagination was totally untouched by the magnitude of the events which he had resolved to record. He was going to take pictures which would be worth money—a colossal sum of money, in his estimation—and the thought captivated him to the exclusion of all other ideas.

He got his pictures. He told us some of the things he had photographed, and lingered with a nauseating enjoyment over the more gory scenes. The fanatic zeal of the Communist enthusiasts; the cold-blooded calculation of those who were eventually swept into power on the crest of a wave of idealism; the plight of the peasants, menaced alike by Red Terror and White Terror and only praying to be left in peace to their harvests—all this had passed him by. He saw only murder and rapine and debauchery, and the money which he would make out of his pictures of human misery. He had seen and photographed the Royal Family as they were being conveyed from Petrograd, and had later gathered from various sources a general if unreliable account of their ultimate fate. He told it all in a flat, complacent voice, without embellishments, and it was astonishing to realize how utterly he missed any true understanding of his story. He had absolutely no comprehension of the degradation which these proud Romanoffs must have felt when they, who had been little less than gods, were forced to give the most servile obedience to the semi-barbarians who were their captors. Nor did he attempt to visualize the contrast between the finely tempered aristocrats and the sullen moujiks who had overthrown them, nor to appreciate the manner in which he who had been called the Little Father would face the end as he had faced everything in life—like a gentleman. I was heartily glad to hear that the Bolsheviks had seized his vile films and made a public bonfire of them, and prejudice moved me to doubt his assertion that he had saved one by wrapping it around his body.

I left the room to meet Nona while he was still smacking his lips over the unsavory episode of a little school-teacher who had trusted him to save her from the Bolsheviks. He had indeed saved her—at a price which left her little reason to care into whose hands she fell. As I stepped into the hall it seemed that I had passed from an atmosphere of degradation into the cool, pure air of a cleaner world. I was aware of a curious sense of relief from the oppressiveness of Daniels' presence. It was not simply that he seemed to leave a moral taint on everything with which he came in contact; it was something more personal—something that moved me to bitter antagonism. I had a sudden sense that I had narrowly escaped a violent physical quarrel; yet there was no ground for any such fear and I was puzzled to account for it.

No less puzzling was Mr. Leigh's attitude toward the man. His casual attention would excite no wonder in a stranger; but to me the fact that he had condescended to listen to the blatant vulgarities of Daniels—and to listen without any sign of impatience was something altogether remarkable. I vaguely fancied that under his calm manner there was an unwonted air of tenseness. I had then, of course, no cause to suspect the real truth—that he was studying the man with a fascinated preoccupation that noted every word, every gesture, with a terrible and delighted anticipation of which his politely aloof attitude revealed nothing. It is all dreadfully clear to me now.

NONA clattered down the stairs, clearing the last three steps with a jump that landed her, laughing, at my side. She slipped her arm through mine; and as we started down the narrow plank sidewalk that led to the Pavilion, the joy of her comradeship filled me with a great glow of happiness. A creature of many moods and sudden extremes of emotion, she had given me more than occasional cause, since our engagement three months before, to reflect somewhat gloomily upon the course of true love; but tonight her gaiety was accompanied by a subtle tenderness that was more than sufficient consolation for any pretty hurts she might once have inflicted. Her very fragility seemed to add to her elfin beauty—that vivid loveliness which her illness had only served to accentuate. To describe her I should have to write a poem in free verse, consisting mostly of adjectives. I could not help noticing the quick glances of interest and admiration as we emerged from the shadows into the brilliant light of the open-air dancing floor; and my heart warmed to the thought that I must be the envy of every man in the place.

The orchestra had just crashed into a fox-trot with a rhythm that set our feet tingling. We swung into the measure; and then suddenly, in the way in which unwelcome thoughts will intrude themselves unbidden, I had a vision of Daniels, red-faced and corpulent, dancing with Nona as I was dancing now—his flabby, sweating palm pressing her close to him, his eyes bright with the sensual delight which I had seen in them only a short time before as he described the Russian school-teacher for our benefit. My jaw set with anger at the thought. Then I became aware that Nona was gazing up at me with an anxious expression.

"What is it, dear?" she asked softly.

"Just thinking," I smiled back at her.

"You shouldn't think things like that," she bantered. "You looked so fierce that I was afraid I'd missed a step, or something equally unforgivable."

"Nothing so terrible as that," I assured her. "It was something—oh, never mind. I won't let it happen again." Determinedly I put away all thoughts of my unwelcome acquaintance. There could be no profit in spoiling our evening by any reference to him; and to my relief Nona did not pursue the subject.

She was silent for the rest of the dance—indeed, the evening passed with little conversation of any sort between us. It was one of those hours of such untrammelled pleasure as to make any comment both futile and unnecessary; and it was with regretful surprise that I suddenly realized that we must leave. By tacit agreement we took the path along the cliffs leading back to the hotel. The low moon threw a path of broken silver across the water; and the dim light faded into a deepening purple that blended sea and sky into a single background of infinite distances. Only the faintest breeze stirred, bringing to our nostrils the keen tang of the sea; and the rhythmical beat of the waves on the sands below drifted up to us like some dim crooning lullaby. It was a night of enchantment—a night when beauty and silence and shadows were leagued together to blot out the workaday world; and if two lovers felt their hearts drawn closer to each other, and spoke under the moon of dreams too tender

A DAUGHTER OF NIPPON

By NEATA M. STEEVES

Illustrated by the Author

IT WAS cherry-blossom time. In April, when these flowering trees are radiant with blossoms, no fairer sight can be seen, even in Japan. No other people can appreciate them as the Japanese do, and for centuries their poets have sung their praises and their artists painted their subtle beauties. The world is young again in cherry-blossom time and hearts that were sad become glad, for it is a gala season with men as well as nature.

Ito San in her jinrikisha was being taken by the trusty Japanese servant back to school in Torii Zaka. Her little hands held tightly the gift-box for the beloved foreign teacher, the principal of the school. As the jinrikisha glided swiftly beneath the over-arching cherry-blossoms she recalled a morning just like this four years ago in cherry-blossom time, when her father had first brought her to the foreign school in Torii Zaka Street. Her heart was aching that morning four years ago, she remembered it well. In fact, as she recalled it now, it seemed like another child and not herself at all; that little, timid, lonely girl who was going to be left alone in Tokyo while her parents and brothers were in England. Some day she too could go, her father had promised then, but in the meantime she must learn English and English ways.

Now, looking up into the cherry-blossoms overhanging the long avenue, she recalled it all, the farewell words of her father in the office of the school,—"Be a brave, good child, Ito San," he had said as he took his farewell of her and left her alone there. How strange it had all been then and how fearful her foreboding for the new life she was entering upon. She had seen long lines of girls passing through the halls to the classrooms, they had seen her too and had whispered, "A new girl," which made her feel lonelier still. Her awe, too, of the principal, with whom she had been left alone in the office, was so great that she had remained speechless with grief and loneliness.

She remembered being led through the long halls to the matron's room. It was then the new life began. That cheery welcome from Okoba San who seemed waiting for her and who seemed at once to understand the heart-ache, comforted her beyond words to express. Okoba San had kept her that morning with her, showing her the class-rooms, the great assembly-hall, the tennis-courts, the basket-ball grounds, the gymnasium and the foreign pianos in the little practise-rooms. In one room a pupil was practising and Okoba San had asked her to play for them, which she did with a shy smile of welcome to Ito San. How different the piano music had seemed to her from her koto music. Her koto teacher had always praised her skill. She wondered if she could ever become skilful playing the piano.

That is what she had thought then, the day her new life began. Now, she longed to touch again the piano keys and express all the gladness she felt in music. It seemed like a year's instead of a month's absence. Now, returning to the school was so different from that day so long ago when she had come filled with dread and fear and loneliness. Now, she felt she had never been so glad in her life, as on this spring morning, returning to school. The cherry-blossoms had never looked so lovely. She gazed with rapture up into the blossom-laden branches intent upon the happiness of the day and scene.

There was the gate-house of the school already in sight. Old Morimoto, the gate-keeper, seemed waiting to welcome her. She stepped quickly from her jinrikisha the moment it stopped, and hurried down the winding path bordered with dwarf pines. Ei San, the old gardener, looked up from his basket of pine-needles and smiled and bowed a welcome. Everyone was glad this glad morning and she gladdest of all, she thought.

She paused on the steps of the main entrance and in the Japanese way called "go men naisai" (may I enter), then suddenly laughed at her mistake and rang the door-bell. She heard steps coming and as the door opened her happy heart expressed its gladness in the customary brief greeting, "tadaima" (I have returned). It was the principal, Miss Allen, who had opened the door to welcome her and whose eyes shone with the kindly welcome—"O kaeri" (it is indeed your honorable return). After many bows and greeting formalities Ito San followed Miss Allen into the office and, bowing again very low, said, "O sensei, sensei, I am so glad to be back again! I never was so glad! Here is a little worthless gift, please condescend to accept it." And she raised the gift with graceful ceremony in offering it to her teacher.

Miss Allen thanked her and placing it upon her desk took up a parcel and a

"Are you not glad to be back, little one?"

Ito San bowed low again to the floor and then began sobbing as if her heart would break. Okoba San waited in silence, too puzzled to continue her questioning. This was so unlike Ito San. She rose to go but Ito San bade her stay as she sobbed afresh and in broken words said:

"My father! Oh, my letter! What shall I do! I cannot be filial in this, it cannot be! Alas, alas!"

And she gave the letter to Okoba San, who, unfolding it, read therein the announcement of the completion of Ito San's marriage arrangements with Saito San of Kyotz, the son of her father's old friend.

Ito San had seen him for the first and only time at her grandmother's the day she had arrived in Kyoto. But no hint or word had been said then of her approaching marriage. She had only spoken a few words to him in the presence of her grandmother, who had said he came to bring greetings to the daughter of his father's friend.

"Alas! and this, then, is why I was taken from school to visit my grandmother so unexpectedly, that Saito San might look upon my countenance and decide whether he wished the completion of the marriage arrangements as planned by his father for him. I cannot, cannot marry him! I do not wish to marry anyone yet. I am only fifteen this month, Okoba San. Surely my father will forgive me if I refuse to obey his wishes."

OKOBA SAN as she listened knew that words from her were useless, and comfort, if it came at all, would not come at once. She moved to the window and looked sadly out into the garden. She was recalling an occasion like this in her own life. She had refused to marry the one her parents had chosen for her and by this disobedience to her parents' wishes had been cast out and disowned. Life had been filled with many hardships since. Could she then advise another to do as she had done? to suffer as she had suffered at the hands of her relatives who looked upon her as unfilial and ungrateful?

But she longed to comfort this child in her first great sorrow, a sorrow of which there can be none greater in a Japanese woman's life. For to her marriage is as much a matter of course as death, and is no more to be avoided, it seems.

"Ito San, my child," she said, coming close beside her and lifting her bowed form, "I cannot leave you thus. Come with me. It is the school 'undokai' (play-day). I have gone early to see the cherry-blossoms at Mukojima. My morning's duties kept me from going with them, but we can go together now. Forget about your letter, put it away and come with me. The next car goes to Mukojima at eleven. I will come for you as soon as our lunches are ready. Come, child, the day is beautiful."

While Ito San waited there for Okoba San, the silence of the great school seemed unbearable. The gladness of the morning was like a far away dream. Life was different now. She could no longer be a happy school girl, but was now the promised bride of a repulsive stranger.

They were soon leaving Tokyo by a suburban car, flying past bamboo groves and rice-fields, and pretty gardens on the sloping hillsides. The beauty of the transformation of the spring over the landscapes near and far soothed Ito San's grief-stricken heart. But she remained silent, and Okoba San, who understood, spoke not, and they both gazed quietly out as the car hurried them on to Mukojima.

Leaving the station at the little village, they walked along the river-bank under the cherry-blossoms, watching the reflection of the pink trees in the quivering stream. The delicate tint of the blossoming trees against the blue of the April sky made a symphony of wonderful beauty. The songs of the birds and the warmth of the morning sun seemed to bring back to Ito San some of the gladness of the early morning.

Soon they came to a tea-house on the river-bank where the school girls were to leave their lunches. The old woman who came out with a tray bearing tea and cakes invited them to rest in the arbor of her garden. She told them in reply to Okoba San's inquiry that the school girls with their teachers had gone for a boat-ride up the river and would return for their lunches early in the afternoon.

Okoba San and Ito San, refreshed with the rest and the fragrant tea strolled on along the river and entered soon a little path that led through a bamboo grove into the rice-fields. Following this they came to a shrine, very prettily situated on a hillside, a waterfall near and a garden filled with tall flowers. They sat down in the shade of a wild camellia hedge to rest awhile. It was not long before an old woman came with pennies to the shrine. She clapped her hands in prayer. Ito San watched her intently, and as she turned to leave the shrine, their eyes met. The old woman started as one who sees a ghost, a great flash of light seemed to flood her face and she stood transformed from old age to youth. It was but a moment so and then bending low with age she bowed again and again as if in apology and hurried back into the path that led through the fields to a rice-mill.

Although they had rested there so short a time, when Ito San turned to Okoba San to speak about this strange incident, she found her fast asleep with her head resting on her soft kimono sleeve.

Ito San sat watching the strange old woman as she hurried along the path to the mill wondering where she had seen that foreign-stamped letter. "These arrived yesterday for you, Ito San. I hope your parents are well. You may go to your room now and open them, there are no classes to attend to-day," and then, as Ito San took the letters and turned to go, she added kindly, "We have missed you, Ito San, and we are glad to have you back again."

Ito San, entering her room upstairs, sat down on the cushion beside her little desk and, opening wide the sliding window-panels, looked out into the familiar garden below, fragrant now with spring blossoms. She took up her parcel and opening it read on the inner wrapper, "To be opened on your graduation-day." She took the letter from her kimono-sleeve and began to read it eagerly. Letters from England came at long intervals usually and she felt hungry for this one. Suddenly her face grew pale as death and her head sank down upon her desk. All the sunshine had left the morning, a great wave of darkness seemed to surround her. She sobbed aloud—"My father, I cannot—I cannot." Sobbing thus she remained for some time. A step outside her door aroused her and she heard Okoba San's familiar voice calling, "go men naisai." Thrusting the crumpled letter into her kimono sleeve she opened the sliding-panel door and bowed silently on her knees to the floor. Okoba San was amazed at this silent greeting, and after a moment said:

THE CHEERFUL DINING ROOM

By COLLIER STEVENSON

THAT there really are several strong arguments against the dining room as a household institution may not be immediately evident to the world in general: nor are these arguments at all likely to entirely dislodge the dining room from its time-honored pedestal, so long as personal predilections and conservative conventions continue to sway the public mind, especially in matters pertinent to the home, its equipment and its management. Nevertheless, so near to being indisputable are certain of the points enumerated against the dining room, they merit the closest attention on the part of both present householders and future home-builders.

Undoubtedly, the most serious of these objections concerns the waste of floor space which is involved in the perpetuation of a room solely intended for the serving and partaking of meals—a proceeding that, under ordinary circumstances, rarely occupies more than two hours of the twenty-four. Going a step further, however, we realize that more than valuable floor space is not being utilized to the full extent. A probably expensive suite of furniture is standing idle for the greater part of every day: the pleasant appointments and the artistic accessories of the dining room are remaining in unappreciated solitude, conferring no vantage of pleasure upon their owners except for comparatively brief intervals. Yet, despite its restricted utilization, the dining room is adding materially to the household work, entailing just as constant and as scrupulous care as though it were yielding a bountiful reward in the form of continued service. Is this condition compatible with either our much-boasted conservation or widely-heralded efficiency?

But, to dwell at length upon the disadvantages and the inconsistencies of the dining room as a household institution would be manifestly unjust, unless a remedy were suggested. Here, then, is the suggestion: to combine in the one room of appropriate size the appointments incidental to a living room with those essential for a dining room. The success of such an arrangement is, of course, to a great extent dependent upon the degree of privacy afforded by the location and general treatment of the entrance hall—and, too, in a large measure upon the mode of living maintained within the home.

For a household in which the interests are of the home, rather than of society, the combined living and dining room is, naturally, of especial appeal. The combination is economical in space, in furnishing and in labour: it is undeniably convenient, and it is eminently home-like.

In even hinting at the practicability and the desirability of a combined living and dining room, cognizance is being taken of a radical change which has come about, imperceptibly but surely, in our attitude towards furniture. Twenty, or even fifteen, years ago, the idea of the chief room being furnished with "odd pieces" instead of a "parlor suite" would have been scorned: whereas, nowadays, the most charming living room effects are achieved in precisely that manner. And there is some ground for belief in the rapid, if quiet, approach of the time when the "dining room suite" will be as obsolete as its banished living room compeer. Anticipating that period, it may even now in some cases be futile to provide a separate dining room, largely to hold furniture which, owing to our changing standards, may in a few years be thrust aside.

This old world would, however, be dull indeed and its homes morbidly monotonous were all householders actuated by identical tastes. It is, therefore, fortunate that mankind holds to a wonderful diversity of ideals. As an instance, while many people may be interested in the combined living and dining room, it is safe to assume that a multitude of others have a pronounced leaning towards the entire separation of the two rooms. Let us proceed, then, to point out some of the features which should be incorporated in a dining room to promote its convenience and its charm.

• • •

JUST as it does in relation to a living room, exposure plays a prominent part in the planning of a dining room: and common sense indicates that one of the exposures be Easterly, if not directly Eastward, that the cheering rays of the morning sun may brighten the breakfast hour. A dining room, planned under ideal auspices, has, however, an additional exposure—this in a Southerly direction, to insure abundant sunlight nearly the whole day through.

As a rule, a fireplace is not looked upon as an essential feature of a dining room—probably because so many people under-estimate its economic value.

The walls and the ceiling of this spacious dining room are finished in a flat paint of a light ivory tone, while the wood-work is enameled a slightly deeper ivory. Space-creating, too, is the coloring chosen for the unpatterned rugs and for the straight inner hangings of dyed unbleached muslin—a cool, quiet sea-green. The hangings are, however, enlivened by a binding of warm terra cotta: and, in the chintz used to conceal the radiator and for the cushions in the inglenook, terra cotta is combined with sea-green upon an ivory ground. The French casements, which form such a delightful feature of the room, and the other windows are curtained in ivory marquise: and the mahogany furniture is upholstered in dark brown Spanish leather.

Japanese grasscloth of a soft straw color covers the walls of this simply arranged dining room to ceiling-height, where a wood-moulding provides a suitable finish. This moulding, like the other woodwork in the room, is enameled light ivory and the ceiling is tinted to match. Very sheer Brussels net of a faint ivory tint forms the straight-hanging glass-curtains of sill-length. The inner hangings and the lambrequin of unique contour are of pale rose poplin. They are bordered with a narrow fringe in French blue: and the lambrequin is further adorned by French blue tassels and by an applique of galoon in blue, rose and silver. This alluring combination appears again in the lighting fixtures, which are of silver, shaded in rose over blue. In the Oriental rug used as a floor-covering, blue and rose are also agreeably combined. The silk tapestry chair-coverings are, however, of light rose, carrying a pattern in a slightly darker shade of rose. In this setting, the mahogany furniture is especially well placed.

Nevertheless, a fireplace has a distinct economic value: for, particularly on the inevitable cool days of autumn and spring when furnace heat might be excessive, it can be depended upon to temper the atmosphere of the dining room as occasion demands. Considering the moderately low cost of its installation and the very trifling expenditure it involves in the way of fuel, a fireplace surely brings an ample reward in warmth and good cheer. From the artistic standpoint, too, the fireplace is an asset of established desirability.

Another equipment, the usefulness of which cannot be questioned, is a china-closet. Although it is, of course, possible to purchase a piece of movable furniture to answer the same purpose, the china-closet built-in while a house is in course of construction is usually preferable—not only in its design, but in its capacity and general arrangement. Furthermore, built-in furniture, when installed in moderation, lends an atmosphere of dignity and permanence frequently lacking when furniture of movable type is exclusively employed within a home.

The reference to built-in furniture quite naturally suggests the sideboard problem. Generally speaking, a sideboard is the most expensive individual piece of furniture entering into the development of a dining room; and, moreover, it is, as a rule, the most difficult to secure in a design perfectly adapted to the special requirements of the home-owner. This sideboard problem can, however, often be solved by building-in the sideboard as a permanent feature. This not only aids in the harmonious development of the decorative scheme, but adds considerably to the free floor space in the dining room. It is, perhaps, superfluous to append that the wood-finish of any built-in furniture should correspond with that of the wood-trim throughout the room, rather than with the finish of the movable furniture.

Although the general plan of a dining-room is quite as important as the furniture, it can, nevertheless, not be properly determined until a decision has been reached as to the type, or types, of furniture to be employed. If, for example, the owner should decide to have both the sideboard and the china-closet built-in, it is obvious that a material reduction can be effected in the floor-area. The problem of floor space is likewise dependent to some extent upon the number and the character of the wall-openings; as the latter, in turn, have an important relation to the arrangement of the furniture. If all the furniture is to be of movable type, the wall-openings should be so placed that they will yield adequate unbroken surfaces of wall for the larger pieces of furniture, such as the sideboard, a china-closet and a serving-table; and the floor area should be so scaled that it will provide an exactly centred position for the table and ample passage-room between the table and any pieces of furniture ranged along the wall.

The era of highly-varnished, golden oak dining-room furniture is, happily, now on the wane! Oak as we recognize it to-day is a thing of real beauty: finished in rich browns, rubbed to a dull polish and wrought into furniture of marked dignity. It is especially adapted to such styles as the Jacobean, the Charles II (second) and the William and Mary.

The renaissance of walnut, that beautiful, warm-hued native wood, has already exerted a gratifying influence upon the furnishing of the modern dining room: for some of the most attractive dining room furniture at present available is developed in walnut, after the style of Chippendale, Hepplewhite, Sheraton and the Brothers Adam. In these graceful styles, dining room furniture of mahogany also maintains a well-deserved vogue.

FOR the summer dining room or for a dining room of informal character, painted furniture is always appropriate. Very charming results can be secured, even by the novice, with furniture purchased in an unfinished state and painted at home. By the aid of decalcomanias—none other than the transfer pictures of our childhood days—decorative designs may be applied to the painted surface; and the furniture thereby assume the distinctive quality of that shown in the most exclusive shops. Of course, as is true of any home decoration undertaken without outside assistance,

With a background of white-paneled walls and with French casements to flank it, this built-in sideboard of pleasingly simple design is especially happy in its placement. In this instance, because it backs to an outside wall, the sideboard projects somewhat into the room; but very often a sideboard or china-closet can be so incorporated in an inner wall, that there will be no usurpation of floor-area in the dining room. In addition to its ample storage facilities for much-prized china and its wide counter, the sideboard depicted possesses four large drawers for silver and table-linen and shelved cupboards for additional china. It is, of course, painted white to correspond with the walls and equipped with brushed brass hardware to match the other hardware in the dining room of which it forms so interesting a feature.

In this attractive dining room, oak paneling carried to the ceiling imparts a gracious dignity which extends to all the furnishings and fittings of the room. The paneling is stained to a lovely nut brown that harmonizes perfectly with the finish of the William and Mary furniture. The furniture is, of course, of oak: the chairs seated with dark brown leather and lightened with panels of brown-stained cane. The lighting fixtures, which are of an especially interesting design, are finished in silver. Despite the dark key of the walls and the furniture, the room is, nevertheless, cheerful in appearance; for its ceiling of pale gold reflects much light and its rug of two-toned brown carries a colorful border in orange, blue and bright green. The treatment of the windows also promotes cheerfulness, as the inner hangings are of a printed linen, patterned in green, blue and orange on an ecru background, while the glass-curtains are of pale gold gauze.

the painting of furniture is a task involving much labor and an infinite amount of patience—but the individuality of the completed furniture brings a reward more than commensurate with the effort put forth.

For anyone burdened with nondescript or usage-roughened dining room furniture, the popularity of painted effects offers a helpful suggestion. Even the shabbiest of pieces can be made to blossom forth into new beauty if thoroughly scraped, primed and painted. Ivory-white, temple orange, apple green, peacock blue, French gray and taupe: these are colors frequently chosen for the painting of dining room furniture. Black, too, is smart-looking, when brightened by fine border lines or small applied designs in gay colors.

Because a dining room is not in constant use, there need be no hesitancy in choosing for its adornment colors and combinations of color, which might grow tiresome in a much-used room. Gay-hued fabrics and patterned wall-coverings can also be appropriately employed in the dining room, for they are usually stimulating and cheerful in effect. And cheerfulness should be the goal in the decoration of a dining room!

If a patterned paper be chosen for the wall treatment the window hangings should be made of an unpatterned material and a plain rug should be selected. Let there be but the one dominating pattern in the room and that pattern so excellent in both design and coloring, that all the other furnishings can properly be subordinated to it. If, for instance, the wallpaper be patterned in yellowish-green and dull orange on a tan background, can you not picture the charm of the room when curtains of tan piped with orange and a rug of yellowish-green are added? But what of the chair-cushions? We can very appropriately select for them a fabric striped in yellowish-green and orange.

Whenever soap comes in contact with the skin—use Ivory

IF you had your soap made to order, you would say:

“I want my soap to give abundant lather which cleanses thoroughly and rinses at the first touch of clear water.

“It must be mild so as to clean gently; and pure so that constant use of it will not harm anything it touches.

“It should be white, because whiteness is the outward sign of fine ingredients; and fragrant, so it will be pleasant to use.

“Make it float, both for convenience and economy.”

Then when you could think of no other desirable feature, you would discover that you had enumerated the seven essentials that are combined in Ivory Soap and that make it ideal for the daily bath, toilet, shampoo, nursery and fine laundry.

THE IDOL OF YOUTH

was 12. The room was Mr. Horden's sitting-room, where his dinner was now being served.

I waited for no more details. The next thing I distinctly remember hearing is a voice bawl "Come in!" so I suppose I must have knocked, and knocked hard.

I went in, and shut the door. Mr. Horden was alone. His waiter, having served the first course, had departed. That first course consisted of a pot of Russian caviare, packed in ice. It was not a large pot, and Mr. Horden had plunged a spoon into it.

"Hullo, anything the matter?" he snapped a pair of sharp grey eyes doing detective work on me. I may have looked murderous.

"The caviare!" I cried.

The spoon remained in the pot. "What about it? Ain't it all right?"

My answer was founded on lightning-judgment of the man.

"Yes, it's all right," I said. "But I beg of you to spare it to someone else."

"Gee!" said Mr. Horden. "I like your cheek. Are you a waiter?"

"No," I confessed.

"Thought you didn't have the cut. But they tell me your best V.C.'s and D.S.O.'s are swarming back to be porters and cowmen, etcetera; so why not waiters? What the devil do you want with my caviare?"

"It's the only caviare I can get hold of," I explained.

He snorted. "You haven't got hold of it yet!" and reached out a thin nervous hand towards the spoon.

"I beg!" said I, taking a long step.

"If you knew who the caviare's for—"

"That's not grammar. And I do know. It's for H. S. Horden of Buffalo. Not for some bloated beast you think will pay more than me, and tip higher."

"Bang goes your grammar!" I retorted.

"And the bloated beast is a beautiful girl. She can't pay because she hasn't a penny piece. She's starving. She's to be turned out of her hotel—a temperance hotel."

"Say, things must have been pretty bad with her before she butted into a place like that. Sounds like a story!"

"It's a true one."

"Are you doing this stunt for a bet, or are you a film actor, my brave Douglas Fairbanks? I don't see the camera."

My heart warmed to Mr. Horden. I knew now that I should get the caviare. I was in a hurry. But the more haste the less speed. I splashed out the history of La Mysterieuse—the little I knew and my connection with it.

The small brown man roared, or rather, cackled. "You're a cure for dyspepsia," he grinned. "I feel a whole heap better than if I'd eaten the darn caviare. You can have the lot. And say—what would happen if you took a bottle of champagne into a temperance hotel?"

"I wouldn't take it. I'd sneak it," I said. "But I see you have two half bottles in ice. One will do for the young lady. Thanks awfully. You're the best sport I've ever met."

"As for that, there are no flies on you, Bud," returned Mr. Horden of Buffalo. "I guess it's more than half true that the British won the war, with bright boys like you dotted over the landscape. But hold on, my bold buccaneer. You don't get away with my caviare and champagne without paying."

"Sorry!" said I. "Thought it was a gift to beauty in distress. How much?"

"Your word as an officer and a gent to breakfast with me here to-morrow at 9.30 and tell me the next chapter of this serial story. I'd make it lunch, only I may be moving on in my car."

"It's an engagement," I said. We shook hands passionately. I then helped myself to his napkin, and wrapped up the pot of caviare and the half bottle. At the door I met the rabbit, who looked now more of an angel. He had brought my cap and coat.

Great fellow, Tiedelmans!

* * *

I don't want to boast, but to the best of my belief not thirty minutes lay between my leaving the Bournemouth Homeland Hotel and entering it again. Supper must still have been going strong, for the "lounge hall" was deserted save by the smell of fog. I tore upstairs unseen, flung hat and coat into my room, and tapped once more at the door of La Mysterieuse.

Already the voice that called "Entrez!" seemed sweetly familiar, and made my heart beat.

This time Petro did not guard the way. He stood aside looking the ideal mascot for a battle-ship, and cocked his big head like Androcles' lion as I produced my spoil.

La Mysterieuse appeared pleased, but strangely little surprised at the sight of the caviare and champagne. Evidently she had once been of that favoured band who have only to say "Let there be caviare and champagne," whereupon there is caviare and champagne in abundance.

She thanked me charmingly, however, and wondered how I was going to open the bottle. Could I do it with a pair of nail-scissors?

I had never opened champagne with nail scissors; but La Mysterieuse was a girl a man simply couldn't fail before! I had to succeed, and I did, hoping that she'd not seen the blood on my fingers.

Meanwhile (the trick had occupied five minutes) the lady daintily ate caviare and fed Petro with lumps of it on bread crust.

"We haven't tasted anything so good for many, many weary weeks!" the girl said. "Have we, Petro? It is well that we should feast to-night, of all nights."

She spoke with an odd sort of mocking emphasis, and I wondered why "to-night of all nights." Was it her birthday? Or Petro's birthday? But of course I couldn't ask.

Petro had had the water I had brought, poured into a soap dish, therefore the tumbler was ready for champagne. I foamed it in, as the small steady hand held the glass in an absent-minded way.

La Mysterieuse wasn't looking at the bright liquid; didn't seem to be conscious of what she did. Her eyes were fixed on something high on the wall. I followed them with mine, and saw that on top of an overmantel crowded with disastrous bric-a-brac, stood a small plaster-of-Paris bust supposed to represent Augustus Caesar. It was dusty, and half the nose had been chipped off; yet the girl seemed interested, curiously intent. Then, suddenly, she glanced from the dilapidated Emperor to her glass. I had filled it full.

She raised it high, with a sweeping gesture. "Ave, Caesar!" she exclaimed. "Salutation!" pronouncing the word in the French way. After which she drank.

A queer thrill ran through my veins. Of course, she didn't dream a waiter would know anything about Caesar, or certain circumstances in which certain person saluted him. But—"I hope you're drinking your own health, Miss?" I said.

She started faintly, and a little shiver passed over her, as if a "mouse had walked over her grave." "Ah, yes!" she returned. "In a way—I am drinking my own health—and Petro's. This champagne is nice. It's a long, long time since I've had any—years. It does me good. But I want no more. It was very kind of you to get it for me. Won't you finish the bottle?"

"Thank you, miss, I will," I consented, as an excuse for a minute more in the room. "May I drink to your health and the dog's?"

"Drink to a happy ending of our troubles," she said. "That's a good wish. The best for us."

"I will, miss," I assented. "I'll take the bottle downstairs and drink. But pardon the liberty. I don't see how you or the bull can have much health if you never go out. It seems to me I heard somebody say you never do."

"Somebody will always say something!" she retorted, vexed. "We do go out. Every morning as soon as it's light, before anyone except the servants are about. I take Petro for an hour's walk. And at nine-thirty in the evening, when most of the quiet creatures here are creeping up to bed, again I give him a breather. It is enough for both of us."

"You'll soon be starting to-night, then," I ventured. There was a reason for my impudence.

"I shan't go quite so early this evening," she vouchsafed. "I have to dress."

"But if you go late, aren't you afraid of being locked out, Miss?" I persisted.

The girl shrugged her shoulders in the dainty yet passionate way she had.

"I'm not worrying about to-night," she said.

I was.

CHAPTER V.

The West Cliff Path.

JUST because she wasn't "worrying about to-night," a sudden explosion of worry, like an asphyxiating bomb, caught me in the throat.

I saw as by flashlight what she meant to do—what I might do if I were a young girl with nothing in the world except one dress and a bull-dog, about to be turned from an hotel in a foreign land.

"Ave Caesar," indeed!

But what was I going to do about it?

By this time I had reluctantly reached the door. If I didn't open it within a reasonable interval (say half a minute) I should be hinted politely out of the room, as I had been before the caviare episode. I couldn't burst forth with, "I believe you intend to kill yourself to-night! But you shall not! I will prevent it."

Such things simply aren't done—especially by waiters. Besides, she would only need to say, "I intend nothing of the kind. You must be mad, you horrid person! Go away this instant, or I'll ring and have you put out! and that would be that. Finis. The End! Not to be continued in our next."

Never did any waiter wish more wildly to be a hero than I at that moment; but I resisted. "Well then, good evening, Miss," I said with cheery respectfulness.

"Good evening," the girl echoed; and I went out followed, not by her gaze, but by that of Petro. Either the caviare had disagreed with him, or instinct told the dog that something was wrong, even wronger than usual, the wrongest of anything yet. The square face wrinkled as if with all the cares of the world; and his brook-brown eyes seemed to say, "I'm only a dog, but if I were a man I'd help somehow. Can't you?"

I heard voices in the hall below—Aunt Sarah's and Miss Pinch's. Perhaps Miss

Pinch was coming up!.....Instantly I deposited my tray upon the floor, not caring who stepped into its contents, if I could sever connection with it unseen.

This I was lucky enough to do; but there was no side corridor in which to lurk, so I met my Aunt's matrimonial choice for me at the top of the stairs. "Oh, is your room up here, Captain Malet?" she asked. "I thought you lived next door to Mrs. Talbot."

"I must have come a storey too high," I explained. "I'm afraid I'm rather absent-minded."

Aunt Sarah had caught my name, and waited in surprise to question me.

"Christopher, where have you been?" she catechised. "How very strangely you appear to be acting tonight!"

"Only 'appear'!" I assured her. "I had to run out in a hurry to Bathcombe Hotel; great pal of mine from Ypres there! no time to let you know: thought you wouldn't mind."

"If you want to visit a soldier comrade I cannot object," said my aunt. "But I was certainly upset by your conduct—not understanding what it meant. I suppose you had supper with your friend?"

"He gave me some caviare," I replied, "and champagne."

"Hm!" Aunt Sarah expressed disapproval of so worldly a Sabbath meal. "If you are satisfied, I am. But I think myself I should feel rather empty on it."

I too felt empty on it. But that was a coarse detail.

Aunt Sarah was en route to her bedroom, and I was free for the rest of the night. I slipped into my quarters for coat and cap again, and stalked out of the hotel once more—to watch.

The Girl with One Dress had said she was going for a walk with Petro, and I was only too sure that she would keep her word.

Now, I asked myself, if I were bound for a last walk on earth, where would I—if at Bournemouth—go?

The answer was, I should walk off the said earth into the sea. And that was what the girl would do. As for Petro—perhaps she would leave the decision to him.

There were two gates in the garden of our hotel, which stood at a corner. Through one gate you went away from the sea. Through the other you went towards it. I stationed myself within sight of the latter. Near by was a large tree. I propped myself against this and screened myself behind it at the same time; for now and then the moon glittered in the slit of a black cloud, like a new coin in a torn purse.

Half an hour lagged by: three quarters. (I could tell by the strokes of a distant church clock). Had the girl changed her mind? I wondered. Then a big bulk shot through the gateway. It was Petro.

He shot through, wheeled, and paused, legs spraddled. One would deduce from these tactics that on second thoughts he considered it unwise to venture beyond sniffing distance of his mistress. Queer, how animals—such animals as Petro—know things!

A moment more, and she appeared. The One Dress was plainly visible to me in a splash of moonlight, for the girl wore nothing over it. This probably meant that she had no cloak, (had pawed it, perhaps) because it was distinctly a night for cloaks.

What I don't know about women's clothes would fill all the fashion papers published in a year. But I'd read, or heard, a funny phrase that struck me: "the fashionable silhouette," so I'd been

How these oils act

The softening effects of olive oil are responsible for gloss and softness. It produces a mild, penetrating lather which softens and relaxes the scalp and enters roots and hair cells.

The accumulation of dirt and oil is thoroughly dissolved. Dandruff is penetrated and removed.

Palm oil contributes richness and body to this lather and makes it lasting. Both oils have been famous since Cleopatra's day for their softening, relaxing qualities which no others possess.

Frees the scalp from dandruff

Dandruff, which doctors call seborrhea and say causes most hair troubles, is not removed by most shampoos. The dry, oily scales are impervious to usual cleansing. It makes them more powdery and flaky.

But they must be got rid of some way or you may lose your hair. Dandruff packs around the roots and interferes with nutrition. This makes even the normal secretion found on every scalp dangerous to hair health.

The softening, penetrating lather produced by the combination of palm and olive oils, loosens the scales and dislodges them from the scalp. The delicate organism of each hair is free for healthy activity.

Every drug and department store can supply you with Palmolive Shampoo. But first write for the free 15-cent trial bottle and booklet on the care of the hair. One shampoo proves this blend of palm and olive oils benefits the hair. Address Department B-286,

Linoleum Rugs

Make ROOMS Cheerful At Small Cost!

The day is past when careful housewives will take the risks that had to be encountered in choosing floor coverings a decade ago. With the advance of science women have been taught the value of preserving good health at home by adopting sanitary floor coverings—in other words, Linoleum or Linoleum Rugs.

When you purchase Linoleum in the form of a rug or by the yard you have invested in a floor-covering that gives satisfaction and comfort. Its use makes rooms cheerful, and the effort necessary to keep it "spick and span" is negligible. Remove dust with a light mop and you have a bright, clean floor that is sanitary, good-looking, easily kept clean and comfortable to walk on.

Dominion Linoleum Rugs

are uniformly reliable, for they conform to a high standard that has been carefully maintained for years. Wear is built right into them through the incorporation of germ-killing Linseed Oil that has been oxidized and then pressed under great pressure to a base of long-wearing imported burlap.

When you purchase your new floor coverings this spring ask your dealer for DOMINION LINOLEUM RUGS or DOMINION LINOLEUM by the yard. Many new designs are now on sale at prices that are much lower than they have been for years.

face before. It was so strangely familiar, like a person one has seen in a dream, but never in real life.

Okoba San awoke with a start and rose up and said laughingly, "How dreadfully rude I was to fall asleep and leave you here alone, child," adding after a moment, "Let us go on to the mill yonder before returning to the river."

"Oh, yes, let us go," agreed Ito San with an eagerness that surprised Okoba San. Ito San felt an inexplicable hesitation in speaking now of the incident and only said as they started on their way,—"I saw an old woman praying at the shrine while you slept. She just now reached the mill and entered it. I was watching her for she looked like someone I have seen somewhere before."

As they neared the mill she remarked slowly and thoughtfully, "I have always liked the hum of rice-mills, and my last piano piece is my favorite one. It is called 'The Mill,' and when I practice it I always think of a mill like this yonder, with the mossy roof and the great water-wheel nearly hidden in green shrubbery. Isn't foreign music wonderful! It expresses so much more of our hearts' language than our Japanese music. My koto speaks to me only of sadness. There must be glad music, too, Okoba San, to express truly all we feel."

"Yes, child, but until now you have only known glad thoughts. What could you know of the sorrow of which the koto speaks? To me it means much. Often in the dark hours of night the sighing winds bring to me the same message as the koto brings. You, too, will understand it, now, that you are no longer a child."

THE hum of the mill drowned her voice as they came near. They paused a moment on the threshold to say,—"Go men nasai?" (may we enter?). A call from within bade them enter, and, opening the low door, they saw there a small group of women at work. Ito San searched quickly every face until in an inner room she saw that strangely familiar figure bending over a sieve of rice. Even that form, partly concealed as it was by the twilight of the room, seemed to arouse within her a vague feeling of recognition. The woman evidently had not seen them enter and when she turned suddenly toward them she started so violently that the sieve she was holding dropped to the ground with a crash. She stood without moving or speaking, with her eyes fixed on Ito San who, in turn, stood as if spell-bound, then fled from the mill and, crouching outside of the door, waited for Okoba San to come to her. She felt afraid of the woman, she knew not what, she could not go back in, she called to Okoba San but the noise of the mill drowned her voice. She waited, wondering what to do. She crossed the stream by a narrow foot-bridge and entered the path by which they had come. She watched the door of the mill but no one came. What could possibly keep Okoba San there, she wondered. She walked slowly on, looking back constantly, but still Okoba San did not come. She stood a long time hesitating and was about to return to the mill when she saw coming toward her from the direction of the river a long line of girls. Yes, it was her school-friends coming to join them, and Ito San hastened excitedly down the path toward them relieved from the fear that had taken possession of her. All was forgotten in the joy of seeing them again. And as they stood there gaily laughing and talking, Okoba San joined them and led the way back to the tea-house at the river.

The afternoon went quickly with games and amusements, and Ito San was so happy at being back among her school friends that she almost forgot the events of the morning. Not until evening came and they were returning to Tokyo did she recall it all vividly and longed to talk about it alone with Okoba San.

Late that night, when the school was silent and all apparently asleep, after the long day's outing, Ito San lay thinking of all that had happened. Sleep was impossible. She stole over and sat down beside the window. The stars looked down at her, filled with deep mysteries. Life was filled with mystery. She thought of her father, of his letter, and a shudder passed through her at the thought of disobeying him. Next month was her graduation, and then what was her future to be? She had hoped to go to him in England, but now everything was changed.

Softly the panels of her room opened and she saw Okoba San beckoning her to come. She hastened to obey with a sinking heart, for it was against the rules of the school to be up after the gong for retiring had rung.

Okoba San led the way to her own room and placed a cushion for Ito San beside a tray where tea was ready.

"Drink this, my child, and don't look so frightened, we must talk awhile here together," and she drew a warm kimono over Ito San's shoulders as she sat down close beside her.

"To-day," she began, "has been an eventful one for both of us. Ever since you came to the school, Ito San, you have been like my own child. Now listen, and we will understand each other better when I have finished."

"I had a sister like you long years ago. We were very dear to each other for there were no others. I disobeyed my parents' wishes when I was about your age, and was disowned as unfilial. My sister was never allowed to write to me or see me. She married a few years after and lived in Kyoto. She had a child, a little girl and was very ill for years after. Her delicate health was a constant annoyance to her husband. When the child was three years old he divorced my sister and returned her to my parents. He kept the child. And not long after, he married again. There were other children, boys, I think. The second wife was kind to the little girl and wished her never to know that she was not her real mother. But I have heard nothing more of them these many years, except that they went away to a foreign country to live. My parents took my sister to America, where my mother died soon after."

"That is all I knew until to-day, Ito San, and today I found my sister. She had returned to Japan to search for her child. Her mother-heart had yearned for her all these years and to-day, as she prayed at the shrine for guidance in her search, he found her. Yes, Ito San, she found you, her child! And she is here now. Speak to her and call her 'mother.' "And as she spoke she drew open the panel to the adjoining room and there, sitting with bowed head as if in prayer, was the woman she had seen at the shrine."

With a cry Ito San rose and went to her and knelt beside her clasping her hands in hers, and the two sat long in silence. Okoba San left them alone together and when she returned an hour later Ito San said: "My dear and good aunt, how wonderful it all is! We sail next month for America. Promise that you will come with us or join us soon. My grandfather wishes it even more than we."

Federated Women's Institute News

By Elizabeth Bailey Price

EDITOR'S NOTE. In the March issue, this department suffered sadly from a disarrangement. Mrs. Watt's valuable section was inadvertently omitted and the following item was not published in proper form.

GREETINGS TO CANADIAN INSTITUTES.

Mrs. William Todd, national president, Federated Women's Institutes of Canada has received the following greetings, from Lady Denman, chairman of the National Federation of Women's Institutes, England.

These are of interest to every W. I. member in Canada and read as follows: "The news that the Canadian Women's Institutes have formed themselves into a national Federation is arousing much interest in this country and it is with the greatest pleasure, as chairman of the National Federation of Women's Institutes of England and Wales, I send greetings to the National Federation of Canadian Women's Institutes."

"It is our sincere wish that the year 1922 may be a year of great growth and prosperity for our sister federation. We believe that the National Federation will achieve the same measure of success as has been attained by individual Canadian institutes and by provincial organizations, a success which has always been an inspiration to us in this country."

"The Institutes in England and Wales are formed on the model of Canadian Institutes, and they were first organized by Mrs. Alfred Watt, M. B. E. who gave to the country the benefit of Canadian experience. In 1917, when there were 137 institutes, the National Federation of Women's Institutes of England and Wales was formed. At that time the work of forming new Women's Institutes was in the hands of the Ministry of Agriculture, but since 1919 the whole work of the organization has been done by the National Federation, which has been assisted by a generous Government grant."

It may perhaps interest Canadian Institutes to have an outline of the organization, which has been built up and the work which has been done during those four years.

First as to organization. The policy of the National Federation is settled and the executive committee is elected at the annual meeting. Each individual W. I. has complete self-government provided that it adheres to the general policy laid down at the annual meeting. Each W. I. may send a delegate to this meeting and may nominate and vote for the executive committee. At the last annual meeting there were 2,070 Women's Institutes, 1,300 delegates attended and 52 nominations for the executive Committee were received.

In addition each county has a County Federation, which deals with county matters, helps W. I.'s, forms new W. I.'s, gives all information as to speakers, educational facilities and generally does all the mothering of the W. I.'s, which means, very often, the difference between success or failure of the Institutes of that county.

The work of the National Federation may be divided into the following headings:

1. It has schools for voluntary organizers in Institute methods. There are now 210 Voluntary County organizers, who are appointed and trained by the National Federation on the recommendation of the County Federation, and who, on appointment, work under the direction of the County Executive Committee. This ensures that the W. I.'s follow the same broad principles and practices in all parts of the country.

2. It trains teachers in handicrafts, when no teachers are available from the Government Education authorities. This ensures that the W. I. members will, in time, produce work of a high standard.

3. It sends organizers to speak at schools or Conferences arranged by the County Federations for the instruction of presidents, secretaries, treasurers or members of Committee in their duties. As far as space will allow W. I. members are admitted to these conferences, as it is considered advisable for members to know the duties of their officers.

4. It arranges the work of various organizers, who now number only 5, and who only visit counties particularly in want of help.

5. It allocates various sums to each county from the Government Grant.

6. It publishes the Women's Institutes Journal called "Home and Country," which now has a circulation of 19,500. SHORT COURSES IN HEALTH.

Women's Institutes of this Province, and the public in general have benefited greatly by the short course which is nearing its close. This course was arranged by the Extension Department of Macdonald College, and is being held under the auspices of the Women's Institutes in different centres.

The Department is most fortunate in having secured the services of Miss Jessie Forshaw, Inspector of Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada. Miss Forshaw speaks from personal knowledge, having had extensive experience in public health matters from coast to coast.

The women of this Province know little of the suffering in the vast areas of the West owing to lack of medical facilities. In most parts of Canada we seem to be in a measure satisfied to go on with methods little better than those existing in the days of our forefathers.

Miss Forshaw deals with the care and nourishment of mother and babe, attention to proper mental and physical development of the child during its early years, and careful medical and dental inspection during the years of school life.

The speaker was ably assisted by Miss Crane of Macdonald College, who demonstrated "Invalid Cookery" and "Feeding and Nutrition of Children," also "Diet as related to Disease."

Too much cannot be said in favour of the helpful work done by these ladies, and those institute members who failed to hear them have something to regret.

Perhaps it is not generally known that the Health Department at Ottawa is willing to give aid to the public free of charge. There is a little book entitled "The Canadian Mother's Book" written by Dr. Helen MacMurchy, Chief of the Child Welfare Department of the Bureau of Health, which has been freely circulated through Canada. Hundreds of copies of this work have been distributed through the Women's Institutes and have been found most helpful. Later there has been written by the same author a series of fourteen pamphlets known as the "Little Blue Books" (Home Series), issued in French and English. These take up problems pertaining to the Canadian home and are most valuable.

A postal card addressed to the Health Department, Ottawa, will bring any of those publications to our homes without cost, and will open the way for further help.

In a few communities the Women's Institute is undertaking the maintenance of a District Nurse. We hope soon to learn that many rural communities are doing likewise.

INSTITUTE SCHOOLS.

Ontario was the first province in Canada to undertake and establish an institute school for the training of institute workers which is synonymous with community leaders or extension workers. The first schools were held following the conventions in 1920.

In the summer of the past year a Women's Institute school for branch and district officers was put on at the Macdonald Institute, Guelph, running concurrently with the school for Leadership, for one week, the students enjoying some of the same lectures and the social and recreational features of that side of the college life in addition to their own.

The Institute school was in charge of the superintendent and members of the provincial institute lecture staff, assisted by Miss Cruickshank of Macdonald Institute.

Although, owing to the shortness of time and limitations of accommodations, invitations to attend had to be confined to branches in the counties adjacent to Guelph, twenty-five registered for the week's course. Instruction was given by lecture, demonstration and class discussion, the interest displayed being very keen.

The following outline gives some idea of the scope of the course; Historical Development of Agriculture and Country Life.

Every normal skin needs two creams

One for protection and to hold the powder

A wholly different cream to cleanse at night

To protect the skin against wind and dust, apply Pond's Vanishing Cream each time before you go out

To cleanse the skin thoroughly use Pond's Cold Cream before retiring

ONE cream alone cannot supply the skin with all the elements that are needed to keep it in perfect condition. Certain flaws to which the skin is subject can be prevented only by a softening, protective cream. Other flaws need a cream rich in oil, that cleanses and stimulates.

Flaws that require a daytime cream without oil

If you do not protect the skin against sun and wind, it will protect itself by developing a rough coarse surface. To give the needed protection apply a little Pond's Vanishing Cream before going out. This cream is based on an ingredient famous for its softening effect. It leaves the skin fresh and invisibly shielded. Dust cannot work into the pores, wind and sun cannot dry out the skin and make it rough and coarse.

Before you powder, smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream on the face. It is absorbed instantly, removing any shine there may be on the skin. Moreover, it cannot come out in a shine later, for there is not a drop of oil in it.

With this softening cream as a base you will find that the powder lasts many times longer and that it shows less, for there are no rough places for it to catch on.

Whenever your face feels drawn and tight, as if the muscles under it were tied in little knots, touch it lightly with Pond's Vanishing Cream. It brings instant relief to a tired skin, relaxing the muscles, softening the hard, set lines, giving the whole face a fresher color and added vigor.

Flaws that need an oil cream at night

Have you begun to notice little fine lines under the eyes, depressions at the corners of the mouth and the base of the nose, a tendency to flabbiness under the chin? Fine lines become wrinkles before you know it, and wrinkles are almost impossible to erase. The way to prevent them is to give your skin regularly a tonic rousing with an oil cream.

Pond's Cold Cream stimulates the skin, lubricating it and restoring its elasticity. Smooth the cream into the little fine lines, rubbing gently with the lines, not across them. Use a gentle motion always, for too strenuous rubbing is apt to be harmful. By the faithful use of this rich cream, you can keep the lines from fastening themselves on the skin and forming real wrinkles.

The dust and dirt that clog the pores, working their way under the surface of the skin, help to form blackheads. Ordinary washing will not remove them. They demand a deeper, more thorough cleansing. After washing the face with warm water and pure soap, rub Pond's Cold Cream into the skin until the pores are saturated with it. Let the cream remain on a few moments, then wipe it off with a soft cloth. This rich cream contains the oil necessary to penetrate the pores and rid them of every particle of dirt.

Begin using both these creams today

Use regularly these two creams that every normal skin needs. Neither will clog the pores nor encourage the growth of hair. Your druggist and the departmental stores carry both jars and tubes in convenient sizes at 50 cents each. The Pond's Extract Co., Toronto, Canada.

The Story of The Cracked Piano

"I had a beautiful mahogany upright piano and by reason of shutting our house up for several months—with poor climatic conditions, I found that the surface of the piano had become dull and covered with tiny cracks. I tried several polishes but they did nothing more than make the condition seem more noticeable. Then I tried with really astonishing results. True, the cracks did not disappear but there was a rapid improvement in the appearance of the piano. The cracks became barely noticeable and the finish seemed to take on new life and lustre.

"I use Liquid Veneer in my daily dusting on all my fine furniture."

THERE is no use in denying that most of us, if we have not a belief in ghosts, have a certain fear of them. I remember a house in Barrie overlooking Kempenfeldt Bay, which was a substantial structure, well-built, but for which the owner found it difficult to secure a tenant, because it was said to be haunted. Finally, an innocent person came, leased it for a year, but left before the year was out—all on account of strange knocks and mysterious wrappings which did not inflict bodily harm but which made the family highly uncomfortable. Now, it is all very well to laugh at ghosts in the broad day-light and to treat them as matters of little moment. It is quite another affair, when midnight is passed, and you hear creaking sounds or loud explosions which apparently have no earthly cause.

Perhaps you will be more than willing to spend the night alone in a house which is said to be haunted—but most of us would like to be near a telephone, so that we might call up police headquarters. I do not suppose there is a policeman living, who has arrested a ghost, but there is something comforting in the very thought of a sturdy blue-uniformed figure somewhere within call.

Every province in the Dominion has its own ghost stories. Probably Quebec has the creepiest of them all. Nova Scotia has recently found a house which has been deserted by its owners on account of mysterious fires which have been kindled apparently by no human agency. The correspondent of the "Halifax Herald" went down to investigate, and admitted that strange sounds were heard throughout the night. Now, a group of scientists will try to discover whether the "blue blazes" came from wireless operations at Glace Bay. The historic County of Antigonish has given us an authentic thrill—and we hope that the scientists will not quite destroy the mystery.

YOU know how amusing it is to hear a chorus from women of "just like a man" when an erring brother has been discovered in a trivial or serious offence. Just as unfailing is man's "they're all alike," when woman forgets what is trump or overdraws her bank account. Sudden sympathy flashes out and women, for the moment, form a defensive sisterhood while men preserve a masculine alliance, when certain mistakes are to be classified according to the sex of the perpetrator. There are really few distinctions to be made, either in folly or in wisdom, so far as sex is concerned. Mrs. Poyser, the memorable sharp-tongued dame in George Eliot's "Adam Bede," made many discerning remarks concerning people and things, but none more conclusive than her reply: "I'm not denyin' that women are foolish, but the Lord made them to match the men."

I WONDER if we are ever sufficiently thankful to the musicians among us who belong to our choral societies and who spend many weary hours in practice, that they may interpret for us the works of the great masters. Consider the undertaking of the programmes of the Mendelssohn Choir, for instance! Hundreds of singers have worked for years and conductors have flung their enthusiasm and the training of a lifetime into the achievement of producing a "Ninth Symphony" or a Brahms' "Requiem." Of course, the workers get out of it something which cannot be estimated in dollars and cents; but the "everlasting miracle's the same"—the magnetism of the conductor, the unselfish devotion of members of the Choir. Year after year, this work has gone on, until Canada now has a choral organization which this month is singing before audiences in Philadelphia, New York and Baltimore, winning the favor of the most formidable critics.

Art is its own exceeding great reward, and the joy which comes from achieving that which is very good must bring great and abiding satisfaction to singers who give such service as the members of the Mendelssohn Choir have offered for these twenty-five years. The silver jubilee of these golden-voiced singers has just been celebrated. May the diamond anniversary find the circle lustrous still, although many "will have moved a little nearer to the Master of all Singing."

WE HAVE all heard of the spring poet—and verily he is strong in the land. He has been made the subject of innumerable newspaper jests and yet his bright spirit is unconquerable. He merely goes to work (or play) and writes another poem on violets or daffodils. When the popular magazines demand that spring poetry be sent in far ahead of the first thaw—in December or January—it is no wonder that the genuine poet's ardor is chilled. He decides that neither the "Atlantic Monthly" nor the "Century" is to publish his immortal verse, and he sends it instead to the "Herald" or the "Brownsville Star."

"It is the old mood of the spring, A sweet and a heart-breaking thing—

The budding joy, the vanished good; For, though we pluck the daffodils, Or walk with laughter on the hills,

Yet go we empty through the wood."

We are all poets in the spring days—even if the poetic spirit may take the form of an Easter hat or a fervor for house-cleaning instead of an ode. Yet it is in the April days that the sadness of spring-time comes most poignantly.

How Famous Movie Stars Keep Their Hair Beautiful

The Secret of Having Soft, Silky, Bright, Fresh-Looking Hair

STUDY the pictures of these beautiful women and you will see just how much their hair has to do with their appearance.

Beautiful hair is not a matter of luck, it is simply a matter of care.

You, too, can have beautiful hair, if you care for it properly.

Beautiful hair depends almost entirely upon the care you give it.

Shampooing is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why leading motion picture stars and discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—always using clear, fresh, warm water. Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before. You can easily tell when the hair is perfectly clean, for it will be soft and silky in the water.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any pharmacy or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months. Beware of imitations—be sure you get Mulsified. Look for the name Watkins on the package.

WATKINS
MULSIFIED
COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO
MADE IN CANADA

WITH the vanishing of March, most of us breathe a sigh of relief. It is almost as unpopular a month as November—but not quite. March has the hint of coming flowers and warmth and there is the suggestion of spring-time on the horizon. So, we put up with all the winds that blow and console ourselves with the thought of the May blossoms which are waiting for us farther on.

The early winds of the first month of spring may have played malicious tricks, however, with the skin and hair of the woman who has been obliged to be out every day. It is well when April comes to have a kind of stock taking of one's physical forces and find out just how "fit" we are. The old-fashioned doctrine of a spring tonic was very wise teaching and you will find that the skin and the hair are in need of a tonic, also. The hair is almost certain to require a good deal of treatment, for the winter hat has proved more trying to the hair than the light headwear of spring and summer. Whatever you do, avoid the ugly unconventionality of going without a hat in the summer. In some cities you will see many a pretty head exposed to the sun and the dust, with no thought of protection. At the end of the season, the hair will be coarsened and burned and the hatless one will be lamenting the condition of her face and the fading of her crown of glory. An occasional sun bath is a very good thing for the hair; but constant exposure to the rays of the sun is a mistake.

We sometimes deplore the showers of April. However, the rains which come in this month of awakening are just as healthy for humanity as they are for Mother Earth herself. Do not remain in the house if the rain is pattering down. Go out to meet it and you will find that you are refreshed, just as if you were a daffodil or a violet. The freshness of the British complexion may come partly from the salt air—but credit must also be given to the walk in the rain.

THE interest of the feminine world in a "sale" is proverbial. A bargain, whether it be a blouse or a vacuum cleaner is almost certain to attract a large gathering of womankind. Wherefore, when a firm which dealt in all matters relating to beautifying, advertised a "sacrifice" of creams, perfumes, hair nets and "such" it was no wonder that the shop was crowded and that the counters were swiftly swept of their most attractive goods. Vanishing creams lived up to their name and disappeared with a rapidity which left you wondering how soon the city would become quite beautiful from all this purchase of the aids to loveliness. Hair nets, cap and fringe, in all colors, were bought by the dozen. Shell hair pins were a drug in the market and combs of all shapes and sizes were acquired with a rapidity which made a run on the stock market look tame.

There were the most alluring little bags for powder puffs, with Paris peeking from the top of each one. Even a decorous affair made of plaid did not succeed in looking really Scotch. There was a bag of mauve satin and there were several of Alice blue, and a perfect host of little pink bags, all looking as if they might carry the fairy gift of an apple-blossom complexion. It was, indeed, a day of bargains and the mere man who regarded the throng which repaired to that shop of beauty wares might be assured that votes and a seat in the House of Commons would never be the most seductive prizes in the eyes of women.

We are told that these are hard times, but one might notice that the perfume which had been four dollars an ounce and which had suffered a "reduction" to two dollars for that quantity was in immediate demand and disappeared almost as swiftly as the face creams. There were vanity cases, too,—delightful bits of tortoiseshell and silver and one of amber with inlay of gold which most of us merely gazed at with respect. Perhaps a stray movie star came along and bought it, for the price, even for a bargain, was more than we cared to consider.

THE LETTER BOX.

K. E. G. You are a very lucky girl. I assure you, to have green eyes, brown hair and rosy cheeks. And yet you call yourself common-place! My dear girl, don't you know that green eyes are considered by many authorities a desirable possession? Rosy cheeks are all too rare in these nerve-wracking days:—and the touch of rouge is never quite so charming as the real rose of youth. Keep your eyes bright, your brown hair with a gloss on it and the rosy cheeks unfaded. Your extremely Irish name would lead one to believe that you are not without a sense of humor and that life is likely to seem worth while to you, whether the Vanity Box is filled or not. I have sent you some advice about the eye-lashes and I hope that yours will soon be the long, sweeping kind which are most effective.

MABEL. Don't use rouge if you are only eighteen. There is no reason in such a proceeding. A touch of the rose-tinted compact powder which we used to call rouge should be indulged in only by those who have lost youth's first freshness and who are anxious not to appear too worn and sallow. The rouge has its uses—but it is better never to touch it than to misuse it. Sweet eighteen should have no need for it. All you require, Mabel, is an application of a little good cream occasionally and a light application of powder if the face is too shiny in the warm weather.

PEGGY. What a long way your letter has travelled, all the way from the Pacific to our sanctum to ask about hair tonics and "such." Really, from what you say concerning the town in which you are so fortunate as to have your home, you should never need a tonic of any kind. A girl who lives in the midst of such loveliness, with the mountains to look up to, and a beautiful lake spread out for her daily delight ought to have the healthiest and happiest of lives, with no need to write about hair tonics. Nevertheless, I am glad to get your letter, for it brings a welcome breeze from the wide spaces to the stifled town. Good luck, and happy days!

This school is overcoming what has been one of the greatest obstacles to thorough and efficient organization—the lack of leaders—in Women's Institutes work. Theoretically, every member in the branch institute takes her turn and does her bit in holding office acting on committees, taking part in the programme, social and educational and on the various general activities for the promotion of community welfare. While many do this—others hold back. The cause for this, investigation shows, is in most cases, timidity arising from a lack of knowledge of what to do and how and when to do it. Institute Schools are overcoming this difficulty.

ONTARIO WOMEN'S INSTITUTES.

THE following points from the programme chosen by the Standing Committee on Education and Better Schools, Miss K. F. McIntosh, convener of the Ontario Women's Institutes, indicate the range and practical nature of the interest taken in this line of community progress.

Their aims are to secure:

(1) Co-operation between Institutes and schools through Home and School Committees—this rather than by organizing separate home and school councils. A Branch may have among its membership women from two, three, four or possibly more school sections. Appoint a committee of two from each section who would visit their own school gaining a friendly co-operation between teacher, pupils, Institute and trustees, (instance several cases—games, soap, towels, etc.). Mainly we want the mothers to see either through their own eyes or those of their committee, conditions in and around the schools.

(2) School Improvement:

(a) Of buildings now in existence. It would not be wise to scrap all the little red, one-roomed school houses. They have served a purpose in our national education and for financial and other reasons, it is impossible to replace them at once with buildings conforming more nearly to our present day standard.

These buildings may be made to render further service by improvements which, while costing very little in themselves, will very materially benefit future citizens who lay the foundation for scholastic accomplishment here and often—too often—the foundation for future ill health.

(b) To see that schools now being built conform to all requirements of health and education. If Institute members at their meetings study a number of plans for school buildings, they could, when discussion on a new school came up in the section, guide the planning in such a way that the best results would be achieved.

Amaze Your Friends— Learn Music Quickly at Home

Through This Wonderful New Method You Can Now Learn to Play Your Favorite Instrument in a Few Short Months Entire Cost Averages a Few Cents a Lesson

"HOW did you ever do it? Where in the wide world did you ever learn to play so quickly?"

This is the question that thousands of my students have been asked and are being asked daily.

With my wonderful easy print and picture lessons for beginners, their progress has been nothing short of astonishing. Not only their friends, but they themselves were amazed at their sudden ability to play or sing. With this accomplishment they have been able to achieve greater popularity than they ever thought possible. And you can do the same.

Even if you don't know the first thing about music, don't know one note from another—with this new method you can easily and quickly learn to sing or to play your favorite musical instrument. And all in your spare time at home—without a teacher!

To those who are not acquainted with my system this may sound like a pretty strong statement. Yet I stand ready and willing to back up every word of it. I have taught music to over 250,000 men, women and children in all parts of the world. Just think!—over a quarter of a million graduates. Their thousands of grateful letters to me, only a few of which are reproduced here, will convince you better than anything I could say, of the true merit of my system.

My method removes all the discouraging drawbacks and entangling hindrances of the old way of learning music.

There are no dull and uninteresting exercises, no agonizing scales, no tortuous finger gymnastics, no reprimands from a cross or impatient teacher. Nor is there any need of

The Verdict

Since I've been taking your lessons I've made over $200 with my violin. Your lessons surely are fine.—Melvin Freeland Macopin, N.J.

My friends all think it wonderful how I learned to play in such a short time. I regret that I didn't hear of your school long ago.—Mrs. W. Carter, 22 Cass Ave., St. Louis.

I want to tell you how delighted I am to have found a way to learn music. I shall sing the praises of your school to everyone I meet.—Susan J. Almy, 500 W. 144th St., New York.

I am more than satisfied with the lessons. They are much better than a private teacher. I certainly admire the way you take pains to explain everything in them. I wouldn't go back to my private teacher if I were paid to.—Julian L. Piccat, Stepney, Conn.

thousands of men and women 50 to 60 years old—including many who have never before taken a lesson—have found this method equally easy.

And my lessons are just as thorough as they are easy—no "trick" music, no "numbers," no make-shifts of any kind. I teach you the only right way—teach you to play or sing by note.

Think of the pleasure and

A Variety of Recipes

Fried Eggs.—Each egg must be cooked separately. Take a small, deep frying pan and put into it two tablespoonfuls of butter, lard, or salad oil. When quite hot, break an egg in a teacup and slip it into the hot fat, tilt the pan slightly so that the fat surrounds the egg, and with a spoon fold the white over the yolk. About two minutes will be sufficient to cook it. When ready, lift it out carefully with a fish slice, allowing the fat to drain from it, and place it on a hot dish. Proceed with more eggs in the same way until a sufficient number is cooked, adding more fat to the pan as required.

Eggs in Aspic.—Rinse out a mould with cold water, then pour in a little aspic jelly and allow it to set. Now decorate the top of the mould with pieces of cooked beets, chopped parsley, pieces of cooked tongue or tomato, or any other decoration according to fancy. Set this decoration with a little more aspic jelly, then place round three hard cooked eggs cut in quarters. Small pieces of lettuce or tomato, or cucumber may be put between the pieces of egg if desired. Fill up the mould with aspic jelly, and place in the refrigerator over night. When required, unmould onto lettuce leaves and serve with salad dressing. Tomato jelly may be used instead of the aspic jelly.

Scrambled Eggs with Kidneys.—First prepare the kidneys, skin three sheep's kidneys and cut them into dice, removing the core in the centre. Season well with made mustard, salt and pepper, and fry them in two tablespoonfuls of hot butter, add two tablespoonfuls of hot stock, and allow them to simmer for a few minutes. Scramble three eggs, add to them two tablespoonfuls of tomato catsup and arrange them neatly on rounds of hot buttered toast on a hot dish, make a hollow in the centre of the eggs and put in the kidneys. Serve very hot.

To scramble the eggs, melt two tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan, add four beaten eggs, season to taste with salt and pepper, add four tablespoonfuls of milk or stock and stir over the fire until the eggs begin to set, and the mixture is of a creamy consistency. An extra piece of butter stirred in at this stage will be found a great improvement. Pour over hot buttered toast. The addition of the tomato catsup is also an improvement.

Popovers.—Sift into a bowl one cupful of flour with a saltspoonful of salt, add one cupful of milk and one beaten egg and beat for ten minutes. Divide into hot greased gem pans and bake in a very hot oven for thirty minutes without opening the oven door. Serve hot with butter or maple syrup.

Corn Meal Waffles. Cook one-half cupful of corn meal in two cupfuls of boiling water for thirty minutes, then add one and one-half cupfuls of milk and remove from the fire. Sift in two cupfuls of flour, three tablespoonfuls of sugar, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder and one teaspoonful of salt, then add two well-beaten eggs and two tablespoonfuls of melted butter. Cook on a hot well greased waffle iron and serve hot with maple syrup or grated maple sugar.

Golden Gems. Cream one cupful of butter with three-fourths cupful of sugar, add beaten yolks of four eggs and beat for four minutes, then add one-half cupful of milk, two cupfuls of flour sifted with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and one-fourth teaspoonful of salt, mix well, then add the stiffly beaten whites of eggs. Mix gently and divide into greased and floured gem pans and bake in a moderate oven for twenty-five minutes. Serve hot with syrup, jam or marmalade.

Steamed Bread Pudding. Break one-half pound of stale brown bread into small pieces and put them into a bowl, pour over them one and one-half cupfuls of boiling milk, cover the bowl with a plate, and allow to stand until the bread is soft. Turn into a strainer or colander, and press it well, so that it is as dry as possible. Next beat it well with a fork, taking out any hard pieces, then add one-fourth cupful of grated maple sugar, the grated rind and strained juice of one lemon, and one-half cupful of seedless raisins. Mix well and add two beaten eggs, pour into a greased mould, cover with a buttered paper, and steam steadily for two hours. Turn the pudding on to a hot dish and serve with it hot milk, or a sweet melted butter sauce.

Monday Cup Cakes. Cream one-third cupful of butter with three-fourths cupful of sugar, add a pinch of salt and the yolks of two eggs and beat again. Then add one-half cupful of milk, one and one-half cupfuls of flour sifted with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of orange extract and beat until light. Fold in the stiffly beaten whites of eggs and divide into greased and floured gem pans and bake in a moderately hot oven. When cold, remove the centres, brush over the outsides with hot jam, roll in chopped almonds, fill in the centres with whipped and sweetened cream, flavored with one-fourth teaspoonful of lemon extract, and put handles on with strips of angelica, or strips of candied citron, lemon or orange peel. These cakes are good when filled with ice cream instead of the whipped cream.

Fruit Delights. Take equal weights of cherries, dates, figs and raisins and put through a food chopper, alternating the fruit so as to mix as you grind. Mold and roll thin, using powdered sugar to prevent sticking to the board. Cut out with a small cutter and dust with powdered sugar. Keep for two days before eating.

Sea Foam Candy. Put three cupfuls of grated maple sugar, one cupful of water and one tablespoonful of vinegar into a saucepan. Heat gradually, to boiling point, stirring only until the sugar is dissolved, then boil without stirring until it forms a hard ball when tested in cold water, or 250 degrees F. on candy thermometer. Remove from the fire at once, and when the syrup stops bubbling, pour gradually into the stiffly beaten whites of two eggs, beating constantly. Continue the beating until the mixture holds its shape, then add one-half teaspoonful each of vanilla and lemon extracts and one cupful of chopped nut meats. Drop in small pieces on waxed paper.

Pear Candy. Put into a saucepan two cupfuls of brown sugar, one cupful of corn syrup, one-half cupful of milk, and one tablespoonful of butter, and boil for five minutes. Then add one cupful of chopped preserved pears, one-half cupful of chopped candied ginger, and one-fourth cupful of chopped candied lemon peel. Boil to 250 degrees F. on candy thermometer, or until it forms a hard ball when tested in cold water, add one teaspoonful of orange extract and pour into greased pans. Cut into squares or diamonds. If peaches are used, in place of the pears, substitute one cupful of blanched and chopped almonds for the ginger, and if a perfect almond flavor is preferred omit the lemon peel and the orange extract and use two teaspoonfuls of almond extract.

Caramels. Put two pounds of lump sugar and one cupful of water into a saucepan, stir until the sugar is dissolved, then add three tablespoonfuls of glucose or a pinch of cream of tartar, boil up, stir often and when it will harden in cold water, or to 245 degrees F. on the candy thermometer, add one cupful of good cream and two tablespoonfuls of butter, boil again, stirring all the time to 245 degrees F. on candy thermometer, remove from the fire, add one teaspoonful each of vanilla and lemon extracts and pour into a greased tin. When nearly cold cut with a greased knife into neat squares, and wrap each in waxed paper.

COMBING RABBITS FOR PROFIT

By P. W. Luce

KEEPING rabbits has long been looked upon as the hobby of children, but there is at least one woman in British Columbia who has got long past the hobby stage, for she has been operating on a commercial basis for over five years near Prospect Lake, on Vancouver Island. This lady, Mrs. McVickers, owns one-hundred and thirty-nine different breeds of rabbits.

The sale of rabbits for food is only incidental at this huge rabbitery. The making of yarn from the fine long fur of the beautiful Angoras, and the weaving of rabbit fur rugs with a loom, are the two things which make the venture decidedly profitable. Rugs of woven rabbit fur are very soft and pliable, and there is no difficulty, or great technical skill required in the manufacture. Mrs. McVickers does much of the preliminary work on a spinning wheel over one-hundred-and fifty years old, which was built specially for her great great grandmother.

The fur is plucked from the Angoras twice a year, sometimes three times, according to the age of the animal, the plucking being a painless operation which the bunnies seem to rather enjoy. Naturally, particular care must be taken of the rabbits at all times, and their hutches kept scrupulously clean. Each Angora is thoroughly combed once a week, to keep the fur from becoming matted.

Among the breeds more particularly favored by the pioneers in this industry are the Angoras, the grey, steel, and black Flemish Giants, New Zealand Reds, Himalaya, and Black Siberians. Experience tends to show that the B. C. bred rabbits are harder than the imported individuals, though the outsiders excel in quantity of fur. Muffs, stoles, and other articles of wearing apparel, made from the pelts of Black Siberians, Blue Flemish, and Siberian Reds, are finding a ready market at fancy figures.

In addition to the big rabbitery, Mrs. McVickers keeps chickens and pigeons, a Toggenburg goat, and eighteen dogs. The dogs, she explains, are just for company! She also has more than a hundred varieties of plants growing in her garden, to which the Natural History Society of British Columbia makes an annual pilgrimage, her collection of wild flowers being the most complete in the province.

Strangely enough, there is a certain prejudice in British Columbia against eating the flesh of the rabbit, delicious though it is. In Northern British Columbia, where wild rabbits swarm literally by millions, there are hundreds of settlers who positively refuse to avail themselves of this free food supply. I have known families on the verge of starvation with scores of fat rabbits within sight of their door.

Among trappers and frontiersmen the impression prevails that there is no sustenance in the flesh of the rabbit, and that a man would most certainly starve to death if he could get nothing else to eat. Doctors and scientists admit that the food value of rabbit flesh is small, compared to beef, but no one with whom I have discussed the question is prepared to endorse the view of the trappers. Personally, for quite a considerable time I lived largely on wild rabbits, and did not feel any the worse for the diet. But I did this from necessity, not from choice, for there is no other flesh food which gets so monotonous as rabbit—except possibly chicken.

As many people are aware, most of the older streets in Montreal are named after saints, male and female. A progressive Yankee has a typical American drug store at the corner of two of these streets, and last summer he put the following sign in his window:

"Meet your girl here for an ice-cream soda. This is where St. Thomas meets St. Genevieve."

For the Journal's Juniors SMILES OF APRIL

By BERTHA E. GREEN

JOEL Simpson, down at the feed store, used to say that the strangest thing about Peter West was that few people remembered when he had come to live in Nestleton. This was the more strange, in that our little town was one where anyone's business was everyone's business. Peter West had just "slipped in" and become one of us.

It was the best part of a mile from the Main street to the depot, too long a walk if the day happened to be other than fine. Two streets ran to the railway down a long gentle slope, but the western one was mostly used. This was Albert Street, and after one passed Kennedy's saw-mill, about half-way, the houses were scattered and where the "commons" had been fenced in, these fields were used for little else than pasture-lands.

That was so long ago that no one thought very much about it. It was not that Peter's appearance did not attract attention—that was far from ordinary. Peter was short, and broad shouldered, and his clothes were always several sizes too large for him, which, with his round, bearded face, made him seem shorter and broader than he really was.

One saw a face that was almost chubby, with a touch of apple-red on the cheeks showing through the graying beard. The eyes were a light blue, not keen, or sharp, but kindly eyes that looked into your own and made you like Peter West from that moment.

Peter was a wood-worker, and made for sale such simple things as rolling-pins, ironing-boards, and potato-mashers. It was in the days of few creameries, and Unpaved cross-streets ran a little way west from Albert street, and lost themselves in the grass of the "commons." It was near the end of one of these unfinished streets that Peter West lived. One might walk up to his home along a two-board sidewalk that ended just in front of his door.

The house was a square cottage, with a single room extension behind, that Peter used for a workshop. Not many people knew much about Peter West's house, but everyone knew the shop, especially the children.

No one knew just why he had come to live in our town, or why he had built the little house that seemed so much by in many a farm dairy now one could find the carved butter-print that Peter had made.

The workshop was a joy to many of the children. Real mischief was forbidden there, but not fun, and the room, with its small lathe, heavy work-bench, and curly shavings on the floor, was altogether delightful as an indoor playground.

Peter's skill in the making of kite-frames was always at the service of his young friends, and no one ever thought of asking anyone else to repair a broken wooden toy.

He lived alone in his little house, keeping both house and garden so neatly that

If you are careful enough to brush teeth, learn how to clean them better.

Teeth That Shine

Note how many you see today

Have you noted how many pretty teeth you meet with nowadays?

A few years ago nearly everyone's teeth were coated with dingy film. Now millions of people combat that film.

We urge you to learn how they do it, and try the method yourself for ten days.

Film destroys beauty

A viscous film forms on your teeth. You can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

That film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. It often forms the basis of thin, discolored coats. Tartar is based on film.

The old ways of brushing left much of that film intact. Even well-brushed teeth were usually discolored more or less. And many teeth were unsightly.

Film is also the cause of most tooth troubles. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Millions of germs breed in it. And they, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Now we combat it

The tooth brush has not ended film. Tooth troubles have been constantly increasing. So dental science has for years sought ways to fight that film.

Two ways have now been found. Able authorities have proved their efficiency. Leading dentists nearly all the world over are urging their daily use.

A new-day tooth paste has been created to comply with all modern requirements. The name is Pepsodent. These two effective film combatants are now embodied in it.

Two other benefits

Pepsodent brings, with every use, two other great effects. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits on teeth which may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is to neutralize mouth acids, the cause of tooth decay.

These are Nature's great tooth-protecting agents. Every use of Pepsodent gives them many-fold effect. Thus it creates all-important benefits which old ways never brought. To millions of homes it has introduced a new era in teeth cleaning.

Quick, visible effects

The Pepsodent effects are quick and conspicuous. No user can doubt its benefits. What you see and feel will very soon convince you.

Film is combated. Starch deposits are attacked. The teeth are highly polished. The mouth is left in alkaline condition.

Learn these results, then let your family enjoy them. Children need them too. This is the way to safer teeth.

Let this test show you what clean teeth mean, and you will always want them.

Give Your Wife This Chance To Be Happy

By G. G. PERCIVAL, M. D.

THERE are more than a million women in Canada and the United States who have suffered untold agonies for years, who have found joyous and colourful cheeks through INTERNAL BATHING.

This wonderful gift to humanity was discovered by a physician who laboured for years to get at the root of ninety-five per cent. of the ailments from which women complain, while other great physicians and scientists worked to cure cancer, consumption and other dreaded diseases, this physician went to the bottom of things to annihilate the cause of most of these diseases.

Now enlightened physicians all over America, as well as osteopaths, physical culturists and others who labour to build up the health of mankind, are heartily preaching the gospel of INTERNAL BATHING.

And what is more, hundreds of thousands of letters have poured in from women in all walks of life, from the highest in the land to the most humble, each anxious that her story should be told to some other suffering woman. Their gratefulness is unbounded.

Men know so little about women that the time has come when frankness should be the motto of all physicians. Men would then understand why their wives complain, why their eyes lack lustre and their cheeks grow fallow, and they live through each day fulfilling their duties, where a man, burdened by like suffering, would remain in bed.

Ninety-five per cent. of illnesses common to women are caused directly or indirectly by accumulated waste in the colon (the lower intestine); this is bound to accumulate, because we of to-day neither eat the kind of food nor take the amount of exercise which nature demands in order that she may thoroughly eliminate the waste unaided.

That is the reason when you are ill, physicians always give you something to remove this accumulation of waste before commencing to treat your specific trouble. And it is ten to one that no trouble would have developed if there were no accumulation of waste in the colon.

Professor Metchnikoff, one of the world's greatest scientists, boldly and specifically stated that if our colons were taken away in infancy, our lives would be increased probably to 150 years.

You see, this waste is extremely poisonous, and as the blood flows through the walls of the colon, it absorbs the poison and carries them through the circulation—that is what causes Auto-Intoxication, with all its perniciously enervating and weakening results.

But you can never be auto-intoxicated if you periodically use the proper kind of an INTERNAL BATH—that is certain.

It is nature's own relief and corrector—just warm water which, used in the right way, cleanses the colon thoroughly its entire length and makes and keeps it sweet, clean and pure as nature demands it shall be for the entire system to work properly.

It is probably true that more drugs, most of which are harmful and insufficiently effective, are used for this than for all other human ailments combined. This goes to show how universal the troubles caused by accumulative waste really is—but there is no doubt that drugs are being dropped as INTERNAL BATHING becomes better known.

It is not possible for your wife to conceive what a wonderful bracer an INTERNAL BATH really is; taken at night before retiring, she will awaken in the morning with a feeling of lightness and buoyancy that cannot be accounted for—her system will be perfectly cleansed, everything will be working in perfect accord, the brain clear, eyes bright and the old vim and confidence back again for the day's duties.

Think of what this means to a woman, to be able to laugh, eat and sleep well, to be your cheerful companion, able once again to live the life nature meant woman to live.

There is nothing new about INTERNAL BATHS except the way of administering them. Some years ago Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell, of New York, was so miraculously benefited by faithfully using the method then in vogue that he made INTERNAL BATHS his special study, and improved materially in administering the Bath and in getting the result desired.

This perfected Bath he called the "J. B. L. Cascade" and it is the one which has so quickly popularized and recommended itself that hundreds of thousands are to-day using it.

Dr. Tyrrell, in his practice and researches, discovered many unique and interesting facts in connection with this subject; these he has collected in a little book, "The What, the Why, the Way of Internal Bathing," which will be sent free on request, if you address Chas. A. Tyrrell, M.D., Room 238, Tyrrell Bldg., 163 College St., Toronto, and mention having read this in CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

This book tells us facts that we never knew about ourselves before and there is no doubt that everyone who has an interest in his or her own physical well being or that of the family will be very greatly instructed and enlightened by reading this carefully prepared and scientifically correct little book.

Smiles of April

he earned the praise of even such good housekeepers as the womenfolk of Nestleton. He had many acquaintances, but few friends, and, with those who knew him best, was a better listener than a talker. Joel Simpson used to say that he liked to talk with Peter, for he never had any trouble getting a word in edgewise.

Peter's business came to him at his workshop, for he was very lame, and could not undertake long walks. He was ever cheery to the children, to whom he told stories, and to whom he seemed the happiest, jolliest man they knew.

"Then we sailed away to Calicut on the good ship 'Susan Jane'." Whenever you heard Peter singing of the 'Susan Jane', you knew that he was in the best of spirits, and that, more than likely, he was making, or mending toys. But there were times when there was sadness hidden behind a smile, and on dull days, rainy or stormy, Peter would think of himself as a man growing old and very lonely. Books were his friends, but, sometimes, even these failed to keep the lonely hours from crowding him.

This was before the last Springtime that Peter West lived in the little house in Nestleton. It is easy to remember the winter previous, for, just before New Years, they hung a new, colored globe in the window of McKay's drug-store, and, about the same time, Lucy Brook came all the way from Chicago on a visit. Lucy was to stay at the Cunningham's until about the end of March, and as three months seems a long time to little folks, Lucy decided to "settle down and make herself at home." She was a splendid playmate, and knew ever-so-many games that were new to our town.

The Cunninghams, with whom Lucy was staying, lived on Albert street, between the mill and the Presbyterian Church. This was not so very far from Peter West's house, so Lucy soon became acquainted with Peter himself.

The affairs of Peter were far from important to Nestleton and the world in general, but to Peter himself they were most important, indeed. This particular winter they were most unsatisfactory for rheumatism had added to his lameness, and he rarely was able to leave his house and his workshop.

One morning in March, Lucy and that young mischief, Archie Cunningham, had borrowed all the peeling-knives in the Cunningham kitchen, without so much as asking, of course, and were down at the mill-yard stripping the slippery bark from the freshly-cut elm logs. This was a regular Spring occupation of Nestleton's very young people, coming just before marbles, and the yearly sulphur and molasses.

"Come on, Archie," said Lucy, to whom the gathering of the slippery-elm harvest had lost its novelty. "We have got heaps and heaps."

But Archie, who had a handkerchief wrapped around a cut thumb, would not dismount from the log which he was stripping of its bark. He had already broken two peeling-knives, and hoped he would not be questioned about their disappearance.

"All right for you, Archie," said Lucy tossing her head. "Then you can take my slippery-elm home with your own. I'm going down to visit Peter."

Lucy walked down Albert street, and over to Peter West's little house. As usual, she entered the workshop without knocking, and for the first time saw Peter without a smile on his face.

"Perhaps he's got a mortgage, and it's worrying him," thought Lucy, "something is wrong, I just know there is."

Peter West was sitting in a spindly arm-chair which he kept in his workshop, and he tried immediately to hide his worry. It was useless, however, for Lucy had caught him moping, and at once began to ask questions.

"Is it a big one?" she asked. "Does it cost you an awful lot of money? It's

USES OF THE SUGGESTION BOX.

The Suggestion Box should always have a place in Institute Meetings. The reasons are obvious but none the less, often overlooked. It is a shelter for the shy, for the member who is tersely described as being backward in coming forward, for those who have really something important to bring forward but are afraid of hurting a neighbor's feelings or bringing some unpleasantness upon themselves if they talk out openly. It ensures every member having a say in the organization and forward movement of the Institute. It makes a pleasant interlude in an educational meeting. It is the means of ventilating a grievance or bringing to attention a community need. These are a few of its uses and others will occur to any member.

How to make the Suggestion Box really useful and interesting is a matter that can be worked out by those in charge. It should be in charge of one or more members either in turn or throughout the year. A pretty box with distinctive lettering preferably made and decorated by a member should be placed in a conspicuous place and members' attention called to it as they enter, or at the social hour, or any other convenient time. Sometimes it is carried around the room like a collection plate and everyone given an opportunity to put in a suggestion. Those in charge should show pleasure and thank members for helping them make the Box a success by putting in Suggestions.

The anonymous character of the Box should be strictly preserved. No suggestions should ever be signed and no one should be guilty of speculating who sent in any particular suggestion or complaint.

Arrangements for dealing with the Box should be made by the Committee. It should be specified when it should be opened and by whom and when the suggestions should be taken up and by whom. Usually the President opens the Box at meetings and deals with the suggestions there and then.

MONEY MAKING AND THE INSTITUTES.

Owing no doubt to war needs and also to the undoubted fact that the Institute gathers in all the really live women in the community, appeals to the Institutes to raise money for this and for that seem unending, and often irresistible. We have now got into the habit and the most thoughtful women in the movement all over Canada consider that the sooner we break ourselves off the habit the better. The British Institutes have understood from the beginning that money-raising, for outside objects, and collections amongst the members for any reason, is not to be encouraged and it is only among the perhaps less carefully formed Institutes that such is practised. But we have certainly become an easy mark. Many individual members have seen the way we are drifting and losing sight of our original objects and ideals and have tried to stem the tide. But it is hard for individuals to refuse to take part in the money-raising especially when the charity is a good one.

Such members will find the reasons put forth against money raising, at the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada last June most useful in giving moral support to their attitude.

It will be remembered that a Resolution on this subject was passed at that time and directed to be sent to the Provinces. The fact that such a resolution was unanimously passed and that strong speeches in its favor were made by representatives from every Province present is sufficient indication of how

Use ONTARIO'S "WHITE" COAL WITH A MOFFAT

WHEN the available coal supply has disappeared, electricity will still be giving light at night, warmth in the wintertime and heat to do the cooking.

Ontario's supply of electricity is never ending—thanks to Hydro and other Developments.

Cooking with Ontario's electricity is now cheaper than coal, gas, oil or wood.

Use this vast supply of cheap power and a Moffat Electric Range for all your cooking and get to know cooking satisfaction you never dreamed of.

Moffat Ranges have a larger sale than any other make. They have been tested and tried for over nine years, so that the Moffat Electric Range is truly a perfect range. They possess many exclusive improvements. There are over 24,000 Moffat Electric Ranges in daily use in Canada and throughout the world.

great a menace this continuous money raising has become and how widespread is the alarm and dissatisfaction. The Resolution read in effect "That as self preservation is the first law of any organized body, it is recommended that the expenditure of funds raised by Institutes be confined to Institute Organization, Local, Provincial, Federal and to the furtherance of aims and objects as set forth in the Constitution and that Institutes guard against degenerating into money making machines." Some of the arguments advanced in support of the resolution were:—Institutes are educational, not propagandist or charitable. Their aims and objects while general, are definitely for the development of rural life. They receive government support because they are educational and if aims are not being carried out this may be withdrawn.

Often a few members exploit the Institute against the real wish of the rest of the members for charitable or other purposes.

Money raising in itself is not an elevating outlet for the energies of members. If it seems necessary to raise funds for local or national purposes these could be expended through our own standing committees.

To raise money and hand it over to another organization to spend without having a say in its administration or safeguarding against extravagance is to betray a public trust.

It is hard, often impossible, to raise money for Institute purposes when we have appealed to the public and our members for other reasons. It is the barest honesty and the merest justice to support our own Institutes and our own Provincial and National Federations first.

It is poor business to give away money when we have not got the wherewithal to make our Federations and Institutes, efficient, live, comprehensive, organizations.

Some of the representatives pointed out that in order to justify our existence we had to spend money on making the movement strong. Some Institutes had not even a meeting place or furnishings or club room or rest room or library or funds to start co-operative enterprises or industries, or to pay for instructors, or to get out programmes or posters or support the Official Organ, or pay a Secretary or other helpers or to send delegates or otherwise keep in touch with the whole movement and yet they gave away hundreds of dollars every year to other societies to spend.

It would indeed seem that it is time to call a halt and that if the National Federation had not done anything else it had well justified its being by bringing this discontent out into the open and dealing vigorously with it.

A word of warning was uttered by Mrs. Todd, our beloved President, when she added to the discussion these words: "I quite agree that this abuse should be pointed out to the Institutes but I am afraid that many Institutes, especially remote ones, which are really kept together by some hospital or other local project needing aid may drop that and be lost. Some definite interest is always needed, especially at first."

Mrs. Todd is right as usual and we must be reasonable and not too sudden in the changes we make. We all agree that our work is first and last and all the time to make better homes, better farms, better people, better communities but do not let us forget, better Institutes.

FURTHERING OUR AGRICULTURAL AIMS.

Among the legitimate enterprises for Institute workers are those for stimulating all the suitable agricultural and horticultural lines of work for women and girls. We ought never to forget those devoted land girls in England who most certainly were factors in winning the war and who stayed at their most tiring and often unpleasant job of field and farm work as men do it, until the peace was signed. While we, in Canadian Institutes, do not think it economic or right for women to do heavy farm work in the fields as they do abroad, we do encourage girls and rural women generally to take up the less tiring small stock, and garden, and dairy work. Institutes can do a great deal to help the farm industry by having on their programmes items relating to farm and garden interests. Sometimes they can do more and this account of what was done by some young Frenchwomen will be of interest.

They wished to be trained themselves and help train other girls in rural pursuits and, at the same time, make some money by keeping a small nursery garden and this is how they did it. They secured possession of an old worn-out garden which nobody wanted (and I fear there are many such) which had a lawn in front, a kitchen garden behind and beyond an old orchard. There was a funny old house which was more like a toy than a home for a long time.

The old garden after being ploughed was prepared at once for a vegetable garden. The lawn was cut, rolled, and restored and wide lower borders introduced. The orchard trees were cleaned and pruned. All this was done by experts so that object lessons were given to the young gardeners. As soon as they could get the money from their reluctant parents some small greenhouses were built and the girls taught how to grow seedlings. The girls worked hard and justified their parents' kindness. They had seedlings for sale and vegetables and fruit and although the first fruits of their labors went to help agricultural work in the devastated areas of France they are now on their feet financially and are going to continue the experiment. The girls enjoy it all thoroughly and they have the satisfaction of knowing that they are producers in a world which needs producers more than any other class in the community.

In Hurst, Berkshire, England, an old house with a large garden was lent to the local Institute for a similar purpose. In Witton-le-Wear, Durham, the Institute also ran some allotments on the same plan during the war. Many such schemes have been tried and I have yet to learn of one which was a total failure. Some may not keep on but always there is some good accomplished. The girls or women get some training. Or more food is produced or more land is brought under cultivation or those undertaking the job learn something of co-operation and business methods or the Institute is kept together by this means; that is they have this definite piece of work in hand and a definite responsibility.

OUR NOTICE BOARD.

An interesting experiment was recently tried by the West Saanich Women's Institute of British Columbia. The regular monthly meeting is being held at the Provincial Library in the Parliament Buildings at Victoria, a distance, it is true, of only nine miles, but the members will travel a much longer way if one measures the change in environment and influence.

The largest organization of women in England—not merely the largest of country women, but of any women is that of the Women's Institutes, now just upon 200,000 strong, of England and Wales. Imagine if all these women were gathered together! They would make a city's population, Vancouver for example!

At the Alberta W. I. Convention of last year nearly all the old favorites were on the Song Sheet including LOCH LOMOND, WHEN JOHNNY COMES MARCHING HOME, ANNIE LAURIE, BIDE A WEE, AULD LANG SYNE, LOW BACKED CAR, HOME SWEET HOME, THOSE EVENING BELLS, BONNIE DUNDEE, MINSTREL BOY, KILLARNEY, OLD OAKEN BUCKET, THE OLD SONGS, THE FIRST NOWELL and many patriotic songs and hymns. The conductor of the singing was Mrs. Rose Morgan, author of "Songs that Live" and she approved of the Song Sheet and explained why most of the songs were good.

THE QUESTION DRAWER

Question—What is being done through Women's Institutes for the Soldiers Wives from Overseas?

Answer—Short Courses in Home Economics are being given by many of the provincial Governments, Universities, and Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, through the Women's Institutes. The Institutes are extending a welcoming hand and asking these new Canadians to their meetings. The Province of Nova Scotia through its Superintendent of Women's Institutes, Miss Macdougall, has given a splendid lead in the whole subject of the incoming women citizens. Mrs. Joan Muldrew, Ottawa, would, of course, give full information.

Question—Has a member a right to move to dissolve a Committee?

Answer—Yes.

Question—Can the President sit on Committees and vote?

Answer—The President is ex-officio a member of all committees but she is usually considered to be there in an advisory capacity and does not vote. The Constitution should state if ex-officio members have a right to vote or not.

Question—Is the Chairman the same as the Convener of a Committee?

Answer—No. The Convener is the first named member and the chairman is elected at the first meeting of a committee.

Question—If the Chairman has named a Committee, can it be objected to?

Answer—If there has been a motion passed that the Chairman will name a Committee naturally the members will accept the names the Chairman proposes.

Question—Who is the best authority on Constitutional Authority in Canada?

Answer—There is but one authority, Bourinot. Rules of Order are all based in Canada on Bourinot and only his authority would be accepted in a Canadian Court of Law. All handbooks and all instructions to Institutes so far as procedure at meetings and so forth, take Bourinot as the reference. But it must not be forgotten that what actually is the government of the Institute is its own Constitution. What is laid down in the Constitution and By-Laws is binding upon us. For what is not laid down we must go to Bourinot or some hand-book based upon his book. Two hand-books besides our own Institute Hand-books—that of Ontario being especially good—are recommended those by Mrs. Parsons and Mrs. McGill.

Question—Can a member go from one Institute to another without paying another subscription?

Answer—Custom varies in the Provinces. British Columbia gets the Government to make a ruling as they are affected since the government grant is based on membership. Ask Mr. Putnam what he thinks about Ontario's custom. In England they are quite strict about members passing from one W. I. to another as often the Institutes are only a few miles apart and some keen members want to belong to two or three and even serve on the Committee. The latter is discouraged. Often half of the fee is paid to each Institute but I must confess this must lead to difficulties.

Question—What is involved in laying a matter upon the table?

Answer—This is not much used in Canada. Our equivalent is "to adjourn the discussion." But neither motion is debatable. Vote is taken for or against but there can be no discussion.

Question—Where there are a number of booths or stalls or side shows at an Entertainment, who keeps the accounts straight?

Answer—Usually one person goes around at intervals, collects from all booths gives a receipt and gets out a financial statement. Many Institutes prefer a man to do this thankless task.

Question—Where can patterns for Glove-Making at home be obtained?

Answer—There is always a list of persons having patterns and directions and leaflets on the subject in the English official organ of Women's Institutes Home and Country, 26 Eccleston Street S. W. I. London England. Cuckfield (Sussex) England, Women's Institutes have a splendid Glove Industry. This Institute is a subscriber to the Canadian Home Journal and should be glad to help any Canadian handcraft. Write Miss Reid, Mill Hall, in care of the Institute.

Question—What are the official organs of Women's Institutes?

Answer—For Canada The Canadian Home Journal. For England, Home and Country, 26 Eccleston Street, S. W. I. London. For Belgium, Cercles d'Etudes Ministry of Agriculture, Brussels.

But Institute news appears regularly in provincial weekly journals and local newspapers both here and abroad.

Question—How can Institutes stimulate interest in the historical spots in their district?

Answer—Ask each member to bring an account of some object of interest or antiquity they know of personally in their neighborhood.

Question—Are there any Women's Institutes which encourage sports for girls?

Answer—Very many do. In Institute news for Manitoba lately appeared "Another community project which received active support from the Institutes is encouragement of the skating rink. Isabella and Shellmouth each have planned an up to date rink to cost Four Thousand Dollars!" Swimming is encouraged by Alberta W. I.'s and hockey by Ontario while tennis courts are maintained by the British Columbia Institutes.

Question—What Province is doing most for Boys' and Girls' Club work?

Answer—I am not prepared to make full comparison but I know that the system in vogue in Manitoba has had wonderful results, and that practically every Institute is assisting. To mention a few, Decker, Deloraine, Rosser and Elva are each doing special project work.

The Health Drink for you who think

Personal efficiency resolves itself into keeping one's body and brain as near as possible to the 100% standard, but in these strenuous days fresh air and exercise are very often out of the question. For this reason, the early morning glass of water sparkling with a dash of Eno is absolutely essential to safeguard the health of every worker, in every sphere of activity.

ENO'S FRUIT SALT

If everyone knew the merits of ENO—this Health Drink would be found in every home, office, and factory throughout Canada—for there is nothing to equal ENO as a regulator of health. Ask your druggist for a bottle and test ENO to your own satisfaction.

Making Music Safe for Democracy

Pros and Cons of the Present Movement for the Spread of Communal Music

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

THE present winter has been fruitful in schemes to further extend the influence of music as a force in Canadian communities; and I suppose that something definite is bound to result from the various movements that are under way. I am not sure that all of them mean quite so much as their sponsors claim; and in Eastern Canada I would like to see a little more genuine public action; and less tendency to leave the burden of carrying on propaganda to the musicians themselves—more of the spirit which animates the Western provinces in their governmental encouragement of music.

In my own city of Toronto for instance there are at present in progress two simultaneous movements to provide music "free." One is conducted by the Canadian Bureau for the Advancement of Music and is especially intended to interest school children. Its plans seem to be good and in some measure original. It has just made a beginning with free organ recitals and involves a series of memory tests for young people, of which more presently. Its plans seem to be excellent; but they do not seem to go as far in a public sense as the system prevailing in many important English cities. For instance, Dr. H. A. Fricker, who gave the first organ recital in behalf of the bureau on an instrument which has been installed in the Central Technical School, was, prior to his coming to Canada five years ago, Municipal Organist of Leeds. That is to say he was a salaried official of the Civic corporation giving eighty annual recitals in the City Hall. Free recitals for school children under an educational plan are an excellent beginning but it would not be well to promote the idea that musicians should give their services to this cause gratis. A healthy and genuine musical spirit will be in evidence when we reach the stage where such recitals are paid for out of the public revenues. The man who must live by music should not be expected to give his services free, any more than is the man in any other profession. If music is worth anything at all it is worth paying for, either as a public or private expenditure.

A striking example of what I mean is a series of free concerts that is being provided in many parts of the city of Toronto by a very able and enterprising daily newspaper. This publication has won kudos on the ground that it is stimulating musical enthusiasm; but I am not sure that the thought that it was an inexpensive form of advertising which might help circulation, was foreign to its mind. In this case the real honors should go to the many artists who willingly or unwillingly give their services gratis rather than to the publication which sponsors them. But in the announcements, the newspaper, rather than the performer, is accorded the principal place in the limelight. It is not at all certain that these performers who have come forward are wise in consenting to give away their wares on a wholesale scale. I am under the impression that the public values most what it pays for, in one way or another; and I am just wondering whether they are not injuring their chances of obtaining paid local engagements, in future.

It is worth while drawing attention to these considerations, since without a doubt, this idea will be taken up by newspapers in other parts of Canada. It seems to me that publishers should remunerate musicians, who assist at free concerts organized under their auspices, in proportion to the advertisement they expect from these events.

Newspaper publishers as a class are diametrically opposed to giving away what they have to sell; and music should be on the same basis.

In truth the public has got into the habit of asking too much of its musicians. This was especially true during the war. There was no class of the community which suffered more in the loss of revenues, in their capacity as teachers, during the early years of the conflict; and I know instances where artists who hardly knew where next week's bread was coming from were asked to give their services free for "war objects," and who did so without making their plight known. These thoughts have come to me on reading an article in which the phrase "making music safe for democracy" was used to typify the present movement for the diffusion of music. To make it safe for democracy we must offer security to those talented individuals who adopt music as a profession.

OF the recent growth of music as a democratic institution some very interesting things were said by the most eminent of American musical propagandists, Mr. Walter Damrosch, on his return from abroad. Mr. Damrosch pointed out the enormously increased opportunities for the hearing of good music which had developed on this continent, since the period of his boyhood in the early seventies; but he pointed out that music in America had not developed on the creative side,—that is in the composition of fine, original music in the same proportion or as it had in Europe. In the course of the discussion, some of the possible root causes of this peculiar situation were taken into consideration.

It is a fact that in North America,—Canada and the United States in an equal sense,—there is a much wider knowledge of the nobler works of music than in the case of literature and the fine arts. A great many people can talk intelligently about the works of Beethoven and other great composers, who would be out of their depth if they started to discuss poetry or painting or sculpture. One suggested reason for this is that Puritanism is very deeply rooted in North America and that music of all the arts is the least antipathetic to Puritanism. It is true that at one time it did oppose even music, but such antipathies have long since been abandoned; but Puritanism still undoubtedly does look askance at painters and literary men.

Mr. Damrosch admits that this may possibly account for the rapid growth of musical taste in comparison with other enthusiasms, but he thinks that it also helps to explain the lack of creative music. "The Puritan spirit," he says "may be more receptive to music than to other forms of artistic expression. Yet it still handicaps the people of this continent to some degree, in their music, as in their literature, because it is opposed to the display of deep feeling. If we wish to make great music we must not be afraid of our emotions. We must not be afraid to let ourselves go. We must cultivate emotional feeling and its expression."

One of the changes which Mr. Damrosch has noticed in fifty years of constant observation is the manner in which men have come to follow the lead of women in this matter. There was a time when the business man said, "Yes, music is a good thing,—for my wives and daughters;" but he seems judging from the personnel of audiences, to have reached a point where he regards it as a fine thing for himself. He holds that this growing masculine appreciation is a good sign, because no art can really develop if only one sex takes an interest in it.

When asked how he would "make music safe for democracy" Mr. Damrosch said that if that was to be accomplished the people of this continent must not merely come to like music, but to make music. He would like to see in every little town through the country the community band and the community choral society. The social as well as the artistic stimulus of the local choral society are obvious to most individuals; and Mr. Damrosch who was the personal representative of General Pershing in organizing band music for the American army during the late war learned that almost every man with a little teaching and encouragement, enjoys playing a wind instrument in the company of others, even though he is not competent to become a soloist.

Mr. Damrosch believes in catching the music lover young, and thinks that in this matter there is a great field for the pedagogue and the parent. The children's concerts he gives in New York interest him more than any other part of his work and he has many children attending them who know more about music now than their parents ever did or ever will.

....

This latter phase brings one back to the efforts that are being made to interest children through "music memory contests" which have been initiated by the Canadian Bureau for the Advancement of Music and which are to have a real trial late in April. The idea really comes from Cleveland, Ohio, where it was introduced by Nikolai Sokoloff, the Russian musician who conducts the symphony orchestra of that city. The memory contest is really the development of a game which used to be played at children's parties when titles of pieces from which short excerpts had been played were guessed by the youngsters. Adopting this system on a broader scale, gramophone records in the class rooms, and organ recitals like those mentioned at the outset of this article, are utilized to familiarize pupils with certain selected compositions of the higher order. At the same time, the name of the composer his nationality and the dates of his

Clean Dustlessly—this Rapid, Easy Way

The coming of warmer days, which invariably means more open windows and the entry of additional dust into your home, need not be a dread—if you provide yourself with a Hoover.

Dustlessly, quickly, the strong suction provided by the new and greatly simplified Hoover air-cleaning attachments whisks up all dust that collects upon house furnishings.

These improved attachments have been developed in our research laboratories to provide Hoover owners with the most durable and highly efficient set of air-cleaning tools that long experience can devise.

With them, you can entirely remove dust from any location, without stooping, without fatigue, without befogging the air.

Then, too, they may be used to blow dirt out of other places, or to fluff up pillows.

And instead of merely cleaning the tops of your rugs by slow, dusty sweeping, you can easily and rapidly glide The Hoover over, dustlessly cleaning the rugs as thoroughly within as without, in a manner guaranteed to add years to their life and beauty.

For this efficient cleaner electrically beats out all germ-laden, nap-wearing grit from rug depths. Simultaneously, it electrically sweeps up stubbornest litter, erects crushed nap, freshens colors and powerfully cleans by air.

Have an immediate free demonstration in your home of The Hoover and its wonderful new air-cleaning attachments. Backed by the Guarantee Bond of the oldest and largest makers of electric cleaners, The Hoover is obtainable in four sizes, all moderately priced, on easy terms.

How to Make the PORCH LIVABLE

The question that is asked every spring in so many households is being exhaustively dealt with in an illustrated article entitled

Outdoor Living Rooms

by Collier Stevenson in the MAY issue of the Canadian Home Journal

This is the third of a series of special articles on the various aspects of interior decoration in the home.

Making Music Safe for Democracy

life are given out and notes of the same taken by the pupils. Other data to fix the music in the child's mind,—the story it suggests for instance, is given; and elementary instruction in the structure of the composition is provided. The preparation in Toronto is to cover six weeks during which thirty-six compositions are being used, six being taken up weekly instead of the usual daily singing lessons. Thus the children come into active contact with good music, the total number in the classes that have been selected for this year's tests is approximately 26,000 "Kiddies."

At the conclusion of the preparatory lessons a preliminary contest will be held, using the gramophone, and from this contest the three hundred pupils from the Toronto public schools who gain the most marks, for naming the pieces, composers and nationalities, will be chosen and permitted to compete at a concert to be given at Massey Hall, Toronto, on April 25th by the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, when the programme will be chosen from the thirty six pieces used in preparation. The work is now actively going on under Duncan MacKenzie, formerly of Montreal and now Musical Supervisor of the Toronto schools and individual prizes and school prizes are to be provided.

It is hardly necessary to point out the wide adaptability of this place. For smaller cities it is not necessary to engage a symphony orchestra for the finals. An organ recital in some large church or a piano recital in the town hall would serve the same purpose.

THE RAIN

By Walter A. Dyer

THE Lady of the House does not like thunder-storms, high winds or rainy days, and we seem to have a good many of all three in spite of our annual drought. I don't mind those things so much myself, though I hate to see branches blown from the trees, and I am not free from the depressing effects of a long rainy spell.

But there is a kind of rainy day that I like. It comes after a dry spell, when we have had plenty of sunshine and the garden is parched with thirst. I recall one such recently.

The sun went down in a golden haze, and in the morning we awoke to hear the steady rattle of the rain on the piazza roof. Out in the backyard the garden is drinking eagerly, and already the corn has taken on new life; it seems to have grown an inch. The grass and the lilac leaves are washed a clean, glistening green; the dahlia buds nod heavily in the dripping from the ailanthus tree above them. One of my tomato vines lies prostrate, perhaps from a too copious imbibing of the life-giving fluid.

The rain comes down so steadily as to produce the effect of a fog, half blotting out the landscape and changing the aspect of familiar objects. All the sharp angles are softened a little, and the motion of the rain gives the scene a look of unreality as though it were a moving picture. All the colors are changed. There is no blue overhead, only a dull, slaty gray that casts its tone over all the landscape. Green, red, white, yellow, all are grayed as with the broad wash of an artist's brush. Only the brown of the tree trunks appears to stand out darker and more vividly. Our street seems turned into a Japanese print.

I alone of all the village seem to be alive and stirring. I am shut into a little world all my own. I experience all the joy of solitude and none of its pain. The witchery of the rain makes me as lonely as a mountain in the clouds and I surrender to the enchantment.

If you wish to read a book which has all the charm of childhood and yet the sophistication of the grown-up years, spend a few hours with "Explorers of the Dawn," by Mazo de la Roche, and you will find that you have acquired three new friends, John, the Seraph and the Angel. In fact, you may even dare to feel "chummy" towards the Bishop. Mrs. Handsombody, the governess-guardian, who looks after the three motherless boys, is as unpleasant as the half-sisters of Cinderella, but we think that life must have dealt hardly with Mrs. Handsombody. Comparisons are both odious and dangerous; but we are sure that you will put this book "alongside" those friends of many years' standing—"Dream Days" and "The Golden Age." I know that Selina and the Angel would have a wonderful holiday together, while Harold and the Seraph would spend a golden afternoon in the fields beyond the kitchen garden.

Miss de la Roche lives in Toronto, where she has spent most of her years and where she was educated. This book has the suggestion of an English Toronto, not the bustling "imitation of Buffalo-and-Detroit" city which the Capital of Ontario is said to be. There is a refreshing absence of Americanisms in this writer's work, and not once are we told that the Seraph has "gotten" a cold or that any one has "sensed" a peculiar situation. In her purity of diction and charm of style, Miss de la Roche is a refreshing contrast to many of our modern writers of fiction. There is nothing priggish, however, in either the writer or the trio of youngsters who "explore the Dawn."

The foreword of the book has been written by Christopher Morley—a tribute which shows more convincingly than any "advance notice" how high is the critical estimate of this Canadian writer's work. The New York "Times," by the way, refers to Miss de la Roche as "a new American writer." The adjective is correct only in the continental sense of the word. As every good Canadian knows, the Dominion has a greater area than any other country of North America; and, as our writers may be considered among our most valuable resources, we may well rejoice that in "Explorers of the Dawn" we have a "piece of writing" of exquisite workmanship, vivid, delicate and "understanding." These stories have appeared before, in well-known United States magazines, and some of them have been republished in Canada. That which gives its title to the book had the golden stamp of the "Atlantic Monthly." Miss de la Roche will doubtless give us later volumes of more serious themes and more elaborate plots;—but she will find it difficult to write a volume more productive of pleasure than "Explorers of the Dawn." (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto. Price, $2.50).

* * *

The name of Frances Hodgson Burnett meant the story of the English factory girl, "That Lass o' Lowrie's," to our grandmothers. Then "Little Lord Fauntleroy" swept the next generation into a frenzy of admiration, and unoffending small boys were forced into Lord Fauntleroy Suits. Mrs. Burnett is writing new novels;—and is doing excellent work, although we must admit that her latest production, "The Head of the House of Coombe," is not so attractive in style and subject as "The Secret Garden."

The neglected child is a favorite heroine with novelists;—and, truly, Robin Garth-Lawless is as desolate a small person as can be found in modern fiction. Unlike Ellen Montgomery of "The Wide, Wide World," Robin has a mother;—the most utterly selfish creature who ever uttered platitudes in a plaintive voice and rolled helpless blue eyes on protecting man. "Feather" is the nickname of this tiresome person;—but any self-respecting goose-down might well protest against such a use of the term. Robin finds her way from a neglected nursery into a world of sunlight and affection;—and the unspeakable "Feather" is finally wafted away. The story is a tale well-told, for there is not an uninteresting moment in the course of Robin's adventures. It is modern London to which we are introduced, but, even there, a little, lonely child finds her road to companionship and happiness. This is a charming story to be remembered for more than a day. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

These after-the-war years are bewildering to all of us;—and not the least difficult element in the situation—industrial and social—is the returned soldier, with his revolt against the before-the-war complacency of too many citizens. A recent novel, "The Lonely Warrior,"

A CANADIAN WRITER

This is a snapshot in Rosedale of Miss Mazo de la Roche, whose book, "Explorers of the Dawn" is a spring-time success.

by Claude C. Washburn, is a book which is of poignant interest to all who are really striving, as Carlyle said, "to know what This Day means." The hero, Stacey Carroll, is an American who resolves, on the fifth day of November, 1914, to enter the army. He belongs to the affluent but not the leisure class; and he goes to the strife with the ideals of freedom and humanity held high. He returns in June, 1919, wearing the uniform of a captain of infantry in the American army, with the red-white-and-blue ribbon of the D. S. C.

The study of the returned Stacey Carroll is illuminating, though tragic. Geniality and enthusiasm—even ordinary interest in friends or affairs—seem to be utterly burned out of his life. The writer has an analytic gift, equalled by his sympathy, and we know Stacey very thoroughly before we come to the close of his "reconstruction" period. This is a narrative which is frank to the verge of

Anne, Vanessa and Doreen Had Been School Friends Together and when they married they made a compact:

"That Every Month—
For Twenty Years—
Each One—Should Put Aside—
Ten Dollars—
To be Spent—
At the End of that Time—
On Her Dearest Desire."

Vanessa's Story

(Anne's will appear next month. Watch for it.)

Vanessa—
The Lucky Woman!—
Lived to see her children
Grow up and marry
And thrive—
Without actual need
Of cash.

* * *

But every year
She had paid the whole
Of her savings
Into A Twenty-Year
Endowment Policy.

* * *

So the day came
When Two Thousand Five Hundred Dollars (with profits)
Was paid
Right Into Her Hand!

* * *

That night
(Looking at the lined face Of her husband)
She said: "John,
Wouldn't you like
To take a Trip Abroad?
Said John: "I'd like it better
Than anything that I know;
But I haven't 'the ready' at present

For anything like that."
"O, I wish we could go," said
Vanessa,

"Now that you and I are left alone together.
You always promised me
That you would save
For such a trip."

* * *

"Several times I began to save"
Said John sadly.

"But once,
We needed the money
In the business.
Again—I had to lend it
To Brother Fred.
A third time, I had to take it
For that operation—and after that

It didn't seem Worth while."

* * *

Then Vanessa
Stepping gently behind him,
Slipped her hand
Through his arm.

* * *

"For twenty years,"
She whispered softly,
"I have been weaving
A Magic Carpet
(The travelling pattern!)
For you and me.
For twenty years
You have shared with me
All that you had;
And from what you gave me
(Ungrudgingly!)
I have fashioned
A Second Honeymoon
For us both."

* * *

"Vanessa,"
Said John
As they stood together
On the Deck
Of the Great Steamer;
"Did you ever
REALIZE
How excessively clever
I was
In my callow youth?"

* * *

"For of all the Young Men
Of my acquaintance
I was
The Only One
Who possessed
The Genius
To win You
For a wife!"

* * *

But Vanessa

offence, but is never without the gleam of idealism which is needed so sorely in this beclouded world. Brutality, disillusion and despair are to be found in its pages—but there is "the other side of the shield," with its comradeship and fidelity. The tale of "The Lonely Warrior" is one which should help us all to understand the war-torn soldier's problems. (Published by George J. McLeod, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

"Vandemark's Folly," [by Herbert Quick, is a story of pioneer effort. It is the history of the township of Vandemark, Monterey County, State of Iowa, and tells a story which might be duplicated in many details in Canada. The adventures of the early days are told with a pioneer simplicity which makes the chronicle one of importance in county annals. The story of the party which took place in the month of May, 1857, might be echoed by many a Canadian "old settler";—only this country did not run so much to "bandits" or feuds. This is a prairie tale of work, love and adventure which will appeal to many readers. (Published by George J. McLeod, Toronto, Price, $2.00).

"The Unseen Side of Child Life," by Elizabeth Harrison, is a book which treats of a subject of interest to all concerned in the development of juvenile intelligence. The writer's views are of a wholesomeness and sanity which make for understanding and sympathy. In the extremely useful chapter, "Mastering the Machine," the writer concludes:

"When I was once urging the importance of healthy babyhood from the standpoint of morality and religion, a witty friend said: 'If I understand you aright, Jack Johnson, the prize fighter, is a more-to-be-desired citizen than Ralph Waldo Emerson, the philosopher.' 'No,' I replied, 'But undoubtedly Jack Johnson would have been a less desirable citizen if he had had a diseased body. And who can say what Ralph Waldo Emerson or Thomas Carlyle might have accomplished if they had possessed good digestive powers? To come closer home: would Theodore Roosevelt have been of as much service to his country had his father not had the wisdom to fit up the upstairs side porch in his New York City home with gymnastic apparatus and encourage the delicate boy to make use of it?' This volume is of decided value to the student of the child—and is a stimulating book for any one to read. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto. Prices $1.40).

"The Last Law—Brotherhood" by Peter McArthur, which is a collection of short articles on such themes as "The New World" and "The Rule of the Majority," is published in Toronto by Thomas Allen. (Price .75c). The writer discusses many features of our present chaotic social system and seems to come to the conclusion that we should bear one another's burdens and keep up life insurance. It must be a real bit of advertising set to philanthropic music. Here is the conclusion:

"If the people once realize the power placed in their hands by scientific Life Insurance, the present unrest will pass like a nightmare. All will hasten to secure their proper place in organized society and 'Home Sweet Home' will be the anthem of Lloyd George's New World."

"Bits o' Bronze" (published by Thomas Allen, Toronto, price, $1.00) is a collection of brief articles by H. C. Mason, illustrated by D. C. McArthur. Most of the sketches were written originally for the O. A. C. Review, and have the "college touch." The proceeds from the first edition are devoted to the establishment of a permanent Memorial Scholarship at the Ontario Agricultural College. The little volume, which is

Will show reduction taking place in 11 days, or money refunded.

Results come usually in three or four days, but if you do not see positive reduction taking place in 11 days (the full trial period), return the Reducer at once, together with the instruction book that accompanied it, and your $5 will be refunded. Dr. Lawton, shown in picture, reduced from 211 to 152 lbs. in a very short time. The Reducer is not electrical; made of soft rubber, and weighs but a few ounces. Whether you are 10 or 100 lbs overweight, you can reduce any part you wish, quickly, safely, permanently, by using Reducer a few minutes, night and morning. By a gentle manipulation, the Reducer breaks down and disintegrates fatty tissue which becomes waste matter and is carried out of the system through the organs of elimination; thereby the blood circulation is improved. For years, Dr. Lawton's Fat Reducer has been successfully sold and is used by thousands. It is ENDORSED BY PHYSICIANS, and its use requires no dieting, starving, medicines or exercise. Sold generally by druggists everywhere, or will be sent direct to your home, in plain wrapper, upon receipt of $5 plus 20c to cover cost of Parcel Post and Insurance ($5.20 in all.) In the Days of the Gourd

BY MARTHA McCULLOCH WILLIAMS

THAT good creature the gourd has fallen from its high estate of use to one of mere ornament. This is not as it should be—in gratitude if no more. Our grandmothers owed it so much in the way of housewifery, that their era may be denominated the days of the gourd. Witness its uses. They had pretty well every manner of it. There was the great calabash with inch-thick shell, and capacity from one to ten gallons. It was none so easy to raise in perfection, but once raised, lasted through two life-times. And it held pretty well everything—sugar, flour, feathers, molasses, dried fruit, eggs, soap, lard, candles, the family sewing or Sunday clothes. The neck always short, was, in the very biggest specimens, conspicuously absent. These big fellows were cut at the top, a smooth round opening to which a wooden lid was afterward fitted accurately. If it was desirable to swing up the gourd, double holes were bored some little way from the rim edge through which leathern or rawhide braided thongs were passed up and down, and knotted together above so as to serve also for handles.

dancing ones were round or oval. Care was taken in the growth of dippers to have them straight or crook-handled at need. Gourds with long, straight handles were best for many things—as dipping up boiling liquids, washing down hogs at killing time, and lying primly across a water pail. But for hanging on a peg, or swinging to a martin-pole, crook-handled were the thing. So for straight handles the gourd vines were trained to run high—over fences or brush heaps or cabin chimney. The young gourds thus pendant, straightened and stretched of their own weight. Contrariwise, if the vine ran huddled over itself, sprawling on the ground, the handles were sure to crook—sometimes after the fashion of a ram's horn.

Every cool spring, no matter how deep in the woods, had its gourd, either hung upon a near tree-trunk, or thrust over the end of a stake driven in the brink. This for wayfarers—who were never lawless enough to break or misplace the drinking vessels. Powder gourds, beloved of hunters, were round and short-necked, small enough to slip handily into the

Every cool spring had its gourd dipper

After cutting, all the inside came out, the pith was scraped away and the gourd filled with boiling water, well dashed with lye. This with the scraping was repeated many times, until the gourdly taste was gone, and a clean hard woody shell remained. All gourds which had to do with eating or drinking got approximately the same treatment, although smaller ones were boiled several hours, then finished off at once.

Other uses, other manners. An egg-gourd needed only to have a squarish opening cut well above the round of it, and seeds and loose pith removed. The ideal egg-gourd was rather deep, with a short handle so crooked it would stay securely over the arm of the egg-gatherer. These gathering gourds were of moderate size, and emptied into the big main calabash which sat under the bed or up the loft. It was the crowning mercy of the big fellows that they were flat enough at the blossom end to stand solid. A big neckless gourd, very much flattened at each end, was sometimes sawed in two and fashioned into wash basins, or sewing baskets. But the dipper-gourds and the pocket, with a wooden stopper neatly fitted into the cut end of the neck. Seed-gourds and bottle-gourds were cut in the same fashion. A full set of seed-gourds, duly labeled, made a fine showing upon the cabin shelf. Yet they were not so near the hearts of the cabin-dwelling folk as the martin-gourds swung from the cropped boughs of a tall sapling, planted pole-fashion a little way from the door. The gourds were bigger than the two fists, cleaned out and cunningly cut so as to keep the mud nest secure yet not hold rain-water. House martins built in them year after year, singing joy in the shelter, and paying rent and more by fighting away all the plundering hawks. Crook-handles were best here, in that they permitted the birds to perch upon them an instant before darting into the nest.

Here is a gourd tradition lightly touched with romance. The first wheat crop of a pioneer settlement had been flailed out, winnowed and measured, and found to amount to almost three bushels. Half fell short of the elementary principles of sketching.

THE JUNGLE BREED

As for his duties he found them easy enough to master. At the first white streaks of dawn his boy called him to a cup of chocolate and plate of mangoes. Then he descended to put his coloured kingdom to its daily stride—imported mission-schooled clerks to their files, traders to their stores, watchmen to their posts, coopers, labourers, and cooks to their unhurried tasks through the long hours of slow-crawling sun. With the evening, ever a panorama of wondrous glory, came a great bowing of turbaned heads and loud calling on Allah, much preparation of mealie pots and dressing of hair. So, to the hissing of myriad crickets and throaty symphony of bullfrogs, the day went down into the starry-domed night with its million fireflies, and the soft-pattering feet of the tom-tom dancers, the merry jingle of anklet and wristlet, and the flaring, harshly melodious laughter of "mammies" sang the cockney king to childlike slumber. At last and by contrast he was really and truly happy. To him belonged not only the day, but the whole visible world. But there came a rude awakening.

He opened a case of silver to apportion it to the various departments. The first bag he took up was labelled, 5,000, 3d. But it counted out only 4,013 coins. He counted it again but with the same result. With a queer, sinking prediction of what was to happen he took up another bag. It came out at 4,045. This second shortage left him cold with fear. He continued his investigation into the rest of the bags, then the other cases, keeping at it until his head refused to remember the figures. Five thousand pounds in equal quantities of threepenny and sixpenny pieces means three hundred thousand tiny, unstackable coins. But in almost every instance the bags had been tampered with. Gone now was the glory of his authority—dropped from him like a dream cloak. The nightly dance became the torture of his sleepless hours; the sun of the day his curse. Again and again he went at the bags, his fingers grown nervously clumsy, his dazed brain getting different totals at each counting. But always, to paralyze him, was there certain proof of his loss. Days there were when he could not face the torture—days of fever when he fell into impotent outbursts of rage against Walker. But the delay only lengthened out his misery. Eventually he arrived at the correct amount of the deficit, £754, 19s, 3d. He sent a runner down to the Agent-General with the figures. Then he fell into an abyss of self-shame that sapped his inmost being. He had been given his opportunity, had been trusted and had failed miserably. Four weeks of agonized suspense dragged miserably away—then one evening his heart stopped beating at the sight of a white-duck figure stepping from a canoe and walking up to the house. The newcomer presented a curtly dictated note from the Agent-General:

"Mr. James Bright Gridley, Agent, Oroko.
"The bearer, Mr. Gaylord, relieves you. Come down at once to Ajaba and there await further orders."
So he was deposed. It came to him with a shock and yet it was what he had expected. Chokingly he had his cabin trunk and all the paraphernalia of his London dreams put into his relief's canoes, and then was swept rapidly with the current through a world that had lost colour, shape, joy, and surprise. He reached Ajaba broken for sentence. On this occasion he was not honoured by a personal interview with the big man. A short order sent him back to the delta and his gang of savages. Again those walling banks of jungle vegetation. The book-keeper kept to his cabin, not even showing when they made brief stops at factories to take up home shipments. At Engbombo they hooked on to four logs of mahogany, towing them down to the jungle hell that yawned before this disgraced clerk.

A Liverpool "gin-tank" lay in the channel. The factory agent signalled the Nubian captain of the stern-wheeler to take his cargoes direct to the steamer. Gridley, deferring exposure, went on to the big ship. As they came alongside an opportunity of escape from the years he so dreaded suggested itself.

He boarded the "gin-tank" while the cranes were shipping the logs, and slipped away to the chief steward. He wanted to work a passage to Liverpool. The steward shook his head. Gridley mentioned a box of curios, collected during his brief autocracy, and hinted at their probable value. If the steward could manage it the curios were his. The bargain was struck. The book-keeper was lost in the steerage while the ship continued its loading. For two days he lay there, fearing a chance word from the captain of the stern-wheeler to the agent would institute a search for the white man who had been brought down. But the ship weighed anchor without discovery—and again the wide, lazy, briny sea. Once outside the bar the steward made discreet discovery of the steerage stowaway. The book-keeper was haled to the skipper's cabin on the bridge and confronted with an enormous man in pajamas and carpet-slippers. But directly he looked into the twinkling, peeping eyes of the big, good-natured face his fears vanished. He recited his miserable story.

"But, God bless me," the skipper exclaimed, "what did ye want to run for? They'd have given you home passage if you had asked for it. An unwilling man is no good to them, only to swell the mortality list, and, Lord knows, it's heavy enough already."

The book-keeper stammered something about his three-years' contract, his self-shame deepened by this fresh instance of his blundering.

The skipper eyed him curiously, biting the end of a huge, black cheroot.

"You don't seem to have got on to the game at all. Well, never mind! Tell the purser to debit the Royal Sokoto Company with one first-class passage—it's only charging it up to themselves, for they're a big finger in this line."

The purser, of course, had to be satisfied by a repetition of the story.

"And what did you say was the name of the fellow who got away with the coin?" he asked, when the book-keeper had finished his narration.

"Walker."

"A lank, bony chap who swills whisky like the sand soaks rain?"

"That's him." Gridley had turned away, only faintly interested. Already the fresh, sweet Atlantic breeze was wiping out the poignancy of his disgrace.

But the purser was excited.

"That's the chap who is playing politics up at Monrovia—bought a labour concession from the Liberians. We had to pay fifteen shillings a head for the last batch of Kroomen we picked up there. The son of a gun!"

The book-keeper had awakened suddenly to the news. "But why—why don't the Company get after him?"

"Guess there ain't any extradition treaty. Anyway, he has your receipt, hasn't he?"

Most certainly Walker had his receipt. That mental vision of his signature coupled with Walker's at the foot of the balance sheets he had never been able to rid himself of; it was an obsession that would stay with him till his dying day. To his rage against his enemy was now added a brooding sense of unfairness. He fell to picturing Walker "playing politics" in the burlesque con govern-attractively bound and printed, is of more than local interest and significance, for the writer's style possesses the charm of one who loves both books and his fellow-men. The bits about the war have more than a passing claim on our bearing for they have the passionate sincerity of the author who knew whereof he wrote. "College Days" and the poem, "Friends o' Mine," are worth more than casual reading. The illustrations by D. C. McArthur are decidedly appropriate and spirited.

"A Garden by the Sea," and other poems by L. A. Lefevre is a volume of verse both pleasing and melodious. There is a dainty song, "Ninon," which expresses well the lighter mood.

"Ninon, Ninon, the hours are swiftly flying,
The moments pass and day still follows day,

Roses will die when autumn winds are sighing,
How canst thou live and love not, Ninon, say?"

This book, appropriately bound in grey and gold, is published in Toronto by McClelland and Stewart.

Dr. James L. Hughes of Toronto, like his gallant brother, the late Sir Sam Hughes, has that spirit of "eternal boyhood," which is the inheritance of the Irishman. Consequently, we find in his written work, an atmosphere of freshness and buoyancy which makes for the genuine optimism. Dr. Hughes sees and recognizes the sordidness and the tragedy of life; but, to him, joy is the final note; and so, it is impossible to read his latest collection of verse, "In Nature's Temple Shrines," and not be cheered thereby. Here is a characteristic bit from "The Master Artist":

"Green of meadow, gold of dawning,
White of two birch trees,
Purple of the valley willows,
Teach the harmonies

Of the Master Artist's pictures—
Pictures great and small,
Till we learn to see the wondrous Beauty in them all."

This volume is published in Toronto by Thomas Allen.

"New Plays from Old Tales," by Harriet S. Wright, is a book which should prove helpful to all interested in stage production for youthful audiences. From "Ancassin and Nicolette" to Hawthorne's "Feathertop," the plays run a dramatic course and make an interesting collection for modern use. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto).

"Midsummer," by Katharine Adams, is a story for boys and girls which carries us away off to Scandinavia and introduces many adventures with a final grand surprise in a tale which promises an adequate sequel. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto. Price $1.75).

of it was religiously set aside for seed, but the landowners yearned for at least a taste of wheaten bread. There was no flour-mill within a hundred miles—indeed corn was beaten to meal in the hominy mortar. But the house-mother was resourceful—she had neither sieve nor bolting cloth, but meant to have flour. So she had a bushel of wheat pounded fine, then took her bridal veil, of fine silk gauze, and spread it over a big gourd which had been cut on both sides, leaving it no more than a hoop with a gourd-handle. In this improvised sieve she bolted her flour, and triumphantly made cake from part of it. No doubt she got the idea of her sieve from the gourd milk-strainer, which remained in high favor as late as the Civil War.

Why I Like to be a Domestic Servant

BY MARY ANN

I HAVE decided to write and give a few reasons why I like to be in domestic service mainly because one hears so much nowadays against the restrictions and hardships attached to being a "servant." I use the word "servant" because it is the popular one but are we not all servants inasmuch as everybody who works for a living has to serve somebody—whether it is the employee who serves his or her "boss" or the "boss" who directly or indirectly serves the public? Even the President of a railway or the managing director of a bank, a colossal lumber concern or of any other industrial enterprise is a servant because he serves the public for which, of course, he is very often paid a princely salary but one that he is supposed to earn. Therefore, in using the word "servant" which is almost exclusively used in connection with the profession of assisting in the home, I do domestic servants migrated into the ranks of the factory workers, the store assistants and some even into office employment. In every case more pay was obtained and of course, a good deal more liberty but now all that has come to an end and the vast majority of those who entered factories, whether they were munition or clothing factories, now find themselves devoid of employment. Thousands of women are to-day out of employment the world over and yet the demand for domestic help is as keen as ever it was. Women, young and old, seem to look askance at the idea of entering service and yet conditions following the war are so different, so improved, that no one need hesitate to devote a few years to work which will equip them for duty as housewives and mothers in time to come.

Some people may say that mine is an exceptional case, that I am more than

RAISING HIS OWN HELP

This farmer is bringing up four "hired men" of his own household so in the full knowledge that the position, though perhaps humble, is not necessarily a menial one. Indeed, since the olden days of slaves, when servants were, by some people at least, looked down upon, the position now is just what one makes it.

I well remember that a few years ago, before the war, domestic servants began to realise that their lives were more often than not, lives of drudgery, when personal liberty was restricted to the point where it was almost tantamount to slavery. This was particularly the case in many European countries but in the United States conditions were not nearly so bad.

With the coming of the Great War things began to alter. Women of all classes and sections of society were in tremendous demand and thousands of ordinarily lucky, that it is mere chance that I find myself employed in the house of people who are good and kind and that the average housewife is "a brute" to work for! This, however, is not so. I know of three or four girls, each as comfortably situated as I am. One must remember that when applying for a maid's position one is invariably able to pick and choose, so great is the demand for house help to-day. If one possesses a little judgment, if one can size a person up fairly accurately at a preliminary interview, one should be able to gauge the personality of those who seek to employ help.

I will relate my experiences and reasons for liking domestic service in the hope that those who consider that there is nothing in favor of it will obtain a more favorable impression.

Why I Like to be a Domestic Servant

I went into service at the age of seventeen, in the year 1914, a month after war broke out. I have been constantly employed since, therefore, I have had seven years experience as a maid which has been gained in two households.

At the age of twenty-four I now find myself thoroughly equipped with knowledge which will enable me to take charge of a house of my own and inasmuch as I expect to be married at the end of this year, the knowledge acquired will enable me to run things smoothly in my own house, something which girls who spend years in factories and behind counters cannot always do.

I have accumulated a nice small nest egg, having saved on an average of one-hundred and twenty dollars a year during the time of my service to which I have been able to add by selling crochets and fancy work which I was able to do in my spare time—of which, by the way I have plenty. So that I shall have nearly a thousand dollars when I leave my present situation to undertake the duties of wifehood.

My reasons for liking domestic service are that I have lived, in the two situations I have held in modern, up-to-date houses in good localities instead of having, as is often the case with business girls, to live in a single room in poor or indifferent lodgings as so many girls of my acquaintance have to do. My life is a regular one, meals regular, duties and recreations regular. I have always had a very comfortable bed-sitting room and good food. This is something that many girls employed in offices and stores cannot say for unless one has a substantial salary it is impossible to keep up the appearance necessary to the business girl and look after one's bodily comfort at the same time.

I have always had plenty of liberty, my employer being most considerate. During some of my spare hours in the evenings I have become quite an accomplished craftswoman and can crochet and knit as well as anyone. In fact, I have sold more than a hundred dollars worth of work during the last two or three years and thus have not only learned a useful occupation but have profited by it financially also.

My "mistress" takes an interest in me because I do my work conscientiously. She has respect for her "servant" as have I also for her, as the employer and head of the house. In times of illness I have been looked after and cared for. Do I wear a cap and apron? Why, yes. Why not? There is certainly nothing to be ashamed of in doing so and I have no desire to be taken for any other than what I am—a domestic servant, filling a useful role in life.

Some girls in business have but one good meal a day and the rest of the meals are "cut according to what they have!" Not so in domestic service as I know it. If a business girl is late in the morning she often has to make a wild rush to catch her car, very often going without breakfast or with only a cup of tea, which is both detrimental to the health and upsetting to one's temperament. A domestic servant has not far to go and should she sleep too long or mistake the time, there is no need to tear along to the car and leave her breakfast behind. Moreover, she is not bound to go out in the pouring rain. She does not have to spend the whole of her salary on clothes because it is neither necessary nor becoming to have a lot of clothes. Therefore, she has a chance to save.

I take a great pleasure in seeing and keeping things clean and, in fact I always imagine that I am looking after my own house with the result that my employer is loud in her praise as to my qualifications and, incidentally, several people have invited me to work for them.

And as to friends, I have always had opportunities of receiving visitors and as I have never abused the privilege I have never been cut down. Both houses in which I have worked have been real homes for me—both employers have appreciated me and I them.

I have found heaps of pleasure in life and as a member of the Y. W. C. A. have had many opportunities of making friends.

To sum up I would say as regards domestic service that it all depends on the spirit with which you take up the work. Spirit is everything. If you insist that it is a menial occupation then it is not for you. But I would far rather be a maid in a good house than an assistant in a store or factory.

In the Days of the Gourd

The gourd, a straight-handled one, not too big, is cut at top and bottom, and, after cleaning, covered with a knitted cloth just wrung out of boiling water. The cloth is pressed well over the edges, and deep down inside, then all set in the sun to dry. Fully dried the cloth holds firm throughout a long straining.

There was a special strain of banjo-gourds, long and straight handled and very round in bowl. The top was cut almost flat with the handle. Under-cutting varied, according to the maker's whim, or the tone he aimed for. Sometimes it left no more than a rim two inches deep. Sometimes also there was just a tiny moon-face below. Sheepskin stretched over the top and strings fastened to pegs in the rim and handle completed an instrument, which in trained African hands gave forth weird untranslatable harmonies.

If the gourd had many uses, the trough and its congeners had more. The big sugar trough, dug from a poplar trunk, often held two hogsheads of sap, which was fetched to it in gourds from other smaller troughs, set under the spiles. But the salt trough was even bigger—besides a well-furnished smokehouse had several of them. Meat was packed down in them to take salt for later smoking. Some were twenty feet long and stood breast high. The outsides were hewn smooth, the insides finished, after digging out, with the adze. Indeed the adze and the drawing-knife were very present helps in pioneering. Skilled use of them made possible beautifully smooth bread trays of native ash, and spoon-shaped oak fire-paddles, nearly as good as iron shovels in heaping coals on a lid, or throwing ashes off seed fire. Axe and hoe-helves had to be drawn smooth and to shape, so did the staves of piggins, noggins, indeed all small cooperage.

A piffin was of hard wood, preferably cedar, and metal-hooped if possible, but young hickory answered at a pinch. It was unlike the bucket, in that it lacked a bail, having instead as handle one of the staves standing a hand's length higher than the others, and shaped so as to be easily and firmly held. Most commonly it was sacred to the dairy and to drinking water. Much scouring kept it always sweet. The noggin, broader and shallower, also got much scouring, but was less inviting. It was used for washing up dishes, vegetables, fruit—pretty well anything. The "cup-noggin" was sacred to tableware.

your mortgage that's bothering you. Isn't it, Peter?"
"No, It's not a mortgage," said Peter. "It's just worry over nothing."
"Then you must stop it right away. There is no sense in worrying, for father says so," said Lucy.
It must have been both quaint and amusing; the little girl, with her dark curls and red ribbon bow, perched on the whittling bench, trying so hard to cheer poor, lame, despondent Peter.
"You'd better have a peppermint, Peter, so that you can listen better," said Lucy, handing him an open, somewhat mussed bag.

Peter smiled for the first time that morning, as he took a peppermint and prepared to listen to Lucy, who proceeded to tell a story of her very own about a snowy elephant who had a trumpet-flower to wake him in the mornings.

Perhaps it was the story, but, more likely, Lucy's bright, eager face that brought about just what she was trying to do. By the time his visitor had hopped down from her wooden throne, blown him a kiss, and disappeared through the doorway, Peter was far less discouraged.

"Peter thinks far too much about being lame, and he'll just keep on thinking that way if I do not give him something else to think about," said Lucy to herself, as she left the little house.

"Cheering-up Peter is going to mean a lot of work though," she continued, "but though I kept him smiling this morning, I'm afraid it won't last unless I come around to see him every day."

So began the daily visits to the workshop, at which times Lucy always brought Peter something new to think about. These new interests that she planned for him, were of many kinds, stories, bits of news heard at the Cunningham breakfast table, and all the happenings of her world of play.

One of these new interests took the form of a spaniel pup, Sir Clarence, no less, that had shifted his liking from Archie Cunningham to Lucy. Sir Clarence immediately took a great fancy to a bed of shavings in the corner of the workshop, and decided right there to make his home with Peter.

Wise Peter West saw and understood, and, in his turn, began to plan ways to make the daily visits more pleasant for the little girl.

Once, when Lucy entered the shop, she was met by Sir Clarence, who greeted her with one uplifted paw as he stood wabbling on three legs. Peter had taught him to "shake hands," and other tricks besides, and it was a great day when Sir Clarence showed Lucy how he could stand on his head in the corner.

It certainly did Peter West good to have that puppy in the house, for Sir Clarence was a mischief, and certainly gave Peter plenty to think about. Then, too, instead of rolling-pins and chopping-bowls, Peter laid out special work to do during the visiting-hour, the carving from pine and cedar of more wonderful animals than ever walked into or stepped out of Noah's ark. There were spotty cows, camels with three humps, roosters taller than either, and a most wonderful, rough-coated, cedar bear. There were the sons of Noah and all their families. (Lucy made a farewell present to me of one of the sons—Shem, I think it was).

Over the making of these wooden toys bit by bit Peter told Lucy why he had come to the little house in Nestleton, and why, sometimes, it was so hard to be cheerful and contented.

I would not have known anything about this, but that I, as a good friend of both Lucy and Peter, was told the story by Lucy herself.

"And, do you know, Peter ran away from home when he was ever so young, not much older than Archie, I guess. He didn't need to run away, but he said that he just felt he had to 'wander the wide world around,' and that's a long way, I can tell you.

Smiles of April

"And Peter sailed in ships, and he saw whales, and icebergs and old castles, and—he has a stuffed crocodile hanging from the ceiling.

"I think he must have been most places in the world, but he never found a place where he cared to stay and make his home. If I had been Peter, I would have taken one of those big castles to live in, and I would have had a Chinaman, with a long, long pigtail, and a red and green paper parasol, to open the gate. I suppose Peter never thought of that, because he never stayed in any one place very long.

"And then after such a long time, years and years, I guess, Peter was working on a bridge, and a big piece of timber fell on his foot, and that is why he is so lame. He couldn't go wandering as he had done before, so he just came to Nestleton, because it was a quiet place, and began making potato-mashers and things.

"I asked him why he didn't go back home after he got so lame, and he just said he had no home to go to any more, except his little house right here. He couldn't find where any of his family had gone, though he tried hard as hard, and that is why he gets so lonely sometimes, but I think Peter is getting happier now, for he has got the puppy to cheer him up, and I visit him everyday too."

Peter's rheumatism was still very troublesome when April came, but what troubled Peter more was the knowledge that, in a few days, Lucy would have to return home. Her mother was coming for her, so she said, but she would write letters to Peter, and Peter promised more wonderful Noah's Ark animals.

The day of departure came, and, earlier in the morning than usual, Lucy came to Peter's workshop.

"Mother came last night, Peter, and will be here all day," she said excitedly, "Our train does not leave until after supper, as late as half-past seven, and mother has promised to come over here this afternoon with me—You'll like mother, Peter—and see the shop and Sir Clarence—and you'll show her the crocodile, won't you?"

Peter would have forgotten all about dinnertime if he had not been reminded noisily by the puppy. He swept the shavings carefully under the work-bench, and brought another chair into the workshop. He fastened gay paper about three pots of hyacinth, blooming red, white and blue—these were for Lucy to take back home with her. He even dusted the stuffed crocodile that swung from the ceiling of the front room. Then he walked back into the workshop.

It was with mixed feelings that Peter West awaited his promised visitors that April afternoon. He did not watch for them, but sat in the spindly chair, with the puppy curled up at his feet. He was glad that he would see his little friend again, but lonely already with the thought that she was leaving him that day.

The door swung open, the puppy barked in welcome, and Lucy rushed across to where Peter was sitting, exclaiming: "We've come, Peter, and it's raining like everything!"

But for once Peter was not listening. Lucy's mother was looking at Peter West. There was a moment of incredulous surprise, a moment of half uncertainty, a moment of glad recognition, and then she was beside the crippled figure in the spindly chair, bending down, and stroking the gray head, O, so gently, and saying over and over: "Poor Peter, poor Peter."

Wondering, yet with a new joy, Lucy said: "O, mother, I'm so glad that you know Peter, too."

Then, turning a glad face toward the little girl, her mother said:

"Not just Peter—Uncle Peter, dear."

And then, for the first time that day, the sunbeams slipped through the rain-clouds, and began to build a rainbow against the April sky.

Real Economy

The only real test of food is the nourishment it gives.

Some foods may seem economical because they cost little, but price alone is most misleading.

The true economy is to buy food for its body-building powers, and this is specially important in times of extra strain or stress, or when illness imposes any extra tax on the system.

Tested by the true scientific standard, Bovril is perhaps the most economical food in the world.

ANECDOTAL

"It makes me uncomfortable," Louis XVI of France said abruptly in the middle of the magnificent ceremonial of his coronation. Lifting his hands to his head, he removed the heavy crown—an act that terrified superstitious on-lookers, even though no one of them dared to dream of such complete disaster as his losing his crown and his head together.

An Oriental legend tells of a king who acceded to his throne late in life. "Too great glory crusheth too small strength," he murmured to his vizier as he sat in state for the first time. "Verily, though my crown shineth as all the stars of heaven reflected in one small pool, yet its weight is like to that of all the water jars that all the women of my kingdom carry upon their heads!" He bent beneath the burden, and died within the year.

Glory of another kind killed the aged Voltaire, when he went to Paris to supervise the production of Irène, his last play. He received such an overwhelming ovation that he died of excitement and exhaustion. As he himself said, he was smothered in roses.

In our time and country we sometimes smother our heroes in bunting and so lavish banquets upon them that they can hardly survive if they are not in exceptionally vigorous health. Before Marshal Foch himself came to America says a writer in "The Youth's Companion" (Boston) he was wont often to murmur, "Poor Fayolle!" For Marshal Fayolle, his notable predecessor as our guest, returned to France profoundly pleased with his welcome but profoundly upset in his digestion. The New York Sun relates that Marshal Foch is still amused at the remark Marshal Fayolle made when the chairman of the entertainment committee in one American city showed him upon his arrival late one evening the programme for the next day. It began with a sightseeing tour in the early morning; then followed a reception of delegations, a midday banquet and speeches and an afternoon reception. A public dinner and reception was scheduled for the evening and a ball was to follow that event.

"What do you think of it?" the chairman asked Marshal Fayolle.

"It lacks something," replied the marshal. "I see nothing in it regarding my funeral arrangements at the end of the day."

...

The city council of a town where earthquakes sometimes occur was in session. There had already been two or three slight disturbances that day, and soon after the members had assembled there came a shock that was decidedly severe. One of the members immediately moved that the council adjourn.

The next time the assembly met the clerk read the minutes of the previous meeting and concluded, "On motion of Mr. Bernheim the council adjourned."

"Are there any objections or changes to be made in the minutes?" asked the mayor.

At that a lanky member who was sitting in the rear of the room stood up. "I move," he said, "that the concluding minute be amended to read, 'On motion of the city hall the council adjourned.'"

...

A member of Congress, says "Harper's Magazine," took a taxi one rainy day at the Capitol to proceed to his home in the suburbs.

When he arrived and asked the chauffeur the charge, the latter replied that it was four dollars.

"But," protested the Congressman, "you are charging me for four miles."

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I understand that the distance is only two miles and a half."

"It is as a general thing, sir," assented the driver, "but you see we skidded a lot."

New Invention Revolutionizes The Art of Cooking

I am now able to offer to the world the cheapest, easiest and most perfect method of preparing the family meals ever known. Here is a cooking appliance that saves 50% to 75% of fuel cost—saves hours of time—saves countless steps—and insures better prepared, more tasty and healthful meals, from cereals to dessert.

Automatic Rapid Electric Cook Stove

A new, simple, practical invention that gives you every cooking, baking, roasting, frying, boiling and toasting facility of the expensive electric range, plus every advantage of the fireless cooker, at less than you would pay for even a good gasoline or oil cookstove, and at less fuel expense than any other known method of cooking. No other cooking stove or appliance needed. Simply snap on the switch and electricity heats the food. When the cooking starts, it shuts off automatically and the "fireless cooker" principle does the rest, without any additional heat or attention from you. Attaches to any electric light socket, requires no special wiring. Ready for use when you receive it. Aluminum lined throughout. Equipped with "Wear-Ever" cooking utensils. Guaranteed.

Try It Thirty Days At My Risk

I want you to try this great invention 30 days in your own kitchen—at my risk. I want to prove what it will do for you.

Some Fish Recipes

Boiled Codfish—Clean and wash the fish, and put it in a fish kettle with plenty of hot water and a large spoonful of salt; bring it slowly to a boil; let it simmer gently, removing the scum as it rises to the top, with an iron spoon, and allowing about ten minutes to the pound; put the lid on tightly. It is best to see whether the fish leaves the bone easily before lifting it out, as they vary so much; slip it carefully on to a hot dish with a strainer and serve with anchovy sauce and potatoes.

Codfish and Lobster Sauce—Boil the codfish as above, break the large claws of a lobster, take out the meat and cut it in small pieces; have ready some good white sauce, put the lobster in it and stir well, dish up the codfish, decorate it with the small claws lightly cracked, and rings of lemon; serve it with potato snow. The rest of the lobster can be used for another dish.

Steamed Codfish—If you are cooking a piece of codfish, it is much better to steam it; place it in the steamer, cover it closely with grease-proof or parchment paper, put the lid on tightly, keep the water boiling; lift it out carefully, and serve with oyster, shrimp, lobster or anchovy sauce, boiled potatoes and any other vegetables that you like.

Stuffed Haddock—Clean and wash a fresh haddock; stuff it with veal stuffing; shape in a circle by fastening the tail to the mouth, then place on a greased baking tin, pour some brown sauce or thick gravy over, cover with greaseproof paper, and bake twenty minutes or longer, basting it now and then; serve with the gravy poured round, and mashed or boiled potatoes.

Finnan Haddie (Scalded)—Lay the haddock in a deep dish; pour over some boiling water; cover and let stand in a hot place, on the top of the stove will do, for ten or twenty minutes according to its size; then drain well, put in the oven for a minute and serve on buttered toast.

Grilled Haddock—Wipe one or more haddocks with a cloth, and brush over both sides with melted butter and season with white pepper and a little nutmeg. Then place the fish on or between a gridiron and broil, i.e. grill the fish in front of or over a bright fire, allowing about ten minutes for each side. When done, dish up—skin downwards—spread over with fresh butter, garnish with parsley and serve.

Creamed Haddock on Toast—The ingredients required are: four ounces cooked haddock, one tablespoon milk, one egg, one small shallot, one-half teaspoon chopped parsley, one-half ounce butter or margarine, and pepper and nutmeg. Melt fat, add chopped shallot and parsley; add fish, beaten egg, and one tablespoonful milk, and seasoning. When just setting serve on croutons of fried bread.

Fish and Potato Shape—Cook the fish and remove the bones and the skin. Flake it, and mix with one-fourth cupful of milk or stock, one-half teaspoonful of salt and one-fourth teaspoonful of pepper. Beat one cupful of mashed potatoes with two tablespoonfuls of grated cheese, seasoning to taste and one beaten egg. Line a greased mould or bowl with bread crumbs, fill the centre with the fish mixture and cover with the potato crust. Bake in a moderate oven until firm and nicely browned. Turn out and serve hot.

Fish Salad—Mix cold cooked flaked fish with an equal quantity of boiled and drained macaroni or spaghetti cut into short lengths, marinate for thirty minutes in French dressing, drain, mix with mayonnaise or boiled dressing and serve on crisp lettuce leaves.

Another Method—Soak salt fish over night in cold water, drain, cover with fresh cold water, bring to the boil and simmer for forty minutes. Drain, cool, and flake, mix with mayonnaise dressing and serve on lettuce leaves, garnished with sprigs of parsley or sliced cucumber.

Fruits

fresh from the Fields and Orchards

During the summer months huge crates of freshly-picked fruits arrive at Moir's factory, and thus at fragrant maturity are pressed and preserved for use in Moir's candies.

Thus it is that the fresh flavor of the sun-ripened fruit is retained in Moirs' Raspberry Fondants, Strawberry Creams and Velvas.

These and other luscious fruit juices together with pure cream, butter, sugar, mellow honey, full-meated nuts and rich smooth chocolate are moulded together into the most delightful confections you ever tasted.

It is manifestly wrong to spend money on an improper building when the same expenditure would mean greater efficiency. (Rural School Plant—by Challman).

(c) To give attention to consolidation wherever it is practicable. Branches can secure from the Department of Education copies of pamphlet, consolidation of rural schools, and the Act of Amendments relating.

(d) To look into the matter of continuation schools, a step toward both consolidation and Rural High Schools.

(3) Attendance to Sixteen Years of Age at Least.

(a) By children of resident parents.—Not a necessity in a majority of cases but much needed in some few places.

(b) By Home girls and boys. These should receive more attention as too often they have a rather difficult row to hoe, and do not get the opportunities they should have as future citizens.

(c) Truancy: cases come to light of teachers reporting truants to officers but the matter receives little or no attention, and is dropped to the detriment of the child and the nation.

(4) Competent Teaching:

(a) Of necessary school work. Rural schools should not be made to bear all the inexperienced teaching.

(b) Of agriculture, household science and manual training,—not in all cases by the regular teacher.

Discussion: Could a duly qualified teacher take a group of schools for the teaching of these subjects?

(5) Education for

(a) retarded children.

(b) illiterate.

(c) non-English speaking.

(6) Teachers' Salaries which should be large enough to enable them to live comfortably.

(7) Teachers' Boarding Places:

Almost every place—town or country—reports difficulty in securing a suitable, if any, boarding house for the teacher.

"If country districts wish good teachers, in addition to giving better salaries, they must see to it that decent, warm, comfortable boarding houses are provided."

(8) Medical Inspection and Follow-Up Work:

(a) Dr. Waugh, in charge of this work, says the Department of Education depends on the Women's Institute to be eyes, ears, hands, and feet, in helping to carry out their programme. This is so familiar to all members now that only its importance and close connection with rural betterment permits mention here.

(b) Securing a School Nurse: the most logical factor in carrying out follow-up work.

(9) Hot Luncheon:

Wherever possible to promote this perhaps by having a woman who lives near by prepare soup, cocoa, or whatever is being served at her house, bring it to school, or in securing a woman to go to the school, prepare the hot dish, and act as supervisor during the teacher's absence at noon hour.

(10) Educational Associations:

These are being formed throughout the various counties and it might be well to have a member from each Branch belong to them.

(a) Through this agency a more efficient trusteeship could be sought.

(b) Public opinion might be influenced in favor of women on school boards.

(11) University Extension: to establish these courses during the winter months in rural neighborhoods.

To quote from the report of Mr. G. A. Putnam, Convenor of the Committee on Education and Better Schools of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada for 1921:

Among the conditions met with through out Canada and which should not exist in a country so well able to look after the youth of the land we may mention the following:

1. Lack of permanency and in too many cases lack of efficiency on the part of the teaching profession

2. Lack of proper accommodation for coats and wraps and children's lunches.

3. Unsanitary conditions and lack of pure water supply.

4. No provision made for supplementing with soup or some hot nourishing drink, the cold lunch taken to school.

5. Children forced to eat their lunches under conditions which are not conducive to natural development.

6. Defective lighting and heating.

7. Unsuitable colors used in decoration; or lack of any attempt at decoration.

8. Unsuitable blackboards improperly placed.

9. The children of the rural districts are forced to go to the larger towns and cities to secure that education which is necessary to enable one to take his place as a progressive citizen. Too often the boy or girl who leaves home to get the education which they feel they must have, do not return to the home community.

"My little boy and little girl came home last night demanding meat pie for their school lunch to-morrow," said an Eastern Ontario secretary at a recent Institute meeting. "Well, I'll make you one each," said I. "But mother, we want enough to go around the school—twenty of us!" "We'll have to co-operate then, for I want to go to the Institute meeting to-morrow too. You get the potatoes washed and peeled and I'll make a big pie and you can heat it on the school stove."

This is the simple wholesale way in which hot lunch is provided for one country school in an Institute community. Soup, cocoa, chocolate, something hot is provided for each cold day, and children and teacher unite to heat and eat it.

Dundas Women's Institute give an Annual Educational "At Home" in October of each year, to which all teachers of all the schools, the trustees and their wives, and the husbands of the Institute members are invited. The object is a pleasant informal social evening, during which all interested in education may get acquainted. This leads to much fine community co-operation throughout the year, and a cordial understanding and support of the teachers in their aims.

One of the many good results this year has been the passing of the following resolution by the Institute:]

"Inasmuch as there is a tendency to multiply parties, entertainments, and organizations for children of school age it is resolved that we as an Institute and as individuals use our influence to have these recreations confined to Friday nights and Saturdays. It is resolved that since excitement and fatigue of frequent parties and long continued practices for entertainments are detrimental to the health of the child, we endeavor to have them replaced as far as is reasonable by outdoor exercise and quiet home recreations."

The Diary of a Lonesome Girl

Dear Diary:

September 12

I promised to tell you everything, Dear Diary, and I'm going to keep my promise. But it's awfully hard sometimes to write down just how I feel. For I am so discouraged. Met Edith Williams today on the car. She was going somewhere with Jimmy. And her clothes were so becoming that I envied her. My hair is prettier than Edith's, isn't it? And my eyes—and my complexion? Then why am I always so lonesome—so much alone? Can't you help me, Diary? Bobbie's better today.

September 15

More trouble, Diary. Mother said today that the money she'd saved for my new dress would have to go to pay Bobbie's doctor bill. I'm trying to be brave, Diary, but I'm so disappointed. I wanted to go to a dance on the 26th. Shall I go, Diary? I wonder if I can fix up that white organdie from last season?

September 18

Went to church this morning. Walked home with Alice Browning. Saw Jimmy. He's always with Edith Williams. Oh, if I only had some pretty clothes—just a few of them, Diary, how happy I would be! Mother tries so hard to save, but Dad never earned a large salary. And everything I earn goes toward keeping house. But I can still smile, can't I, Diary?

September 23

I've decided to wear my organdie to the dance. I do hope none of the girls remember it from last year. That new sash may help. Do men ever remember dresses, Diary? Jimmy will be there with Edith. Always Edith Williams. Oh, if I only had some becoming clothes!

September 27

I couldn't write to you last night, Diary—I just couldn't. I cried myself to sleep when I got home from the dance. Every girl had a new dress but me. I think Edith Williams' was best of all. Do you think Jimmy will marry her? He hardly looked at me last night. Isn't there something I can do to get pretty clothes?

October 15

Met Mrs. Peters today, with her two children. Poor woman—she hasn't had a new dress in years. She can't afford those in the shops and she can scarcely sew at all. I wish I could sew, Diary—then I could make my own clothes. Saw Jimmy walking down the street today while I was buying a magazine, but he didn't see me. I guess he was thinking of Edith Williams.

October 16

Remember that magazine I bought yesterday? Well, I sat up late last night reading it. I just couldn't put it down. For in it I found the story of a girl just like myself. She couldn't afford pretty clothes, either, and she was, oh, so discouraged. And then she learned of a school that teaches you, right at home, to make your own clothes for a half or a third of what you would pay in the shops. Do you think I could learn, too, Diary? I'm going to find out, anyway.

October 19

Early today the postman brought me a good thick letter from the Woman's Institute. I fairly snatched it from his hand. Guess he thought it was a love-letter. Why, Diary, do you know the Institute is the most wonderful school I ever heard of? Think of it! While I've been so unhappy, thousands of other girls have been learning right at home to make just the kind of pretty clothes they've always wanted. If they can do it, why can't I? I can, Diary, and I'm going to!

November 16

I know I've forgotten you for some time, Diary, but I've been awfully busy since I enrolled with the Woman's Institute. Diary, I'm actually learning how to make the prettiest clothes I have always wanted. I've finished the first three lessons, and already I've made the prettiest blouse. Just think of being able to have pretty things for just the cost of materials!

January 30

Well, it's happened, Diary. There was another dance last night and I wore my new dress. You should have seen the girls. They were so surprised. They all wanted to know where I bought it. And when I told them I had made it myself they would hardly believe me. And the men! Don't tell me they don't notice pretty things.

My dance card was filled in five minutes. Jimmy and Edith aren't engaged yet, Diary. Jimmy's coming to see me on Wednesday night.

April 15

Here it is only the middle of April and already I have more pretty spring clothes than I ever had in my life. And altogether they have cost me no more than one really good dress or suit would have cost ready made. Oh, there's a world of difference in the cost of things, Diary, when you make them yourself and pay only for the materials. Besides, I've made over all my last year's clothes—they look as pretty as the new ones and the expense of new trimmings and findings was almost nothing at all.

May 8

Awfully busy, Diary. I've started to sew for other people. I made a silk dress for Mrs. Scott and a blouse for Mrs. Perry last week. Mrs. Scott paid me $10 and Mrs. Perry $3.25. Think of it, Diary—little me who couldn't sew a stitch a few months ago, making clothes for other people! Mother says I'm going to earn $30 a week soon.

May 20

The most wonderful, wonderful thing has happened, Diary. Jimmy has asked me to marry him. It's to be in the fall. And my trousseau will be the finest that any girl ever had. Because I'm going to make it all myself. Jimmy wanted to know what had caused the change in me, and I told him all about the Woman's Institute. He wouldn't believe it until I showed him my lessons. He looked them over and then said they were so easy that he thought he would take up dressmaking himself. Imagine Jimmy sewing, Diary!

May 26

Gladys Graham came in to see me today. I think she had been crying. Said she was discouraged because she didn't have pretty clothes. Then I told her all about the Woman's Institute. I think she's going to find out about it. I hope so. Think where I would be if I hadn't seen that magazine. Good-bye, Diary—Jimmy's here and I can't neglect him even for you.

What this "Lonesome Girl" has done you can do, too. There is not the slightest doubt of it. More than 140,000 women and girls, in city, town and country, have proved by the clothes they have made and the dollars they have saved, that you can easily learn at home, through the Woman's Institute, to make all your own and your children's clothes or prepare for success in the dressmaking or millinery profession.

It makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail. And it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or little time to the course as you desire and just whenever it is convenient.

Charming Gowns for Bright Spring Days

9424—Ladies' Long-waisted Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard. Size 36 requires $4\frac{1}{4}$ yards 36-inch dotted swiss— $1\frac{1}{8}$ yard 40-inch organdy for collar, cuffs, bands on tunic and sleeves at belt. An appearance of width is given by shirring the waist across the shoulders. The shirred tunic opens in front, and is trimmed around the lower edge with two wide bands of the organdy, which is also used for the narrow belt closing beneath a cluster of daisies. Collar, cuffs, and narrow bands above the cuffs are outlined with black silk embroidery twist in blanket stitch. A vestee of dainty lace adds a dressy touch to this summery frock.

9800—Ladies' Suspender Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{5}{8}$ yard. Size 36 requires $2\frac{3}{4}$ yards 36-inch linen for dress—2 yards 36-inch voile for blouse— $\frac{3}{4}$ yard ribbon. The top of bodice is cut in short points turning sky-ward which are buttoned to the suspender straps by self-covered buttons. A narrow belt of self-material slips under these points, tabs held down by buttons. Slit pockets are used on the skirt. The edges of the gown, shoulder straps, tabs on skirt, and pockets are finished with button-hole stitching worked in mercerized silk floss. The collar of the blouse is also finished in this way, fastening under a bow of black ribbon.

9549—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 50 bust. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{3}{4}$ yard. Size 36 requires $4\frac{5}{8}$ yards 32-inch tissue gingham— $1\frac{1}{8}$ yard 40-inch organdy for collar, vestee, cuffs, and plain sash— $2\frac{1}{2}$ yards plaiting. Two deep tucks and hem finish the gathered skirt. The sleeves are three-quarter length. This gown would also look well made up in white batiste crossed in black with cuffs, collar, and sash of pale blue organdy. The sash tied in a fluffy bow with long, pointed ends. The ruffling on the collar and cuffs made more effective by being hemstitched to the material.

Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard. Size 36 requires $4\frac{3}{4}$ yards 32-inch plaid gingham— $12\frac{1}{2}$ yards rick-rack braid. This is applied in two rows around the lower part of the skirt and four rows finish the soft crushed belt. Armholes and U-shaped neck are piped with the gingham. The collar of the blouse is round finished with a bow of black satin ribbon, and the turn-back cuffs are made for link buttons.

Purple and Fine Linen

BY CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

THE whirlwinds of Fashion have caught up cotton dress goods and brought them back to us, with even more than their former glory. They go from heavy materials to tissues; from bright, strong colors to pastels, and white will hold an honored place in the fashionable wardrobe this summer.

Dotted Swiss muslins, embroidered muslins and organdies and voiles with a woven stripe or dot and an open-work motif bordered with tiny flowers embroidered in natural colors; cross-barred, striped and embroidered dimities and Outstanding among the finer goods are the small and larger dotted materials—light dots on a dark ground and vice versa—and the embroidered motifs which are usually very small and exquisitely done; there are, however, some larger designs in which broiderie anglaise plays a major part.

The embroidery is sometimes done in the same color as the ground, as for instance, white embroidery on white, but as a rule one or more colors are introduced. Monotones in cotton are the exception; nearly everything has its tissues which endeavor to camouflage their luxuriousness in gingham design; printed voiles, but in miniature design, mark you, and Scotch English and Canadian ginghams in eighth, quarter and half-inch check, and broken plaids in two or more colors; printed chintzes and plain and fancy cotton homespun that are virtually ratines or epong cloth, whichever you wish to call them, and sport linens—such is the repertory of the cotton dress fabrics.

touch of a complimentary or harmonizing color in one way or another.

Already in the shops gingham has been received with acclaim. Red and white and black and white checks are the most popular but they are not new this season. It is really the third summer that red and white has been worn and black and white is an old favorite. The newer combinations are orchid and white and

JUST BECAUSE YOU MUST WEAR CORSETS IS NO REASON WHY OTHER PEOPLE SHOULD KNOW YOU DO—This matter of designing for types is the whole secret. The Type Corsetry that Gossard artistry has created conceals itself from the appraising eye of your best enemy. Every type of figure has been individually studied and treated as a special problem, and the Gossard Corsets designed for your needs will coax, restrain, supplement—easily, gently, naturally—and bring you by hidden ways to the very most of which your figure is capable. Because they will not attempt to change you radically or make you conform to some fleeting style tendency not inherently becoming to you, you will never have that “tied-in, pinched-together look,” that “corseted look,” that is just as fatally ageing as its sagging, uncorseted reverse.

Why go on buying just “a corset,” when at any of the best stores and specialty shops, a skillful corsetiere will unfailingly select for you a

that will make you look so much better and feel so much better, and be forever sure you are not missing something in the mirror that your friends see when you are looking the other way? The cost of Gossards is well within the price you would expect to pay for such superior artistry and workmanship, and they offer an unequaled value in wearing service that makes their purchase a true economy.

“THE GIFT OF EVE”—So we have named a tiny book that is just off our press. It is not pretentious but it will be cherished by every woman who appreciates the importance of that quiet distinction that ever marks the woman of good taste. To you we shall be glad to send it, if you will trouble to write your request to our home offices at 363 West Adelaide Street, Toronto, Canada.

No. 12564—Charming motifs for embroidery or appliqué.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12564, blue or yellow, 30 cents, (1/6), supplies 15 different motifs illustrated and 6 duplicates of each. The apple and leaf, and the flower motifs are suitable for appliqué.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12615, blue or yellow, 40 cents, (2/-), supplies 3 yards of 4-inch beading or embroidery border, also 2 yoke sections. To braid 1 yard of border requires 12 yards of braid, to braid the square yoke motif 5 yards are needed, and for the round yoke 5 1/4 yards. Illustrated at the right on Pictorial Review Dress 9763, 35 cents, (1/6), sizes 16 to 20 years, and 34 to 44 bust.

No. 12615—Novel border and yoke design attractively applied as illustrated to the one-piece Dress 9763.

No. 12511—A collection of unique motifs.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12511, blue or yellow, 25 cents, (1/3), supplies 5 motifs and 7 duplicates of each, also 2 1/2 yards of 2-inch darning stitch border.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12635, blue or yellow, 20 cents, (1/-), supplies 60 small dainty motifs suitable for lingerie or baby clothes.

No. 12635—The daintiest of designs to adorn sheer materials.

No. 12637—Border and Motifs for Raised Cotton Stitches.

THE Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12569, blue or yellow, 35 cents, (1/6), supplies 14 effective grape motifs, 7 of the smaller one, 5 1/4 by 6 inches and 7 of the larger, 8 by 9 inches. They may be worked in flat satin stitch, dashes in darning stitch. This is illustrated at the right on the costume with Pictorial Review Blouse 9779, 35 cents, (1/6), sizes 34 to 44 bust, and Pictorial Review Skirt 9777, 35 cents, (1/6), sizes 24 to 36 waist.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12352, blue or yellow, 30 cents, (1/6), supplies 3 1/2 yards of border 2 3/4 inches wide and 4 transfers of each of the motifs shown, 6 inch square, 4 inches square and a pointed one 2 3/4 by 7 inches. Darning stitch and French knots may be used effectively for this design.

No. 12569—Illustrated on costume of Blouse 9779 and Skirt 9777 above.

No. 12352—Smart darning stitch motifs and border.

No. 12571—A variety of stitches find place here.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12571, blue or yellow, 25 cents, (1/3), supplies 2 large and 24 small embroidery motifs in flower design. A charming use of these motifs is illustrated at the lower left on Pictorial Review Dress 9778, 35 cents, (1/6), sizes 14 to 20 years.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12638, blue or yellow, 25 cents, (1/3), illustrated at the right center below, supplies 6 yards of border 1 3/4 inch deep; and 9 motifs. The tiny spray at the center of each scallop is worked in satin stitch, and the scallop outlines covered with fine feather-stitching worked with No. 50 cotton and a No. 12 needle.

No. 12623—Pretty motifs for trimming children's frocks.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12623, blue or yellow, 25 cents, (1/3), supplies 3 yards each of two 1 1/2-inch borders and 6 different motifs with reverses of two of them and 6 duplicates of each, making 48 motifs in all. These designs lend themselves prettily to beading, French knots, and embroidery.

No. 12638—This scallop and motif are excellent for lingerie.

Purple and Fine Linen

yellow and white and these the buyers for the large stores tell us are to be very popular with discriminating women. They respond to a more exclusive note, especially in the tissues which come in the gingham patterns.

Organdies which were so captivating last year and the year before take second place this year, although they will be found in a very full range of colors as well as embroidered designs and gingham patterns. The dotted Swiss muslins and tissues will be preferred by the ultra fashionable woman.

Every thread in the cotton homespuns seems to spell utility. They come in a complete range of sports colors in hyacinthian tones and tints, and to these lovely ground colors, in some of the pieces offered for our choosing, are added wide and narrow stripes singly and in groups; and on some of the designs the stripe is broken at intervals. Also there are checks, spots and embroidered designs. These homespuns are really very exquisite and well worth the consideration of anyone planning a costume for which such a texture would be suitable.

But these cotton homespuns must not be confused with the woollen homespuns. They are quite another thing.

Then there are cotton crepes. Silk crepes are very fashionable this year and their counterpart in cotton, while not quite so attractive are going to be used to a certain extent. There are some rather heavy weaves,—that is, heavy as compared with voile or batiste, but not as heavy as ratine—with a crepe surface divided into blocks with colored stripes that run up and down and across. These are very pretty for summer sports dresses.

Something of which we are going to hear much before the Season is far spent is "gardengate" print. In ordinary parlance this is known as English chintz and is used for porch and garden dresses, for sun hats and sunshades, and for children's dresses and aprons. There is every reason to believe it is going to have a widespread vogue and many are already planning to have garments made of it to wear in the "great out of doors" wherever fate or fancy may carry them this summer. The same idea is carried out in English prints and both the chintz and the print were worn extensively in England all last summer.

BUT if the cotton manufacturers have been busy getting out beautiful designs and weaves so have the silk mills and when the openings take place most of the stores will be showing some very exquisite fancy silks which will be used largely for separate skirts. Some of the new silks are rather interesting, as, for instance, a silk ratine called eponette. En tour, which resembles Shantung and is worn for sports, consists of silk and wool. Wee Kend, which is quite an obvious play on words, is an eponge silk with self dots, checks, stripes and plaids in a satiny effect. Khaki Kool is an old acquaintance back for the summer, checked and striped with black lines. Souffle brocade is really a matelasse weave. It makes up very handsomely as you will probably see a little later on, for it is being used by some of the better manufacturers. Molly-O is the rather chummy name of a very handsome satin-faced Canton crepe also used by the dress manufacturers, the reverse side being employed as a trimming. The name of indestructible voile, which never was a very suitable one, has been changed to indestructible chiffon voile and one of the novelties in this family chiffon voile, has a shimmering-glace finish.

These are a few of the novelties, but when all is said and done, and due homage paid to these beautiful new weaves and patterns, we shall probably go to our pet store, look up our pet salesman (or pet saleswoman) and select a nice chiffon taffeta, pussy willow, crepe de Chine or Canton crepe. If one happens to have very independent views in the matter of a silk frock, perhaps she will choose a foulard silk of which there are many beautiful patterns mostly in small conventional designs spaced far apart. Foulards although beautiful and serviceable are rarely as popular as taffetas or crepes.

There are some exquisite colorings in crepe de Chine and Canton crepe and they are very much better value than they were a couple of years ago, but the present indications are that they will not be any cheaper than they are now for some time to come; the prices of raw silk are trying to repeat their upward trend which began in 1915.

When buying the silk for a dress this season it will be a good thing to decide upon the style before you buy the material because if it is to have a basque waist and bouffant sides you will require taffeta. If it is going to have straight lines then by all means select a soft crepe.

Some of the shades which it is expected will be popular this summer are the old reliable sand and platinum grey. By the way the new name for sand is bamboo. Periwinkle blue is that lightish blue found in the hydrangea. Then there are the fuchsia shades, which, however, will be used more for trimmings and millinery than for costumes. Canna is still a very good color. Then there is armistice, one of the new shades, which is a rather light blue and Wedgwood, very much the same as Copenhagen.

Homespuns, as you all know, are going to be the favorite material for sports suits, skirts and dresses. It doesn't matter so much whether it is a handloom or a mill woven, it will be fashionable. The handwoven cloths are of course, the more expensive and have always been great favorites with the American tourist coming to spend part of a vacation in Canada, but the woollen mills have copied these goods very carefully and one believes that many will not know the difference between them when the actual time for buying comes. The mill woven goods come in beautiful stripes as well as plain, the stripes being used for either separate or suit skirts with plain coats to match. The light colors such as grey, natural, tan, rose, Wedgwood periwinkle and white are going to be very prominent in garments made of these homespuns.

Wool, jersey and tricolette are also with us again. Both will be used for jumper dresses, also for dresses with sleeves, suits and even sports coats. A wool jersey can be sold at a very reasonable price and this is partly what makes it so popular for both dresses and suits. There is almost no limit to its serviceability.

Among the most interesting trimmings for dresses this Spring are ribbons. They come in many beautiful patterns. There is one very new thing which is wide enough for a bodice, the design being a group representing Youth, brought out in silver or gold metal thread.

Another is a sash ribbon which comes in various color combinations with a metallic warp. This is entirely new and very pretty, but perhaps it is the narrow ribbons which are of more general interest to us. There are some so narrow that they are little more than a cord and others about half an inch wide, most of which have a gold or silver edge and sometimes a picot finish. Cire ribbons are to be used a great deal and some of these have a two tone face. Very few plain ribbons are used. They are mostly fancy.

Belonging to the ribbon family is a single and a double edge fringe. The double edge is about four inches wide which, perhaps, can be best described by saying both edges of the ribbon are fringed out leaving about an inch down the centre. Besides these wide fringes, there are some about half an inch wide in one and two tones.

Horrockses
Nainsook

The inconsistent goddess Fashion has wrought many changes since 1791, but there is one tradition which she has not molested—the choice of Nainsook for babies' dresses. HORROCKSES' Nainsook has daintily defied the whimsical goddess and to-day, as in great-grandmother's day, the tiny pin tucks and delicate embroidery is still worked in this baby-like material.

MODES AND FABRICS

THE gowns of Princess Mary were of interest to all the feminine world. In the first place it may be of general interest to know as Miss Mary MacLeod Moore informs us, that most of Princess Mary's dresses are seven inches off the ground, so that debatable point is settled. The Princess has never gone in for extremes of fashion, and her skirts have been kept at a conservative length, even through the height (no pun intended) of the short skirt craze.

As to the wedding dress itself, made by the famous firm of Messrs. Reville, the foundation is cloth of silver draped with a beautiful overdress where pearls and gold thread are embroidered upon a delicate ground. The Court train is of silver over white satin, embroidered in silver and white. It was a silver wedding, as the pretty bridesmaids also wore white and silver. Some magnificent wraps have been made for evening and day an inner close-fitting sleeve cuffed with fox. While some of the evening dresses are very beautiful and imposing, many are quite girlish and simple, and this may be said of the going-away dress which many girls will want to copy either for day or dinner wear. It is of blue charmeuse, round at the neck, with elbow sleeves, but the particular feature is the embroidery which is done in long lines like panels to the foot of the skirt.

SKIRTS for spring are longer, practically all skirts but those for sports wear. To be specific: Evening gowns that were fourteen inches from the ground have dropped to the ankles. Afternoon gowns of silk and crepe that were twelve inches from the ground are now only seven. Skirts of one-piece dresses and tailored suits which were twelve and often fourteen inches from the ground are now about ten. Here the wear, and furs figure among the presents which have poured in upon the Princess almost from the time her engagement was announced. Ermine as befits a King's daughter, and mole and sable fox are all represented. One coat and skirt of blue velour ratine with gunmetal motifs on the cape-coat, has a trimming of gray opossum. For the drive to the Abbey on a chilly February morning the Princess wore a cloak of ermine and heavy white brocade, and as the coach (built one-hundred-and-fifty years ago) in which she traveled has glass sides the general public that waited hours for a glimpse got a very good view of a radiant rosy bride, smiling at her father's subjects in acknowledgment of their cheers. Another cloak is of sapphire blue velvet trimmed, with blue fox, and lined with rose pink charmeuse. There is a huge collar of the fur, and a deep hanging sleeve, with drop is less, but it's still a comedown says a writer in "The Woman's Home Companion."

In Paris the jump has been a big one, from the fairly short skirt to the conspicuously long one, but Paris has accommodated herself to the change with her brightest of smiles. She has gone in for the long skirt, and the wider skirt, too, with a gay enthusiasm that she alone has when clothes are concerned. Off-hand, I would say it's her natural French spirit. She loves change. She was ready for the something different.

In evening frocks and in some of the afternoon gowns, the waist line is often a good six inches below the normal.

Mme. Jenny, who has been so much talked of this past winter because of her big, interesting sleeves, is making many of her spring gowns with the double waist line.

The Dust Collector

THIS soft, fluffy duster is generous in size and has dust-absorbing strands that reach the tiniest crevices. The long handle enables one easily to reach the under parts of furniture. You may wash and wring it—and it will dry out like new, retaining all its dust-gathering qualities.

The Fuller Duster is but one of the forty-five "Household Necessities"—a line of high-grade brushes bearing the Fuller Red Tip Tag.

Fuller Brushes are made in Canada, of materials bought in Canada. Designed by and for Canadians.

They are never sold in stores, but are brought right to the homes and demonstrated by courteous representatives who know modern housekeeping methods. These men are a never-ending surprise. Their knowledge of the care of the home is so complete—and the time-saving methods they suggest are so practical. Identify the Fuller Man by the Fuller trade-mark button he always wears on his coat.

We are the largest buyers of brush material in the world, therefore get better quality at lower prices. So do the users of Fuller Brushes.

THE JUNGLE BREED

ment and growing comfortably rich on his labour concession. Then there surged on him the horror of a re-entry into the old colourless, flaccid life to which he was going back—the morning alarm clock, unenjoyed wash, hurried breakfast and city bus, the loathed figuring and servile "Sir."

His mind became centered on Monrovia, not in definite scheming, but in restive surrender to its hate. When they dropped anchor in the pretty bay, he hung over the taffrail moodily eyeing the low white roofs climbing the coast hills.

At length some instinct took him below to his papers. These, with a few other trifles, he had packed the last moment at Oroko in a skin sack, and managed to take aboard with him. He went over them subconsciously—home letters, diary scribbles, the contract, a couple of yellowed bundles of London papers which he had kept for some reason or other. At last, untying one of the latter, his hand fell upon a package of letters tied with blue ribbon—tokens of his only love affair. A half-coloured little love affair it had been, lost utterly in his lack of prospects, and almost forgotten in the gray patchery of his existence. And yet it had been only little more than two years ago. He sat recalling the girl—a sweet-faced, motherly slip of a cockney maid, shadow-eyed, and with the pathos of labour about her. For a while they had talked to each other of a cottage, a little patch of ground, and something or other to do in the country, then mutually had recognized the impossibility of such a thing, or their being able to marry at all. It was part of their daily grind that they should recognize it—part of their daily grind that they should submit to it without rebellion. So they had drifted apart, vowing at least never, never, to marry anyone else—and Gridley had not even seen her before he left. Except that he knew the address to which she had moved and had heard of her occasionally through others, she had passed completely out of his life—a blossom blighted hopelessly in the bleak sky of routine. Back there, in the London fog, scarcely a palpitation belonged to the affair; but, now, as Gridley sat with the letters in his hand, and fresh from his new environment, it became a vivid thing—an ache. After all, Africa had done something for him—roused in his blood the quality of realization.

It must have been more than half an hour later that the purser broke in on his reverie from behind.

"Say, Gridley, what the devil are sad-irons? I've got 'em on the indent for Monrovia, but no one knows what they are. Are they the things women use in ironing, or what?"

The book-keeper disclaimed any knowledge in the matter.

"Guess, I'll just take half a dozen flat-irons ashore," remarked the other, moving away.

Gridley, the letters clutched in his hand, suddenly sprang erect with thought. He called after the purser:

"Can I come along?"

"Sure; I'll be starting in ten minutes."

With methodical earnestness the book-keeper set at once to get ready. It was as if some all-engrossing but repressed impulse impelled him. Except for the package in his hand, which he put in his pocket, he tied his letters and papers into a careful bundle, weighted them with a curio dagger, and dropped them through the porthole. Into his right-hand trouser pocket he slipped his revolver. A few photos he tore up, scattering the pieces to the ocean. Then he went on deck and dropped down the companion ladder into the surf-boat. The purser joined him a moment later and the seamen laid to their oars.

At the landing the purser gave the book-keeper half an hour to look around while he negotiated with a gold-laced, important customs officer.

Gridley went on up the sandy street. His actions seemed controlled by some force infinite and beyond himself. For just a moment he stopped to ask a clothed native where the white man, Walker, lived.

"You keep on, sah, in the direction you now go, until you come to house where resides Mr. Courdlandt, who is boss of the railway our Government is building to"—

His interrogator cut in impatiently. "It's Mr. Walker I want."

"I am all my best endeavour to understand that to you, sah. Mr. Walker lives in the house beyond, where the"—

But the book-keeper had shot ahead. Passing the house of the engineer of the railroad, a white figure on the verandah waved a friendly hand to him, a fellow countryman, but he was too intent in his own mind to notice. Presently he came to a bungalow whose paint and glass window panes proclaimed the luxurious dwelling of a white man. He crossed the silent, deserted courtyard and entered the wide-open door. No one stopped him—the place seemed deserted. He looked in the doors of several rooms, with a queer remembrance of his similar hunt on his arrival at Oroko. Suddenly he confronted the man he sought half dozing in a Maderia chair by a small table, his feet cocked on a stool, a litter of English illustrated weeklies on the floor at his side.

Walker looked up at the shadow thrown across the room. He stared incredulously—then he sat bolt upright.

"Good God! It's Little Tup'ny!"

The book-keeper still advanced. Something in his eyes brought the other to his feet. Gridley drew his gun and levelled a steady muzzle. For one brief moment Walker thought to bluff it as once before. Then he saw the trigger finger contracting. "Don't shoot, for God's sake don't shoot!" he cried. The book-keeper spoke in tense, quick tones.

"Then refund the money you stole, you thief, and right here, with that pen and ink, sign a statement that you did steal it."

The other glared for an instant, turned to his right as if about to do as he had been bid, then lunged out a swift left hand for the gun. But the book-keeper evaded with a backward step and fired, the shot ripping the outer muscles of the shoulder and bringing forth a cry of pain.

"Do it," he commanded hoarsely, "and don't take a minute about it. The amount is £754, 19s, 3d. Sign the statement first."

His face drawn with pain, Walker took up pen and ink and did as he was instructed. He then shoved the writing to the corner of the table, and, still covering him, the book-keeper picked it up and read it, making sure of the signature.

"That'll do," he said; "now get the money!"

"I haven't got it to get."

"Then, by God, I am going to shoot you dead."

There was no mistaking the tone. The hand holding the revolver tensed itself again, and Walker shrank down in his chair, the scowl whitening on his face.

"There's a tin box hid in a ju-ju charm behind that curtain there." He spoke in nervous haste, pointing with his thumb behind him.

"Very well, stay as you are."

The book-keeper returned with the tin box almost immediately, set it down on the table, and waited. Without being commanded Walker turned a key in it, displaying four small sacks set in a sprinkling of loose change. He

The Royal Baking Service

from The Royal Educational Department

EDITOR'S NOTE—With what immense satisfaction do we enjoy a piece of good home made cake! How infinitely better it is than any we could possibly buy! Many cakes look tempting but when tasted are very dry and disappointing, lacking that flavor which good flour, baking powder, shortening, eggs and above all, home baking seem to give. Wouldn't you like to become a better cake maker? You can, so easily. In fact, you may even become an expert and turn your baking knowledge into dollars, for everybody loves home made cake. The Royal Educational Department is ready to help you with suggestions and special instructions whenever you need assistance.

Cake Troubles

Question: Is it necessary to use pastry flour for cakes?

Answer: While pastry flour is excellent for all recipes in which baking powder is used, it is not necessary and moreover not available for everyone. All recipes on these pages and in the New Royal Cook Book were made up with an ordinary good bread flour and the proportion of liquid is correct. All flour, however, should be sifted before measuring (two or three times is even better for cakes) and never packed down in the cup, but piled in very lightly.

Question: How can I get a fine-grained cake?

Answer: Cream butter or other shortening before adding sugar—use fine granulated sugar if possible. Beat the batter well after adding each ingredient, and when the beaten egg whites are added last, mix them lightly, but very thoroughly, into the batter. On the other hand, hard beating at this stage tends to roughen the cake. Bake the cake in a moderate oven, increasing the heat slightly after it has been in the oven about 10 minutes.

WHY does my cake rise up in the middle?" "How do you make chocolate icing glossy?" "How must I change a cake recipe when baking in high altitude?" Hundreds of women are writing this department daily such questions as these. You also perhaps may be bothered by similar baking troubles. If so, write the Royal Educational Department. It is prepared to help you as it is helping thousands of women all over the world. Following are a few of the commonest difficulties—

Question: What makes my cakes split open and the batter pour down the sides?

Answer: The oven is too hot. A crust forms before the cake has had a chance to rise completely, and the uncooked batter forces its way through the top, making a very unsightly cake with poor texture. Send for the Glazed Paper Oven Test. It is a sheet of correct oven temperatures and will be of great assistance to you.

The Birthday Cake

Remember grown-ups as well as little folks will appreciate a birthday cake. It must be of superfine quality. This inexpensive Pound Cake (recipe below) is delicious; for one still less costly you might try the Royal Cream Loaf Cake (page 12 New Royal Cook Book) which is so light and fine you would never dream that it requires but two eggs.

Of course the birthday cake must go as far as possible. Everybody will want a piece, perhaps two, so here is a way of cutting it that will surprise you by its economy.

With a sharp knife, beginning at the outside, cut around in circles until you reach the center, then slice through each circular piece as illustrated.

Small families, however, will not eat a whole cake at one time; therefore instead of the usual way, cut desired number of pieces from center of the cake as illustrated below. To keep the rest fresh push the two remaining pieces close together like a whole cake. This will keep it moist and soft several days.

Cut these out and put in your cook book

Pound Cake

- 1 cup butter
- 1 cup sugar
- 1 teaspoon vanilla extract
- 1 teaspoon lemon extract
- 5 eggs
- 2 cups flour
- 1 teaspoon Royal Baking Powder

Cream butter thoroughly; add sugar very slowly, beating well between each addition. Add flavoring and yolks of eggs which have been beaten until pale yellow. Beat egg whites until light and add with flour which has been sifted with the baking powder two or three times. Beat mixture well for several minutes, until very light and fluffy. Bake in greased loaf pan in moderate oven about one hour. Cover with the following frosting

Ornamental Frosting

- 1 1/2 cups granulated sugar
- 1/2 cup water
- 2 egg whites
- 1 teaspoon flavoring extract
- 1 teaspoon Royal Baking Powder

Boil sugar and water without stirring until syrup spins a thread; add very slowly to beaten egg whites; add flavoring and baking powder and beat until smooth and stiff enough to spread. Put over boiling water stirring continually until icing grades slightly on bottom of bowl. Spread on cake, saving a small portion of icing to ornament the edge. This can be forced through a pastry tube, or, through a cornucopia made from ordinary white letter paper.

Royal Tropic Aroma Cake

(Illustrated above)

- 1/2 cup shortening
- 1 1/2 cups sugar
- 1 cup milk
- 1/4 teaspoon salt
- 1 teaspoon nutmeg
- 2 eggs
- 2 1/2 cups flour
- 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
- 1 teaspoon cinnamon

Cream shortening, add sugar and beaten eggs. Mix well and add (sifted together) half the flour, baking powder, salt and spices, add milk and remainder of dry ingredients. Bake two-thirds of this batter in two greased layer tins, and to the remaining third add one tablespoon cocoa which has been mixed with one tablespoon boiling water. Use this for middle layer. Bake layers in hot oven 15 to 20 minutes. Put following filling and icing between layers and on top of cake:

- 2 tablespoons butter
- 1 tablespoon cocoa
- 2 cups confectioner's sugar
- 3 tablespoons strong coffee
- 1 teaspoon vanilla extract

Cream butter. Add sugar and cocoa very slowly, beating until light and fluffy. Add vanilla and coffee slowly a few drops at a time, making soft enough to spread.

THE IDOL OF YOUTH

noticing the quaint shapes females give themselves, and I saw that this one looked somehow a bit different.

It was a graceful "silhouette" however; slim—I thought—as the shadow of a young birch-tree by moonlight. I felt sick, because I had on a British Warm, while this poor outcast child of some alien land was facing the British cold. I think it was then I fell actively in love with her. I'd been no more than interested—intrigued—fascinated by mystery and green-grey eyes—before.

It was all I could do not to spring out of ambush and envelop her in my coat. But it wouldn't do. I must wait. I couldn't rescue the girl before there was anything tangible from which to rescue her.

Just as I had expected, she took the way to the West Cliff. I followed at a distance, with the air of a stroller. And nothing sadder than those black pines above the steely glitter of crawling waves did I ever see—no, not even in No Man's Land!

There's a path which zig-zags down, not far from a shelter on the West Cliff Walk. The girl, with Petro not far in front but sticking to her side, zig-zagged down it. I held myself in leash till the pair had vanished; then I started in their wake.

I tried to calculate my distance; to keep just far enough behind, and not too far. But the path is sandy, and footsteps make no sound.

As I was padding along like a red Indian on the trail, suddenly two men coming up, bumped into me.

I had been so sure of our loneliness—the Girl's, Petro's and mine—that I was taken by surprise, and stumbled off the path into the rough grass of the cliff.

"Sorry!" said one of the men; and then continued his conversation with his friend. "Yes, might almost be Cap Martin—except for the climate. Glad you brought me here. All the same, give me the Riviera! I'd be at Monte now, if I wasn't sure there's going to be ructions. If there isn't a big strike on the French railways a month or six weeks from now I'll eat my hat! I don't want to be held up even at good old Monte, with food getting low, and—"

The loud voice, whose words the winds blew back to me when the men had passed, ceased at a turn in the path. But for a second, my thoughts unhooked themselves from the girl, and jumped—not to Monte Carlo, but to the picture of Sacha Kapieha's aeroplane there.

"Jove, if I were at Monte, owning that machine and knowing how to run her—and there was a strike—I'd make my fortune and have some fun!" I said to myself.

But I didn't own the machine, and I wasn't at Monte. I was pelting down the West Cliff at Bournemouth trying to keep a girl from putting an end to herself.

I hurried along to atone for lost time, but even a minute's delay was too much. Having run the rest of the way to the beach (with no glimpse of a small, erect head in a close-fitting toque) I came upon what seemed an empty waste of sand.

In which direction had she gone?—right—left?.....There she was, far off to the left of me, not walking or standing—(that's why I'd not seen her at first)—but kneeling close to the water with arms around Petro's neck. Then, before I could take a step she'd sprung to her feet and started towards the sea. Without looking back at the dog she marched right into the white foam, her head high.

If I'd shouted, she would only have moved faster—would have rushed into the surf and thrown herself to the white horses. I kept silent, but I bounded along the stretch of sand between us, as if I wore seven-league boots.

Perhaps, when she knelt by her dog, she said—"Petro dear, stay in this wretched world if you will; or if you won't, come out of it with me." But the bull had already made up his mind. With dignified deliberation he spraddled after her into the icy waves. There was a bulldog! No true bull-dog of British breed was ever known yet to let a loved one die alone if he could die too!

He even leaped resentfully on me, with the hated water at his breast, as I seized the girl round the waist and swung her up, out of the sea. If a wave hadn't knocked him back as he sprang, those teeth of his would have caught my sleeve, but for a moment he was overwhelmed the whole force of nature against him. Recovering, eyes and short nose full of water, he must have heard his mistress cry "You" and my voice answering.

By now, I had her out of the water, still in my arms, dripping wet to the waist. Half swimming, half pushed by the swirl of the water, Petro jumped after me. He knew at least that I was no stranger, and remembered maybe the appeal for help he'd made to me in the hotel.

"How—how dare you interfere?" the girl stammered. "You—you waiter."

"I'm not a waiter," I said. "I never told you I was one. And even a waiter wouldn't let you drown. That 'Ave Caesar' of yours did the trick. I knew."

I set her gently on her feet, but hung onto a firm, though shivering arm, lest she should do some desperate thing before she could be stopped.

"You had no right to follow me!" she sobbed, breaking into tears.

"I'd have had no right not to," I defended myself. "You're very young—"

"My life mayn't be long, but it has come to an end," the girl cut me short. "I have nothing to live for—except, Petro—and you see he was ready to go with me. Do you think I'm afraid of death? No! My family has had many faults. But not fear. I'm Sacha Kapieha's sister!"

CHAPTER VI.

No Flies: By Request

SACHA Kapieha's sister! In my surprise I dropped her arm, but seized it again as she would have run from me.

Sacha Kapieha's sister! The coincidence seemed amazing at first gasp. Yet after all, how was it precisely a "coincidence"? I hadn't known Sacha Kapieha. I'd only known his name, as millions of others knew it. And to-day I'd happened to see a snapshot of his aeroplane in a newspaper. There was nothing much in that, when one came to think of it. But I was thrilled to the heart as if by some magical discovery.

"If you're Sacha Kapieha's sister you've got to live!" I heard myself saying. "I have a plan for you—a perfectly priceless plan."

And it was strange I should have flung these words at her, as if I'd shot them out of a catapult. Because, until that identical second, I hadn't even the ghost of a plan. How it had come to me I didn't know. I felt as if someone had made me speak, and now had pushed the Plan ready made, into my head. Anyhow, there it was, like Minerva fully armed, born from the brain of Jupiter. Still, I felt myself twice the man I had been. I seemed to see the future, and what to do with it.

But of course, there was the present to be dealt with. It was rather pressing. The girl was very wet; and her teeth chattering with cold as she cried.

"I don't know what you mean by a 'plan,'" she shivered. "There isn't any plan—that you can make—for me."

"Oh, isn't there?" I challenged. "I bet you anything there is. A plan for you to get your brother's machine, and—"

THE IDOL OF YOUTH

"My brother's machine is at Monte Carlo, a prize in a lottery for War Orphans," she said. "A maid at the hotel lent me a Sunday illustrated paper—"

"I know it's at Monte Carlo," I snapped. "That's why there's a plan. I'll tell you to-morrow. Now you must let me take you back to the hotel—"

"I shall never go inside its hateful doors again," the girl vetoed that suggestion. "Never."

"But," I protested, "they know you there. You can slip in without being seen, and everything will be the same as if—"

"I can't slip in. I told you, they look up at ten, we should have to ring if I went. But I won't go."

"Where do you want to go, then?" I temporized.

"Nowhere. Back into the sea."

"Beastly cold wet thing! Wouldn't you rather go to Monte Carlo?"

"There's no hope of getting there. And nothing to do if I were there—except beg."

"But I tell you there is hope of getting there. And not begging! Aren't you the 'relative' Kapieha left his Mascot to, in his will?"

"Yes, if I'd claimed it within a year I couldn't claim it. Everything he left had become the property of France. I got to England after dreadful adventures, too late. And oh, you can't guess what it meant—being too late! I should have been rich. I—but it kills me to think of all that! I hoped—I dreamed desperately that I might find some way—I dreamed it until this morning—when I saw the paper—when I knew of the lottery. That decided me—what to do to-night. I saw it was the end."

"Well, now you see it isn't. Or you will see when I explain my plan," I insisted. But suddenly, in the face of her despair—despair over something definite concerning the machine, something which sounded mysterious,—my plan grew blurred in outline. Minerva's armour began to fall off. Half naked, the goddess scuttled back into my brain.

Enthusiasm had carried me off my feet. I had felt that, with so good a root for an idea, the plan must burst into brilliant flower. I had thought that, if the Mascot had been left to Sacha's sister, and here was the sister, why, the whole problem was simplified. But there was truth in her contention. The allotted time for the legacy had indeed passed. If the plane had remained unsold, a claim—if she had put one in—might have been allowed. Now, circumstances had changed. The Administration at Monte Carlo had bought the machine for a large sum. They had announced it as second prize in a charitable lottery of national importance. The advertisement was world wide. The public must not be cheated, nor must the War Orphans. As the girl said, it was too late. Nothing could be done in the way I had so suddenly planned. Still—

Still, I wouldn't give in. I might as well hold the girl's head under water, and Petro's too, as confess that my plan had collapsed. She appeared to have no hope. Yet I felt that I had communicated some faint answering thrill of mine to her. It was there, subconsciously, I would go on buoying her up. And I'd build a better plan on the wreck of the first.

"There's another hotel where I could take you," I said. "A very nice hotel. The hotel where I got the caviare."

"Didn't you get it in ours?" faintly intrigued, she wanted to know.

"I did not," I said. "Would you expect ours to run to it?"

"No," the girl admitted, shivering more than ever. "You seem to be a strange man. Why did you come to my room, and go out to other hotels to get my caviare?"

"Only to one hotel. And I came to your room because I wanted to see what you were like. That's all I'll tell you at present, except that I've been brought up by a most respectable aunt, and my name's Christopher Malet. Now, come along. I could carry you. But, you'd better walk, to keep yourself warm."

"Why should I come because you tell me to come?" she resisted. "I do not know you."

"Yet you trust me," I said. "Instinct tells you that you can; just as Petro's does him, though he hasn't been introduced. Come!"

She came. And soon, as we reached the path with its stiff climb, she was leaning on my arm, dragged down by the weight of her wet dress—the One Dress!

As we walked, I thought. I thought volcanically. I had proposed the Bathcombe Hotel to the girl, because I'd been forced to propose something, and a vague vision of Tiedelman's had floated through my mind. But facing facts. I saw that even a Head Waiter has limitations, outside his own domain. He might not be able to secure a room for a dripping young woman and a soaked bull-dog, at a moment's notice, in the height of the season, on a Sunday night. Perhaps, to call upon him privately, ought I not to go to a back door....I could not escort Miss Kapieha to a back door. What then, to do? We were drawing nearer to the Bathcombe with every step we took.

Once in France a Canadian said to me, "There may be flies on you, Malet, but they ain't dusty flies."

I remembered that now. I remembered that now. I remembered, because Mr. Horden had paid me a similar compliment. And at this instant I had snatched at an idea connected with him.

We arrived at the hotel. We'd had a hard walk, and Miss Kapieha was less conspicuously wet. Still, the hall porter looked hard at her and at Petro—glued to her side. Before the man could open his lips I swaggered out: "We've come to see Mr. Henry S. Horden. Give me a bit of paper, please, and I'll write a note. Then we'll wait while you send it up to his private sitting-room."

The name of "Horden" was a potent charm. Few people were about, and the girl could sink into a chair without being stared at. I scrawled a few lines: "Dear Mr. Horden. You invited me to breakfast at 9.30 to-morrow morning, to tell you the next chapter of a serial story entitled 'The Girl with the One Dress.' At 10.30 to-night I bring the heroine of the story instead of to-morrow's chapter. She's half drowned. So is her dog. I don't know what to do with them. Will you advise me? Yours, Christopher Malet."

"P.S. She's Sacha Kapieha's sister." "Have you a friend in the management of this hotel?" Miss Kapieha asked.

"Better than that," said I. "Someone rich enough to buy the management?" Still I wasn't as confident as I sounded. Mr. Horden might be in bed. Some men are cross if waked when they have gone to bed.

CHAPTER VII.

Something About Pearls.

HENRY S. Horden had not gone to bed.

"The gentleman says 'Come right up with the young lady and her dog,' was the message which ended my suspense. Two minutes later all three of us arrived at No. 12 to find the door open and Mr. Horden on the threshold.

"Your P. S. alone would have hit me where I live," he said. "Who told you I was interested in Sacha Kapieha?"

"Nobody told me," I replied. "I suppose it's another coincidence. Let me introduce his sister."

Which Is Most Important To You What Goes into a Can of Paint or What Comes Out of It?

A long time ago, Lowe Brothers found out that six different ingredients had to be used in making High Standard Paint, if their customers were to get the satisfaction and lastingness out of every can that they had a right to expect.

They found out, also, that a different mixing and grinding process had to be employed.

You're not particularly interested in the manufacturing details, but you do want satisfaction and lastingness in paint.

That is what Lowe Brothers put into every can of High Standard. Send ten cents for "The Happy Happenings"—a book that contains much dearly-bought experience in painting.

emptied two of the sacks and counted the amount of the deficit in gold of large denomination, making the necessary change from the bottom.

The book-keeper eyed him narrowly during the process, then reached over, and, sliding each of the little piles for examination in his hand, put the money in his clothes. A strange sigh of relief broke from him.

He backed toward the door, still covering the other with the revolver.

"If you're wise you'll not try to make any fuss about this," he warned. "The Company's officers on board the 'gin-tank' in the bay would like nothing better than to take you back to England." He ended up, a terrible impulse of hate and retaliation sweeping over him: "Good God, but I'd like to shoot you!"

He closed the door, and, outside, took to his heels nervously and ran. When he reached the house of the engineer he was puffing for breath. This time he did notice the hand the white figure on the verandah again waved at him, and turned up the walk.

"Can you tell me," he asked hurriedly, without waiting to introduce himself, "when the next boat will be touching here for the Niger, the Royal Sokoto Company?"

"In about three days."

"Three days!" The book-keeper's tone carried a sort of anguish.

The engineer had risen and was smiling down at him out of his keen, middle-aged face.

"Why not be my guest," he suggested pleasantly, "till you can make the trip? We are mouldy for company here."

The book-keeper paused frowning in thought; then turned suddenly and walked up the verandah steps, meeting the other's extended hand.

"Thank you, I think I will," he said.

It was two weeks before Gridley reached Ajaba again and the Agent-General. Through an urgent explanation to the agent at the delta compound, he had managed luckily to ship up river with the first party. During this time the new self that had come to him so suddenly had gone on developing. His manner showed flint-like determination, his bearing bristled a little as with his attack on life. It was still an effort with him but he was at last master of himself. Formerly he would have waited for presentation to the Agent-General—now he walked in on him unannounced. Without saying a word he handed over Walker's written statement and the amount of the deficit. Only when the Agent-General came to an understanding of the business, and leaned back in his chair, did he speak.

"I want one more chance to make good," he said. "Will you give it to me?"

The big man rapped his knuckles tentatively on the table still eyeing him. "What I cannot understand, he questioned, after a rather lengthy interval, 'is the change in you—your ability to get this.' He signified Walker's written statement.

The book-keeper flushed painfully. "There's a girl—a girl back in London," he articulated. "I had almost forgotten about her—didn't realize what she could be to me—till I was going back in disgrace. Maybe it was that I never had a chance before to quite know myself." He reverted instantly, his hands clenching themselves. "I made him give it to me—I held him up for it. If he hadn't I'd have shot him cold."

"But the girl," suggested the Agent-General. "Does she know?"

The book-keeper straightened himself tensely. "I am going to write to her—if you will give me another chance."

The Agent-General paused, apparently considering the matter. He paused so long that the book-keeper took to pacing up and down the floor nervously. Then he arose impulsively and extended his hand. "I really believe you're worth it, Gridley," he averred, "and I'll do it. There's a relief wanted at Saba and I'll send you there. The post is more important than Oroko and you will find yourself better situated."

WITCH HAZEL

ideally situated, represented years of loving toil.

"The very day we find water I'll close the bargain," he mused, "And we will find it—we must!"

After having been shown all over the place he said, "I like the look of it very much, Mr. Moore, but I can't be sure of raising the amount for a few days or maybe a couple of weeks. In the meantime, if you get an offer will you promise to give me the first chance?"

For ten more days, broken only by the interval of Sunday, the unmusical clangour rang out on the parched and heated air. Fifty feet—sixty feet—seventy feet—and still no sign of water. Weary and disconsolate, Ross sought Hazel in the garden. "Girlie, I'm afraid I'll have to give it up," he sighed.

"Oh, no! Not yet, Ross! Try it for another day."

"But it's costing too high, Hazel. You know I haven't any faith in that hazel wand, anyway."

Three times Ross was ready to give up, and three times was spurred on again by the unfailing faith and confidence of Hazel.

At last there was a cry of "Water!" Ross flung himself down on the ground and leaned in tense excitement over the deep, dark hole. Yes, there could be no mistake about it. Very distinctly he heard the murmur of trickling water, bubbling musically up as if from a fountain. They had tapped a hidden spring away down there in the rock.

After partaking of a sumptuous tea which Mrs. Temple set out on the lawn, Ross took Hazel out for a "joy ride." They turned in at the gate of the dove-grey house on the hillside.

"The people here are friends of mine," he explained; "I want you to meet them."

"Oh, I have met them, Ross, a year ago."

He laughed lightly. "I thought as much. Aren't they dear?"

They had, at the request of Ross, been piloted all over the house and grounds, had been cordially pressed to partake of angel cake and lemonade, and now stood together in the bower of rose and clematis, watching the sun sink in gold and crimson splendor into the lake.

He passed his arm around her waist, drew her close and looked into her flushed face. "Well, little Witch Hazel," he whispered, "how would you like to exchange your city office for this?"

"Oh, Ross! We mustn't think of anything so wildly impossible. I'll be content with the little home you are going to build. You'll start it soon now, won't you?"

In a passion of joy he pressed his lips to hers that quivered ever so slightly. "Sweetheart, sweetheart, this is our home—our home of dreams come true."

HOW I EARN MONEY AT HOME

AND IN THIS WAY MAKE UP FOR HENRY'S SHRINKING SALARY

Every Wife or Self-Supporting Girl Can Use Extra Money for Clothes. Thousands are Now Making it Themselves—Right at Home—In This New Way

By MARY WALDEN

"MY DEAR, you should have seen her at church this morning. She looked positively 'dowdy.' It's a shame! Mary used to be such a well-dressed girl until she married that bank-clerk. I should think he'd feel like—"

"Sh-h-h! She's on this car. Over behind you. She might hear."

The street car was crowded and they hadn't noticed me before, but I had heard and my face flushed red with resentment and shame. It was true — I did look "dowdy"—and I knew it. There is nothing quite so depressing to a woman as an old hat and old clothes on a bright Sunday morning in Springtime.

I got off the street car at the next corner and walked the remaining blocks to my home—and Henry. My cup of bitterness had spilled over, and I needed a few minutes to choke back the tears that wanted to run down my burning cheeks.

I didn't want to make Henry feel worse than he did already about our money situation. My husband is one of the "white-collar men" whose salaries haven't kept pace with the mounting cost of living. I had been a private secretary, earning a comfortable living for myself when we had married, and since the cost of everything had kept rising higher and higher I had sometimes hinted to Henry that I would be glad to take a position again, but he had always vetoed the idea strenuously. Henry was "old-fashioned," and proud. His wife should never have to "go to work"—so I had gone on skimping and scraping — and wearing "made-overs."

But the bitter experience of this Sunday morning was too much. I resolved as I walked homeward, that, Henry or no Henry, I was going to find a way to make extra money for clothes, and do it, at least until things took a turn for the better.

When I got home I was prepared to be cheerful as usual, but Henry was comfortably smoking and absorbed in his Sunday paper, and his contentment somehow irritated me terribly. To make matters worse he held up the magazine picture section of the paper as I came into the room, and remarked that he had never seen the girls wear "such good-looking duds as they do this year."

Henry is really a perfect dear and adores me, but he should have had more sense. He sometimes shows no more comprehension of a woman's pride than a care-free Airedale puppy. I lost my temper, snatched the paper from him, and cried:

"If you like to see nice clothes so much, why don't you buy your wife some of them?"

Then I rushed to my room, still carrying the Magazine Section of the paper, shut the door, and threw myself across the bed for a good cry. Henry came and knocked and spoke to me, but I wouldn't let him in.

After a while I sat up and idly began to turn the pages of the paper I had taken away from Henry. All of a sudden I sat up straighter and gasped. A woman was looking out of the page at me, holding a bank cheque in her hand, and across the top of the page were the words, "How I Make Money—Right at Home!"

I devoured every word of the advertisement. When I had finished I felt that I had found the work I was looking for. I resolved to write for the particulars, but to keep it a secret from my husband. After a while I went out and made up with him, got dinner ready, and we had a happy afternoon together. That night I mailed the coupon from the advertisement to the Auto Knitter Hosiery Co.

"It helped us over the hard spots by turning spare hours into dollars."

To make my story short, I found their prospectus so convincing and reasonable that I sent for and received an Auto Knitting outfit, including the wonderful little machine, the Auto Knitter.

I kept the machine in the bottom drawer of my bureau while Henry was in the house. While he was at the bank I used it every minute I could spare from my housework. At the end of a month I sent my first shipment of soft, warm, well knit wool socks to the company. By return mail came my first cheque—and oh joy! the thrill of the sight of that first cheque.

Well, I kept on making socks, sending regular shipments to the company, and before very long I presented myself before Henry in the pretty new accordeon-pleated frock that I had seen advertised in Taylor and Park's sale announcement in the papers.

His mouth opened and he just stared at me in admiration, without a word. Finally he managed to say:

"Where did you get it, Mary?"

"I earned it!" I replied brightly, not sure just how he would take the news.

Henry looked for a minute as if I had said I had stolen it. Then I made him sit down and hear what I had to say.

"Now listen, dear," I said, gently, but firmly, "don't you think it is perfectly ridiculous of us to pretend that you earn enough money—just now? You will, of course, in time—but while things are so expensive, and your salary doesn't keep pace, isn't it fine that I can make this money for the clothes I need, and the little pleasures and necessities we couldn't afford otherwise?"

Then I made my final attack upon Henry's old-fashioned idea that "my wife doesn't have to work."

"You know as well as I do," I said, "that it is the middle class people who are having the struggle nowadays. Everybody knows it. Look at the married women who have taken business positions to help out their husbands! Nobody thinks the worse of them for it. Isn't my plan for making money in spare time at home, without neglecting you or little Helen better than taking a position? Why, nobody needs to know a thing about it!"

That fetched Henry, as I was sure it would. He said:

"Well, you've been a 'contrary Mary'—but I guess you're right. Let's see how you do it?"

So I took the light, portable Auto Knitter out of the bureau drawer, quickly clamped it to the table, and showed Henry how it worked. I had had enough practice by that time so that I made a pair of socks so quickly that Henry's eyes nearly popped out of his head.

"And you say the Auto Knitter Hosiery Company buys the socks from you?" he asked.

"Yes," I said, "They guarantee to always take every standard pair I make at a guaranteed price. And they pay the transportation charges on ten dozen pairs or over, besides sending me the yarn to replace the amount used for the socks I have sent them. So you see the yarn hasn't cost me anything since the first lot."

Henry was certainly astonished, and when he saw how fascinating the work was he said he had no objection to my continuing it. So I kept on Auto Knitting, sending the socks I made to the Auto Knitting Company and getting my cheques back promptly for every shipment.

The result was that I didn't have to go without many of the things I needed for myself or little Helen last Fall and Winter and the Auto Knitter again helped to solve the clothes problem the following Spring and Summer.

All this without being obliged to touch a cent of what I call the "family money"—the money that Henry makes. He is succeeding much better now, but I still use the Auto Knitter regularly—sometimes making socks to send to Toronto, sometimes making them to sell to friends who have seen the strong, warm, long wearing Auto Knitter Hosiery and want some of it, and sometimes to make warm little knitted things for my little girl to wear.

A few evenings ago little Helen was riding on Henry's foot and she asked him to sing "a tune" for her, so he made this up, while he looked teasingly at me:

"Mary, Mary, quite contrary,
How does your income grow?"

By Auto Knitting hosiery,
And woolen socks all in a row!"

Henry hasn't forgotten that I took up Auto Knitting without asking his advice, but he is glad now that I did, for it helped us over the hard spots by turning spare hours into dollars.

Whenever I hear a woman complaining about the high cost of living and clothes, I always try to tell her how the Auto Knitter Company, an old, firmly established Canadian corporation, has an enormous market for good, honest, old-time wool socks, made by hand on the Auto Knitters of their home workers. Then I tell her, just as I am telling you, that the Auto Knitter Company will make a contract with each owner of a machine to pay her a liberal, guaranteed wage, on a piece-work basis.

This contract leaves you perfectly free—you can work for them as much as you want, or as little—spare time or full time—or not at all—yet for every shipment of socks you send them you get your cheque—promptly.

You are, of course, at liberty to dispose of the output of your Auto Knitter as you see fit, and you can also use the Auto Knitter to make, at a remarkably low cost, all the hosiery your family needs.

But remember this: There are absolutely no strings tied to the Wage Agreement; it is a straight out-and-out agreement to pay you a Fixed Wage on a piece-work basis—a good return for your services.

No matter where you live I feel sure that you want to know all about the machine that has meant so much to me. By all means write to the Auto Knitter (Canada) Company, Dept. 434, 1870 Davenport Road, West Toronto, at once, and find out about the pleasant occupation waiting for you—Auto Knitting. Find out what substantial amounts even a part of your spare time will earn for you.

I can never be thankful enough that I didn't put off writing for information about it that Sunday evening when I took the paper away from Henry, and opened it later at the Auto Knitter advertisement.

You will never regret writing for it, either. Send your name and address now and find out all the good things that are in store for you.

THE IDOL OF YOUTH

Mr. Horden wasn't (and isn't) what newspapers call a 'society man.' He didn't politely bow and smile at the girl, or murmur, "Pleased to meet you," as some of his countryfolk do. He stood aside, inviting us in with a gesture, pinned his keen grey gaze on Miss Kapieha, and said sharply, "Did you know who it was that wanted to buy the pearls from your brother?"

"No," she answered. "Was it you?" "It was," he admitted. "I didn't get 'em though! Nobody got 'em so as I've heard. But come along in, both of you—and the dog. Gee! that's a fine animal—live illustration of what your Winston Churchill said when the war broke out."

"What did he say?" I enquired, as we filed moistly into the smart green and gold sitting-room.

"Great speech it was! Said 'Providence has so formed the nose of the British bull-dog that he can breathe while he holds on'; or words to that effect."

Miss Kapieha's eyes brightened at the praise of her dog. She looked more alive. "Petro flew many times with Sacha," she informed Horden. "He barked at the German planes. He was wounded more than once. But the last time was so bad, Sacha sent him back to the man who bred him, at Corfe Castle, not far from here."

"Great fellow, Petro!" grunted Horden, patting the formidable head of the bull who had barked at German aeroplanes while they spit fire of death. "He doesn't bark at Americans, it seems."

"Of course not. He barks at enemies!" said the girl. "Because bulldogs have those faces like fearful pansies, people don't realise that they're more angels than dogs. Their whole life is love."

Horden and I laughed. Who could have helped it, looking at Petro's mug? The girl laughed too—at herself. And that laugh did her good. It brought her one more step back to human life.

The lights of the room were becomingly shaded; but they showed Horden a wet, wan young thing, who had reluctantly exchanged a watery grave for a visit to him. Yet she could laugh! I saw a sudden gleam of admiration for her in the man's sharp eyes.

"What's this boy told you about me?" he launched at her.

"Nothing," said Miss Kapieha. "Except that you could buy the management of your hotel."

He grinned. "Didn't mention my sending you some caviare and champagne?"

"No. But thank you very much. They were nice!"

"I'd like to do a lot more than that," said he. "For you, because you're Kapieha's sister, and a damed plucky girl. For your dog, because he barked at the Germans and not at Henry S. Horden. My old friend Malet (he threw me a twinkle) says you've had bothers. Folks at your hotel not got wit to see you through 'em, and trust you to do the fair thing in the end. Well, well! he's brought you to just the right place. I'll see you through your worries. You tell me what you want, and I bet you get it."

The girl's delicate, low drawn brows drew together. She looked haughty rather than grateful. Already I'd learned that she wasn't easy to help!

"But why should you do things for me?" she questioned. "Why should either of you do things for me? Were you Sacha's friends? No! I think not. You would have told me so, first of all. I don't understand."

"I didn't—er—exactly know Kapieha," I confessed. "But I admired him. Every one admired him, and Mr. Horden—"

"I knew your brother," Horden said. "Not well, personally. We met in a business way. He'd been let down by some foreign fellows who'd formed a sort of amateur syndicate to finance him, when he wanted to build an aeroplane at his own expense, and show the French Government what his invention could do. (I suppose you're aware that neither the English nor the French had been properly impressed with his model and specifications?)

"Well! Anyhow these syndicate chaps didn't stump up more than half the promised money, and I guess Kapieha was at his wit's end for oof. He heard from a mutual friend of ours in Paris that I was on the lookout for a rope of good pearls. (This was August 1914, you understand). And he let me know he had some pearls to sell. The trouble was, the things weren't in Paris, but he was sending a messenger to fetch 'em from wherever they were—"

"They were in Wilna, and I was the messenger from Paris," the girl broke in. "The pearls were mine, you see—mine on my sixteenth birthday, which was coming in September 1914. They belonged to my dear American mother, whom I just remember. She thought I would finish school and come out in society at sixteen, as she had done; so she left me her pearls for my first grown up birthday—and a few other jewels. But the pearls being mine was the same as if they were Sacha's. He was only my half brother, but I worshipped him. I would have done anything on earth he asked me to do—"

"I should think so, if you went to Wilna from Paris for him, in the midst of the war, when you weren't sixteen!" I blurted out before I stopped to think. "How you got to Wilna I can't think."

"I did get there, and Petro with me," said Miss Kapieha. "Part of the way we went by air. Sacha had taught me to fly—oh, when I was a child, before he brought me to school in Paris. And that summer in my holidays I acted as his pilot more than once. He trusted me. It was getting away from Wilna that was too much! Sacha had thought I would manage it before the Germans could reach there. But I had difficulties. I found I should be too late to escape, so Petro carried the pearls back to Sacha."

"Petro! the dog?" Horden and I exclaimed together.

"But yes, the rope was hidden inside a special collar, made on purpose. I was ill—too ill to travel. I had had an accident. What use of talking of that? It isn't interesting! An air-man took Petro for me. They got away just in time. I knew Petro reached Paris safely, because of an advertisement Sacha put into a newspaper—perhaps in many newspapers. One came to me after months, in Wilna, as he had hoped it would come. I'd always been expecting to hear in that way, for we had arranged what to do if I were caught. But in the advertisement there was nothing about the pearls. I never knew what happened to them, though perhaps I can guess, if you didn't get them—if they seem to have disappeared."

"You can guess?" "Say. That's mighty interesting! What do you guess?" Horden challenged her.

"I guess—the girl echoed—"One of two things."

"Well, what two things? Better chuck 'em both off your chest."

Miss Kapieha shook her head. "I must not do that. They are—secrets of my brother's."

Horden glared for an instant, under a quick frown. I imagined that he was seldom thwarted. Suddenly, however, his face cleared. He shrugged his shoulders and grinned engagingly.

"Secrets from strangers, you mean?" he interrupted the blunt refusal. "You're quite right. But when we know each other better—"

The girl swept the amendment aside. "If you are being kind because you want me to tell what I think has become of the pearls," she flung at him, "you had better let Petro and me go now—back where we came from."

"A Boy in a Dream"

So speaking, there was on the small white face defying Henry S. Horden a fixed and fatal look.

"Shucks!" was his answer. And it puzzled her.

"I speak English like my own language," she said, "I spoke it at home in Wilna. I spoke it in Paris—when they would let me. But that word, I do not know it. 'Shucks!'"

"Shucks" can mean any one of several things," Horden explained dryly. "This time it means: 'if you believe I offer you my help for what I can get out of you, why you're up the wrong tree with both feet, and you're not so darned smart as you look.' As I told you before, I want to help you because you're Kapieha's sister, and Kapieha was a hero. I don't bear him any grudge because he got some of my money and I got none of his pearls—or yours. My blood was on my own head. I gave him an advance, and then I crossed over to America on business before the pearls (which were to pay me) could come to Paris. I was kept at home for a while, and when I reached France again Kapieha had been killed."

"The pearls were to pay you for an advance?" the girl broke in. "I didn't know Sacha had had an advance."

"He had," said Horden. "But that's of no importance. Fortune of War!"

"Still—if they could be found, the pearls are yours?"

"Not if they are yours."

"I gave them to Sacha. Oh! it is a debt! It must be paid. There would have been a way, if only—if only I could have got his aeroplane."

"I haven't told Mr. Horden about that, or about my plan yet," I put in my oar. "But I'm going to tell him, if you don't mind."

"Your plan—for what?" Horden turned on me.

"For getting hold of Kapieha's machine, which ought to have been his sister's if—"

"If she'd turned up before a certain time. I've read about all that, and where the machine is now. At Monte Carlo."

"That's where I want to go—where I want Miss Kapieha to go too!" I explained. And my blood was in my face—for by now I'd got my second plan—as a tired man gets his second wind.

"Sounds a bit like a wild goose chase, as Kapieha's plane is turned into a prize for a lottery," grumbled Horden. "But you're no wild goose! I've sensed that much already; and we'll talk over any ideas you've hatched. As for you, young lady, I'm going to look after you, whether you like it or not. I'm old enough to be your father, and my name sounds pretty good in both hemispheres, so you needn't set your dog at me! Now show a little of your brother's common-sense, and don't be a baby doll. How would getting the aeroplane help you to get the pearls?"

"It is not necessary to tell you that. But it would help. Almost surely it would help."

"Humph!" said Horden. "Pity all round you can't get it then."

"Maybe she can," I chimed in once more. "I think I see a way."

The American gazed at me, whether scornfully, or whimsically, I wasn't quite sure.

"You would!" he chortled. "But meanwhile Miss Kapieha's sopping wet."

This reminder jerked me back from Monte Carlo to Bournemouth. I realised that I too was at least damp.

We had to think of the present.

There was the night to be faced.

What, at this hour, was to be done with Miss Kapieha? to say nothing of her dog?

IT SOUNDED a large order. But that is what men like Horden are for: to wave their million-dollar wands and make jump things too heavy for humbler folk to lift.

The weightiest bulk of this order was Petro, for dogs weren't admitted as paying guests at the Bathcombe. As for the girl, though a slip of a creature, she couldn't be hung on a hook to dry; and the hotel was crammed. Henry S. Horden, however, if not a king outside his own country, had the royal suite. Several queens and one kaiser had stayed in it. He sent for the manager and parleyed with him in the vestibule. What passed between the two I don't know. I didn't even wonder what was passing, for those moments of Horden's absence seemed to be the most important of my life.

Why should the sight of a pale-faced slip of a girl shivering over a fire cause a man to feel acute agonies—of love? Absurd! But so it was with me.

I'd been caught by a waiter's description of her—and her one dress. I'd been bewitched by the first glance from her green-grey eyes, by the pallor of her small face, and by the glory of her hair. Later, I'd fallen actively in love as she walked out into the night without a cloak, to die. That was a good deal to happen to a man in the course of a few hours. But it was nothing to the havoc made of me when she darted to the fire, as Horden's back was turned. Just to watch her kneel before it, trembling, and holding out her bits of hands to the blaze, turned a screw in my heart.

She'd been too proud to show Horden that she suffered. He was the official benefactor dominating the situation. He had the power to heap expensive luxuries upon her; and she wouldn't let him see her need of the cheapest and nearest. But me she didn't mind. We were both young. Between us there was already a bond. The thought that this was dimly in her mind touched and flattered me beyond anything I'd ever known. The girl looked so young, so frail, yet so indomitable, that I could have crushed her in my arms and shed large tears upon her head.

As the door-handle turned she sprang up like a pigeon shot out of a trap, and stood erect to face her host.

"It's all right about a room for you, Miss Kapieha," he announced. "If not, I'd have given you this suite—wouldn't have taken a 'no,' though you don't like what you call favours. This ain't a favour. I've got a hunch you'll be able someday to pay me twice over. What do you think of that, Malet?"

"I agree," said I, my plan developing from a baby into a giant.

A housekeeperly person came and led Miss Kapieha away, Petro following. The girl threw me a look for goodbye, and the shadow of a smile.

"Say, if I was a few years younger, and a bachelor instead of a grass widower, she could have me and all I own," Horden informed the closing door. "What about you, my budding St. George?"

"If she had me, she wouldn't have much. If she had what I owned, she'd have nothing at all; at present," I answered. "As for the future—"

"Now we're coming to business! I believe you said something about a plan?"

Out it all came: an avalanche of words. I tried to calculate them and their effect, to control them neatly. I couldn't! My excitement lit no answering fire. Horden heard me through coolly, and when I stopped he laughed.

"Gee! Why have I been treating you like a grown-up man, when you're nothing but a kid?" he wanted to know. "Wild goose chase" was the expression or even a material carrying a third stripe of tan: for stripes do not rank as patterns. In the same room, therefore, a patterned surface can successfully be employed in combination with a striped surface, whether paper or fabric.

To turn now more especially to the choice of a wall-treatment for the dining room, we find that, in addition to the patterned paper, there are available many plain-effect papers of interesting weave: granite, stippled, putty, oatmeal and grasscloth, to name but a few. These are always most attractive when carried to the ceiling and finished there under a wood-moulding in place of the conventional border. There are also a number of beautiful fabrics, such as Japanese grass cloth, canvas and burlap, that are not excessive in cost. Of these, canvas is particularly useful as a background for wall-paneling formed by wood-mouldings, as it both takes and holds paint satisfactorily.

Paneled walls can be adapted to almost any type of dining room furniture. For the more delicate types—the Chippendale or Hepplewhite, for example, developed in walnut or mahogany—the paneling should be light in coloring and fine in detail: but for the more robust types which we associate with oak construction—the Jacobean or the William and Mary, say—the walls should be paneled either in oak or some other hardwood that can be finished to match the furniture.

Uncovered walls, either of smooth or stucco finish, can, however, be used to good effect. The smooth-plastered wall provides a splendid surface for the flat-finish paints that may be obtained in a wide range of tints. Although the walls of stucco are very often tinted or painted, they are delightful in their natural grayish hue in a dining room which enjoys sufficient sunlight. In one sunny dining room, walls of the gray stucco furnish almost a perfect background for the furniture, which is painted a glowing orange, relieved with fine lines of dark blue. A plain dark blue rug is used in this room; and at the windows are hung curtains of printed linen, patterned in orange, gray and blue on an oyster-white ground. The room is cheerful by day; and, after night has fallen, the radiance of parchment-shaded lights illuminates it.

Light-obscuring window-hangings have no legitimate place in the modern dining room. Over-draperies, of course, add to the decorative effect of any room: but they should always be so arranged that they will not unduly impede the entrance of light. The glass-curtains, whether straight-hanging or side-looped, should be made of the sheerest material, in order that they will not darken the room to which they are affording privacy.

There should be a little niche in every dining room for the green growing things of Nature. A flower-bay is, perhaps, the ideal means of introducing greenery: but, failing that, flower-boxes are always suitable, because they can be obtained in various styles, sizes and materials to respond to almost any individual taste or requirement.

And now a word as to the lighting of dining rooms—for that is a very important concern. Fortunately, the hideous dome has departed with its oft-times disconcerting glare and its unbecoming glow. In its stead, has come the subdued radiance of softly-shaded lights distributed around the room, supplemented during the dinner-hour by the quiet illumination of artistically-arranged candles upon the table, and, occasionally, also by a silk-shaded central fixture, hung high enough above the table to cast no direct rays into the eyes of the diners.

'Tis said—and said truly—that laughter promotes digestion. Laughter is but the outward expression of an inward cheerfulness—and can cheerfulness not be created by fellowship with a goodly dining room, well-proportioned, artistically furnished and agreeably lighted

THE HEALTH STOCK-TAKING

WHAT do you think of yourself? In other words, what do you think of your general health? Is it satisfactory to you?

The average man does not think of it at all unless he is compelled to do so. Nature sends him a valuable and kindly warning in the shape of a head-ache or a sore throat and perhaps he rests for a day or two or takes a walk in the country or smokes a little less. And then the Average Man goes on again until the next time. But Nature does not always send a warning and she sometimes feels that a second warning is not required of her. In any case, the warning usually stops in one way or another before the collapse comes.

People who can take warning and learn by experience are likely to have pretty good health. They know that a head-ache has a cause. It means something. What does it mean?

All we Doctors ever do is to help Nature a little. We listen to her voice, translate her language, interpret her warnings, give her the needed supplies for carrying on her work, or tell the patient where to get these supplies and what to do with them.

In civilized countries, no one who has not spent years in hard and adequate study and preparation for professional medical responsibilities is allowed to attend the sick and advise as to matters of health and disease. It is not to protect the patient, but to protect the public, that doctors are required, before practising, to obtain a licence of qualification as physicians and surgeons. It may be from one of these helpers of Nature that the warning comes.

THE MEDICAL STAFF

Many business institutions have a Medical Staff. The large Life Insurance Companies find medical advisers indispensable in the conduct of their affairs. The Average Man, quite rightly, when he is married, or before, realizes that he must make some proper provision for those who would lose their breadwinner if he died.

LIFE INSURANCE

So he goes to a Life Insurance company, or, more likely, the Insurance Agent comes to him and persuades him, and shepherds him to the Doctor's door, and there leaves him to undergo the medical examination for it is against the rules for the agent or anyone else to be present on that occasion. The medical examination must be made in private.

And it is not every doctor who may make this examination. The higher the standing of the Insurance Company, the more difficult it is to obtain a position on their list of Examining Physicians. The Medical Director of any good Insurance Company is usually one of the leaders of the Medical profession. And he needs to be, for he has many difficult questions to answer, and many riddles to read.

The professional and personal reputation of a doctor is worth more than gold. Personal rectitude of character and intention preserves us, in all walks of life, from the assault of many temptations, and in no vocation is this more true than in medicine. There is little danger that the upright, learned, honourable, scrupulously truthful physician, acting in the interests of his employers, the Insurance Company, who are about to lend and expend their resources, or to withhold them, on his word, will fail to advise the Company in accordance with the facts of the case, and the care and skill which he has brought to bear on these facts.

REJECTED—WHY?

So the man who thought he was the Average Man may not get his insurance. To his disappointment, the Agent tells him that the Medical Examination was not quite satisfactory. Was it his heart?—Probably not. Out of 276 examinations and re-examinations made of the men employed on the Staff of the Department of Health in a large city, the number of men who had bad teeth was five and a half times as large as the number who had bad hearts. More were overweight than underweight and the defects most frequently found were in the nose, throat, eyes, ears and teeth, all of which defects are likely to be improved by treatment. Perhaps among candidates for life insurance, defects in the renal tract and the lungs are the most frequent. The kidneys, the skin, and the lungs do a great deal of the work of the body, and some times they are much overworked because the person who owns them is unwise in eating and drinking, or sleeping or smoking.

A HELPFUL WARNING

But the warning issued by the Life Insurance physician who finds a few "casts" or a little albumen in the urine, (signs that the kidneys are working too hard), is often the means of restoring the candidate to better health again through better habits, and thereby adding many years to his "expectation of life." It is by no means unknown that a second medical examination, after a fair interval, for life insurance, may have a much more favourable result than the first.

A MEDICAL EXAMINATION

Business houses, large corporations, governments, banks, and other leading institutions now usually accept new employees only after a medical examination has been passed. It has been found that this plan results in better work, fewer accidents, less illness, less time lost, "lower labour turnover," and more contentment. Many of the workers just need a little advice. They "Never dreamed of it"—"Thought their eyes were all right," "Never supposed I was drinking too much strong tea"—"Did not think I ate too fast"—"Did not think my bad teeth could give me neuritis."

PERIODICAL RE-EXAMINATIONS

Re-examinations every year or so are equally valuable. Sensible people now-a-days are making it a rule to have a thorough report on their health and physical condition at suitable intervals. They go to the best doctor they can get (usually their own family physician) and he "takes stock" of them and advises them, so that they may keep their good health and fulfil their expectation of life.

How Long Will You Live?

Why Constipation May Shorten Your Life

OVER 750,000 people will die in the United States this year from preventable disease. Yet, experts in the extension of life hold that physical breakdown, disease, even old age and death, are all either preventable or postponable.

'But to prevent or postpone them you must avoid constipation and resulting toxemia. "To no other single cause," writes a distinguished physician, "is it possible to attribute one-tenth as many various and widely diverse disorders."

Take diabetes for example. An eminent specialist whose observation has covered thousands of cases, states: "Constipation is nearly always found present in persons suffering from this malady. It will always be found that constipation existed before the appearance of sugar. The writer has no doubt that chronic constipation is one of the most prolific causes of the rapid increase of diabetes in all civilized communities. The statistics gathered by the United States Census Bureau show a death rate nearly ten times as great as twenty years ago." A serious condition in itself. But truly alarming when you realize that over three-fourths of all disease can be traced directly or indirectly to constipation.

How May Constipation Be Overcome?

How may its recurrence be prevented? Not by the use of laxatives or cathartics, for, writes an eminent authority, "An inestimable amount of injury is done by the use of these intestinal irritants, most of which provide temporary relief only at the expense of permanent injury."

Science has found a newer, better way; a means as simple as Nature itself.

Lubrication

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft. Thus it is easily eliminated. But when you are constipated this natural lubricant is not sufficient to keep it soft.

To find something to take the place of this natural lubricant, leading medical authorities have conducted exhaustive research. They have discovered that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of Nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative, it cannot gripe. It is not a medicine in any sense of the word—and, like pure water, it is harmless.

These facts have led to its adoption in leading hospitals throughout the world for the treatment of constipation.

The lubricating action of Nujol has helped thousands of people to lengthen their days and wonderfully increase their capacity for usefulness, activity and enjoyment of life. Test Nujol yourself. Buy a bottle from your druggist today.

CHAPTER IX.

Uncle Henry.

WE TALKED late, Horden and I, mostly about Kapiha in the past, and Kapiha's sister in the immediate future. About midnight I returned adventurously to my own hotel, tempted by Fate by ringing; and—the rest was silence. This was broken only by the just perceptible sound of my penknife turning the lock of the drawing-room window. When success had crowned this effort, I raised the sash, crawled into the room, and fastened the window again. Shortly after I lay down on my narrow bed, the sound of Aunt Sarah's virtuous slumber piercing my wall, and causing me to ask myself if I'd dreamed the Girl with One dress, her dog, and Henry S. Horden with his caviare.

There was nothing to prove their reality (unless a faint odour of sea-salt about my badly dried clothes) when morning came. Not even when I went downstairs after a cold splash and hasty toilet, at an hour when only cross-faced managers and maids in sweeping caps were visible in hotel halls. My excuse was, to walk before breakfast, a habit I've detested since the war, as it reminds one bleakly of going over the top. But my genuine wish was to catch some word concerning La Mysterieuse.

I caught nothing, however, except dust in my nose from a carpet sweeper. Could I have dreamed of the girl? I had had amazingly vivid dreams, dreams I could hardly believe not to be real. It might be that—But I clung to the theory that no one had noticed Miss P. Smith's outgoing last night. Of course in the case she was supposed to be in her room, meekly awaiting her one meal of the day and the order of execution. By and by it would be time for her meagre tea and toast. Then would come the sensational discovery! Or, would it come earlier, with the arrival of the housekeeper's chief female assistant from the Bathcombe Hotel, according to plan?

I was taking no chances, so my "walk" carried me no farther than the garden, and kept me watching in a wall-eyed way, the two paths by which the house could be entered. It would have been dull round, without the interest of wondering which of the blinded windows was—or had been—Miss Kapiha's. Before I'd tired of this game, the distant clock I had heard last night, while waiting for her, struck eight; and soon after appeared the form of a briskly marching woman. She turned in at the gate, and a blood-hound on her track could no more quickly scent her identity than I did.

Slowly I followed the neat figure, to hear a yawning page asked sharply for the manageress. "Say I'm on business from the Bathcombe," the order shot out when he hesitated, and off the boy ran, for a communication from the Bathcombe to the Boumemouth Homeland was like a message from Buckingham Palace to Hackney Town Hall.

Newspapers had just arrived, and I sought among them for my Aunt's "Morning Post," as an excuse to linger. I hadn't yet unearthed her name when Miss Salt, our manageress, appeared, suspecting a hoax, and armed to punish it.

"Good morning," began the visitor, with an air of high patronage. "I've come to ask you for Miss Smith's bill, and to pay it."

"Miss Smith's bill!" gasped Miss Salt. "Miss P. Smith," the grande dame from the Bathcombe condescended. "She is now staying at our hotel, with (I understand) her uncle."

Table talks

Making Your Table Allowance Go Farther

"I HAVE just so much money each week to spend on my table," a young housekeeper explained to me recently. "Toward the end of the week, particularly if we have been entertaining, I find my allowance diminishing so that I can't afford expensive steaks and chops—yet I always try to set a very nice table. Can't you help me find some really attractive, yet inexpensive, meatless dishes?"

I knew just the recipe she needed, a delicious Salmon and Rice Loaf, molded with Knox Sparkling Gelatine—inexpensive yet attractive and appetite satisfying. She was delighted with it and asked for others which I gave her, explaining how helpful Knox Gelatine can be in making bits of leftover vegetables, fruits, fish and meats into salads and desserts which the most particular housewife would proudly place on her table.

Here is the first recipe I gave her. I will gladly send you the others if you'll write to me for them.

SALMON (OR TUNA FISH) RICE LOAF

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1/2 cupful of cold water 1 teaspoonful salt
1/2 teaspoonful pepper 1 cupful cooked rice
3/4 cupful milk 1 tablespoon melted butter
1 can of salmon (or tuna fish)

Soften gelatine in cold water and dissolve by adding hot milk. Add the seasonings, salmon, (or tuna fish) rice and butter. Pour into a wet mold and let stand until set. This may be served cold on lettuce as a salad or with hot tomato sauce in place of meat at dinner.

Other Meatless Recipes—Free

There are many other inexpensive meat-substitute recipes together with real meat dishes, fruit and vegetable salads, desserts, candies and dainties given in my booklets, "Dainty Desserts" and "Food Economy." Send for them. They are free. Just enclose 4c in stamps to cover postage and mention your grocer's name. Address.

I used a while ago. I expected to eat my words when you came to explain. But there they are as large as life and a bit larger. 'Fraid I can't swallow 'em after all.

"You remarked at the same time that I didn't strike you as being a wild goose," said I. "Are those the only words of the lot you're prepared to eat?"

The man smiled leniently. "You're just a boy in a dream. You dream yourself at Mone Carlo, championing your heroine of romance. You have no money and she has no clothes, but that's no obstacle—in the dream. Your object in making the trip is to obtain her brother's aeroplane. That presents no difficulty either—in the dream. All you have to do is to buy a couple of tickets for the lottery, one for the heroine and one for the hero. Thousands of other folks have been before you and will come after you. They don't count—in the dream. You don't know how to fly. Nearest you ever got to it was driving a tank. But in dreams a caterpillar can turn into a butterfly in fifteen minutes. Son, wake up, this is real life. You ask me what I think of your plan. The answer is 'I don't think!'"

"You didn't think, to begin with, that I'd get your caviare," I reminded him. "Yet I got it all, and half your champagne besides."

"That's so," he granted. "It was quite a stunt. I admired you for that. But this is a rather bigger proposition." "Depends on how you look at it. You'd like Miss Kapiha to win back the aeroplane?"

"I would. That's why I've made a plan too. It's a bit more solid than yours."

"Solid things can't fly as dreams do."

"Gold is solid, but it can darn well fly! and it makes most other things float. But I'm not out to tease you, my boy. You've told me your plan. I'll tell you mine. Early to-morrow morning I shall telegraph the Monsieur Camille Blanc, the President of the S. B. M. at Monte Carlo. I've been there. He knows who I am. I own a big bunch of shares in the Casino. Well! My wire will convey a firm offer to buy Sacha Kapiha's machine for twice what the Administration at Monaco paid the French Government, whatever that sum was. My money can then be used as a prize instead of the aeroplane. That'll be a big advantage to the Charitable object. And the publicity of the deal will be a fine free ad' for Monte. Now it's my turn to ask: 'What do you think of my plan?'"

"Same answer as you gave me: 'I don't think!'"

"Then you must have hot air where your brains ought to be. To win the aeroplane on my plan doesn't depend on one lottery ticket, out of, say twenty or thirty thousand. Only the hero of a movie play could hope to win on those lines."

"All right, try your plan," I grudging.

"There is only one thing against it."

"And what's that?"

"It won't work."

"How, won't work?"

"You'll see to-morrow."

"Want to bet it won't work?"

"I want to like the devil. But I've nothing to bet except myself."

"Speaking of the devil, that's the sort of bet he likes: a man's self as the stake."

"Yes. But he's supposed to make the risk worth while."

Horden guffawed. "I'm his twin brother that way, only, what would I do with you, son, if I won you?"

"I'm a handy chap," I boasted, "worth winning, if I do say it myself."

"You want to bet me your services in any direction I choose, in case I can buy Kapiha's aeroplane?"

"I'd go as far as that—on one condition."

"Chuck the condition off your chest."

"It's this: you can have me to do what you like with in case you win your bet, provided that you engage now if you lose it, to lend me one thousand pounds; I mean five thousand American dollars."

"Ah, you've got your finger on the pulse of the exchange! And you seem to think British labour is worth quite a lot of American paper. Just for curiosity's sake, I'd like to know, if it's permitted to ask, whether you have a specific use for the money, connected with—er—Monte Carlo?"

"It is permitted to ask, sir," said I. "It's part of my plan that Miss Kapiha should go to Monte Carlo, you know, and I want her to go de luxe, as the advertisements put it. Besides, there'll have to be some sort of chaperone, I suppose, as a sop to the people who don't appreciate the full efficiency of bull-dogs. Myself, I don't mind travelling second class. But railway tickets aren't the only ones to be bought. There are lottery tickets, not one or two as you assume, but dozens, —hundreds, all that can be secured first-hand and second-hand, by hook or by crook. Also I've got to learn the business—the flying business—and I've got to learn it jolly quick—intensively, so to speak. That can't be done for nothing."

"It cannot! But why not catch your hare before making elaborate arrangements to cook it? I mean your h'aeroplane!....." That's where you laugh—see?"

"Consider it done. Ha ha! But there's something you don't see. Flying will be a useful accomplishment to have, because if you win the machine with me thrown in, you'll probably wish to utilize your slave as a pilot. I don't somehow see you joy-riding the 'bus yourself."

Horden hooked his sharp grey eyes into mine.

"I'm not on this side the big pond for joy rides on earth or in the air," he remarked. "But aeroplanes aren't as irrelevant to me as you think. Aside from Miss Kapiha's personal interests and my own (which concern the pearls you've heard mentioned) I can do with her brother's machine—and not only for historic interest stuff. Between you and me, my business in Europe is to do a deal in aeroplanes. I'm at the head of an American combine to get hold of at least three hundred million dollars' worth of aircraft. I'm going to buy up all the overplus 'planes, engines, and parts that the British, French and Italian governments can spare now this awful peace has broken out. Don't set your heart on playing for any length of time with Kapiha's 'bus' as you call it, in case I can annex the thing. But you've now satisfied my curiosity, you can have your five thousand dollars on the nail if I lose my bet."

"Thanks," I said. "And you can have me if I lose mine. But if I get your money, I hope it may be no more than a loan. If my whole plan succeeds, I shall soon be able to pay you back."

"Oh, I don't want that—"

"I do. It's part of the plan. The part you didn't give me a chance to tell."

"I'll give it to you now."

"Much obliged. But I've changed my mind. You called me a 'boy in a dream!' Well, I see that I'd be an ass in a nightmare—or anyhow you'd think me one—if I went on till the end."

"All right," shrugged Horden, "suit yourself, not me. But taking everything together it begins to look as if I wouldn't get out of this place to-morrow till sometime after lunch!"

THE IDOL OF YOUTH

Miss Salt looked like Lot's wife. "You must be mistaken," she insisted. "You've come to the wrong place. Our Miss P. Smith is upstairs in bed."

"You'd better send up to make sure," suggested Her Magnificence.

Miss Salt went up to make sure. I think she went two steps at a time.

When she tottered back I had found the newspaper marked "Miss Talbot," and was absorbed in the "Personal" column.

"It's true, the girl's gone," admitted Hackney Town Hall. "She must have left first thing this morning."

"She came to us last night," corrected Buckingham Palace. "Kindly give me the bill, as I'm in a hurry, Miss Smith's uncle, Mr. Henry S. Horden, the great American millionaire, has given me the money to settle it; also a message."

I would have pawned my birthright (if any) to hear that message; and, though the woman looked a cat—a super, cat-show cat hissing at a roof-top tabby, I doted on her.

"Oh! a message!" sniffed Miss Salt, trying not to appear impressed. "And what is that?"

"I think it will be best to pay the bill first."

"I prefer to hear the message."

"Very well, it doesn't matter to me. I know nothing about the matter, but I suppose Miss Smith must have had something to say to her uncle about this—er—place. He's a splendid client, but rather outspoken. The message to you is, that your hotel ought to be sued for cruelty to children and dogs; starving them to death to cheese-pare a shilling. If you'd behaved humanly (those are his words, not mine!) he'd gladly have made you a present of fifty pounds for kindness to his niece and her dog. As it is, I am instructed to examine your bill and see that every penny piece is added up correctly."

At this moment the hotel page toddled towards me to collect papers. Miss Salt became aware of my lurking presence, flushed, snorted with her eyes, and led the enemy to her office.

How the news leaked out I can't tell, but leak out it did. By breakfast time the hotel buzzed with it. Probably maids told each other and passed the word on to guests.

"They say that girl you asked me about yesterday, the Girl with One dress—has sneaked away in the middle of the night," Aunt Sarah informed me, appearing promptly at nine o'clock. "She's supposed to have a millionaire uncle named Horden or something, at the Bathcombe Hotel; but to my idea that story sounds fishy. If it's true, why didn't he come here for her, openly and above board, instead of allowing a niece to creep away mysteriously like that?"

"As for me, I'm not able to believe that there's any such person as this Horden. I never heard of a Horden! If you ask for my opinion, the thing's some sort of a trick; and I shall advise everybody to do as I've already done: search their jewel cases!"

I had not, as it happened, asked her opinion; but it struck me as characteristic, and I wondered what tactics it called for from me. What I wanted to do, was to fly out in fierce defence of the girl. But as to what was wise—ought I to feign bland ignorance? Or should I confess to a little knowledge?

My mind leapt forward into the future—the future as I hoped it might be—and swooped back with an answer to the question.

"There is a Mr. Horden," I said, "and he is an American millionaire. Made a fortune in motor cars. Now he's interested in aeroplanes."

"Dear me!" said Aunt Sarah. "How do you know all this?"

"Most people do know it. Mr. Horden's quite famous. Besides, I met him last night."

"You met him? How was that?"

"I told you about my pal at the Bathcombe. Well! I met Mr. Horden through him. We—er—I spent some time in Horden's private sitting-room."

"Really? What could a man like that find in common with a young boy like you? I presume you talked about the war?"

"That, and other things."

Aunt Sarah became alert. "Did he say anything about this girl?"

"Yes. She—er—blew in while I was there, with a dog. A bull dog."

"A monster! Well?"

"Of course I didn't stop too long after that."

"I'm pleased to learn that you didn't, my dear Chris. What time was it then?"

"I don't quite know."

"Was this hotel shut?"

"Oh, I got in all right."

"I didn't hear you."

(I had heard her; but one doesn't tell everything!)

"I'm glad I didn't wake you, Auntie," I cooed in my best manner.

When she had drunk her first cup of tea, just in time to save her from growing cold, she continued her catechism. Of what age was this Mr. Horden? Was he a gentleman? Was he a millionaire in pounds or only dollars? Did he seem interested in me, and if so, why? Was he likely to help me in a business way?

That last question was the one I wanted to answer! And I replied to it by asking another. "Do you remember, Aunt Sarah, my saying yesterday that I'd like to take up flying, instead of going back into the bank?"

"I do recall that, my boy. And my reply was that I couldn't encourage you in any such wild wish."

"It wouldn't be so wild if I had capital behind me," I said.

"Ah! that would make a difference, naturally, though even then I couldn't fully approve of the air as a pursuit. A young man should be in something solid."

"Some scientists say that other's the only solid thing there is," I murmured.

Aunt Sarah looked shocked. "Free-thinkers, no doubt. The Bible is good enough for me. But do you mean that this American offers to start you in—er—the air business?"

"He may. It isn't quite decided yet. I shall probably hear from him, yes or no, during the day. It depends on the answer he gets to a telegram. But in any case, Auntie, it looks as if I'd be fixed up with Mr. Horden one way or another."

"This is very sudden," she said. "I know so little; I can't tell whether I ought to like the idea or not."

The less she knew, the more she would like it, I thought. But I said nothing at all. I ate enough breakfast to make up for the loss of last night's dinner, or supper; and before I fell into danger again, to my vast relief I was called to the telephone.

"Henry S. Horden speaking," came in well remembered tones along the line. "Come over at once, will you?"

"Surely you've not heard from Monte Carlo already?" I couldn't resist.

"Surely not! This is about Miss—er—my niece."

CHAPTER X.

The Bull in a China Shop.

THE words spurred me. No man ever covered the distance between the worst hotel in Bourne-mouth and the best in less time than I.

"Well; what is it!" I almost gasped, as I entered Horden's sitting-room. (The girl was not there). "Miss Kapielha isn't ill, I hope?" It seemed too bad

SOFT WATER SERVICE in the home

A constant supply of water just as delightfully soft as rain and as sparkling and live as that from a spring can be made a part of your home by installing a "Permutit" water softening system.

This system softens the entire water supply of the home. For drinking and cooking, for bath and laundry, soft water is better, cheaper and far more healthful than just ordinary water.

"Permutit" water softeners are inexpensive, absolutely safe and perfectly simple and economical to operate.

We give the same careful engineering service and attention to domestic installations as to the large systems used in industries, hotels and the best laundries.

We invite correspondence, and gladly furnish full information and estimates on your requirements.

THE RECKONING

for the harsh glare of day, it was nobody's concern but their own.

Two flickering points of light on the verandah of the hotel resolved themselves on our approach into the glowing tips of cigars; and as we mounted the steps Mr. Leigh's voice greeted us with quiet amusement:

"Trust the two of you to forget all your promises about time on a night like this. I'd begun to think you'd fallen over the cliffs."

"Why, daddy—it isn't late!" exclaimed Nona.

"It's later than you've been out of bed for a long time, young lady," was the reply. "Run along now—you should have been asleep this hour past, so make your good-night brief. Ron can come out and smoke with us if he likes—any sleep he loses he'll probably make up in the morning."

My brain was still slightly turned with the magic of the night when I had parted from Nona and stepped out again on to the verandah. Mr. Leigh was sitting on a rustic bench against the wall; and half facing him, slouched comfortably in a low chair was Daniels. The light streaming through a long French window fell clearly upon his face, and by contrast the rest of the moonlit verandah seemed in semi-darkness. Apparently the two had been together all evening—perhaps talking, perhaps sitting and smoking in silence, as we had found them a few minutes past. My perplexity increased. I knew Mr. Leigh as a man who shunned rather than courted the companionship of his fellows; and the thought that he had voluntarily spent a whole evening in the company of a man with whom he could have absolutely nothing in common filled me with amazement.

I sat down at the other end of Mr. Leigh's bench, within a few feet of Daniels' unprepossessing profile, and lit a cigarette. The other two puffed silently at their cigars. I watched the blue haze drifting slowly across the verandah into the open, a gossamer veil against the moonlit lawn; and my thoughts seemed to drift with the smoke. Daniels' thick voice roused me with a start.

"Nice night for a walk," he said.

The tone of his voice, and the smirk that accompanied the words—harmless enough in themselves—made them like a splash of mud against the glowing whiteness of the memories they dissipated. Truly, the man sullied everything he touched. If you had given him the "Song of Solomon" he would have read it with a leer, and gloated over it, pink-faced and sniggering. I felt a hot rage surge up within me; but Mr. Leigh's hand closed gently upon my knee, and I choked back angry words between my teeth. There was an interval of silence, and then Mr. Leigh spoke:

"I'm glad that you and Nona have got over your little tiff," he said. "There are times when you'll have to be a bit patient with her, Ron. Especially when you're married. You'll find that married life is a give and take arrangement far oftener than a bed of roses."

"I know, sir," I answered soberly. "I think my love for Nona is strong enough to stand a much greater strain than an occasional quarrel over nothing in particular."

"I'm glad to hear you say that, my boy," said Mr. Leigh; and for the first time in my memory he addressed me in a tone that was almost affectionate. Usually he avoided any suspicion of emotion under all circumstances. "I've never said so to either of you, but I've always hoped that you two would make a match of it. Your mother, Ron, was one of my greatest friends, and for her sake I've always been rather fond of you—though I don't suppose you ever suspected quite how much. In fact, it was in accordance with her wishes that I've been a sort of unofficial guardian to you. Your father and I were old chums, and for that reason as well your mother looked to me for help in the troubled time after your father—died."

"He was murdered," I said bitterly. "Murdered by a cold-blooded beast that he'd saved from starvation—and it broke my mother's heart."

The butt of Mr. Leigh's cigar described a glowing arc as he tossed it across the verandah. It landed with a slow hiss on the dew-drenched lawn. Daniels puffed stolidly on, staring straight ahead of him. Mr. Leigh's hand still rested on my knee, and its pressure seemed to impart a kindly comradeship. He spoke in a soft voice:

"Yes, I've no doubt that the tragedy was the real cause of her illness—certainly it left her without sufficient stamina to pull through the final crisis. I don't suppose you remember much about your father's death, Ron? That was, what—over twelve years ago. You'd be just a child then."

"I saw him when they brought him home," I answered. "He'd been killed instantly—shot through the head. Mother had had a few people in that evening, and they were just leaving as the ambulance pulled up in front of the door. I heard the commotion and ran to the head of the stairs—I remember I didn't dare go down because I saw a policeman there, and until I realized what had happened I was frightened that he'd come about some mischief or other that I'd been into."

I crushed the butt of my cigarette under my foot. Daniels had taken the cigar from his lips, and his pudgy hands rested on the arms of his chair. In the full light his face seemed oddly strained.

"It's strange that it should have happened so," I continued. "Dad certainly had no intention of going to the office that evening, especially with guests at the house; but he seemed to have a premonition that something was wrong. He kept getting more and more restless, Mother said; and finally he put on his hat and went down town. I suppose he arrived just as that precious secretary of his was making off with the bonds, and the hound shot him down in cold blood."

"His benefactor—the man who had picked him out of the gutter," said Mr. Leigh slowly.

I nodded. "Dad was always doing a good turn to someone," I said. "What a snake that fellow must have been! He had a good position and a comfortable salary; and yet he only waited for the first opportunity to rob the man who trusted him—rob him of everything he possessed."

"It's utterly incredible that a man could do such a thing," said Mr. Leigh. "Hanging would be far too good for him—eh, Daniels?"

* * *

DANIELS was leaning forward in his chair, studying us both with a frowning intentness. At the tone of mockery in the voice that addressed him he gave a great start of enlightenment.

"Leigh, by God!" he cried.

I looked from one to the other in bewilderment. They were staring at each other—Mr. Leigh with a triumphant expression that made his eyes shine in the dim light, Daniels with a great fear written on his countenance. Mr. Leigh nodded slowly.

"The—the beard—" said Daniels weakly. "I didn't know—"

"Of course you didn't." There was a mocking reassurance in the assent. "After all, you never saw a great deal of me—though you were at my house often enough, you cur. And you could hardly be expected to recognize David Graham's son—in fact, I doubt if you ever saw him, and twelve years make a lot of difference in a growing lad. If you'd known, you might not have been quite so much at ease in our society. It's a long time since you murdered David Graham, but some of us have long memories—and so, I've heard, have the police.

I felt suddenly shaken and helpless as the situation dawned on me. I had no will of my own—I seemed to be gripped by a strange external force that held me bound to my seat. I heard Daniels' voice, sharp with fear:

"I didn't murder him! Before God, it was no work of mine!"

"No?" The question expressed polite incredulity. "And yet you left town rather hurriedly, and there is every evidence that you took a considerable sum of money with you—David Graham's money, Daniels, that you were making off with when he caught you."

"It's a lie!" Daniels' face was contorted, his eyes bulging. "Maybe I took the money, and maybe if he'd tried to stop me I would have killed him. But he didn't. I left the office before he arrived, and I—" His voice faltered and stopped, and he slumped back into his chair breathing heavily.

"Just so," said Mr. Leigh calmly. "Subsequent events have, of course, no bearing on the matter. As for this little tale of yours, it's not only extremely thin—it's absurd on the face of it. David Graham was murdered as he entered the office, by the same man who took the bonds—his former secretary, whom, if I remember rightly, he not only saved from starvation, but from penitentiary as well. It's no use, Daniels—you've had a long run for your money, but you've come to the end of your rope. An unfortunate metaphor, I'm afraid—rather too literal, but quite descriptive of your case."

"Listen, for God's sake," pleaded Daniels, leaning forward. "Whatever I may have been, I'm not a murderer. David Graham went to his office because he had an appointment there. He was killed without even knowing that the bonds were stolen, and I wasn't within a mile of that place when the shot was fired. He left his guests that night because he had an appointment with a woman—an appointment that he must keep if he didn't want the whole town to connect him with the sweetest bit of scandal—"

"You cur!" The quiet words were like the flick of a whip. "David Graham never harmed a woman in his life. Ron, will you ring police headquarters and tell them we've something here that might interest them?"

Before I could move, Daniels' hand had plunged into his coat pocket; and as he withdrew it the light glinted on the ugly barrel of an automatic.

"Sit still, both of you!" he commanded in a hard voice.

"Ah" Mr. Leigh's whispered exclamation held a strange note of satisfaction. "I hardly expected you to carry it in society, Daniels. Certainly I thought you'd have produced it before this, instead of carrying on such an interesting conversation.

Daniels' laugh was bitter. "I was a fool to waste my time. But I've always wanted to tell the Grahams that whoever committed the murder, I had no hand in it. I didn't expect you to believe me, but I thought the lad here—"

"Put down that gun," I said hoarsely, "and I'll kill you with my two hands."

"You see, Daniels," mocked Mr. Leigh, "You couldn't convince a child with that yarn of yours. I'm afraid you're trapped. That villainous-looking toy of yours is nothing but a bit of melodrama. You'd have to kill us both to get away, and the shots would bring a dozen men on your trail before you'd crossed the lawn. You'll hang, Daniels—you might as well give up now."

"Damn you, Leigh!" cried Daniels in fury. "You're a cold-blooded beast. You'd find some way of sending me to the gallows if you had to perjure your immortal soul to do it."

"Yes, Daniels." Mr. Leigh's voice was cold as steel. "I owe you a debt of long standing, and if David Graham's son isn't man enough to make you pay to the limit, there's a little reckoning with me that you won't escape."

"Don't be too sure of that," snarled Daniels, his finger closing on the trigger of the automatic, his voice tense with purpose. "I've got out of tighter holes than this, and I'll get out of this one in spite of you and that love-sick cats-paw of a kid—"

The contemptuous epithet, the sudden shadow as the light in the hotel was switched off, the quick pressure of the hand on my knee, all synchronized to the fraction of a second with my spring as I leaped upon Daniels, one hand reaching for the gun, the other tearing at his throat. Through the red haze that numbed my brain I heard a muffled report; then suddenly the struggle was over, and I stood swaying in the moonlight, the acrid smell of burnt powder in my nostrils, gazing dully at the dark stain that spread over the breast of the still figure at my feet. My head whirled with the suddenness of it all.

Then Mr. Leigh laughed—a great, bitter laugh that held a terrible note of triumph and exultation. I stared at him in stupefaction; and suddenly there came again before me that strange, illogical vision of Daniels with Nona in his arms, her arm about his neck, her dark head nestling against his shoulder as he gazed down at her with a sensual leer. And all at once I understood.

For while my father lay with a bullet in his brain; while the safe stood empty of the money that meant comfort to my mother and myself; while Mr. Leigh was speeding home from a brief business trip at the behest of certain venomous and startling rumors—Daniels had boarded the night train, and with him had gone a woman who had chosen to give up all that had hitherto made up her pleasant world and follow him into the unknown. That woman was Nona's mother.

Such is Mr. McNeil's story, one to delight the heart of Kipling and to prove that Sir William Macdonald was of the breed of "McAndrew" and "Sir Humphrey Gloster."

SOME men would have remained content with the millions already bestowed upon McGill University. However, Sir William Macdonald was not only a cheerful, but an ardent giver. A decade after his chief benefactions to the University in his own city, Sir William unfolded a plan for the erection and equipment of buildings at Ste Anne de Bellevue which would be a centre for agricultural education. Why We Explode every food cell in Puffed Grains

Over 125 million food cells exist in a grain of wheat. All must be broken to digest.

In bread you break part of them—in toast you break more. But Puffed Wheat alone breaks them all.

Grains shot from guns

Prof. A. P. Anderson studied for years to make whole grains wholly digestible.

He did it at last by sealing the grains in guns, then supplying an hour of fearful heat. Thus the moisture in each food cell is changed to super-heated steam.

When the guns are shot, every food cell explodes. All become available as food.

More than cereal tidbits

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are delightful dainties. You never tasted cereals so good. They are bubble grains, airy, flimsy and toasted, as flavory as nuts. They seem like food confections.

But they are also whole grains, supplying 16 needed elements. Every element is fitted to feed. The greatest food you can serve a child is Puffed Wheat in a bowl of milk. But serve them Puffed Rice also. That is the morning dish.

Science proves the danger of bleeding gums

MEDICAL science proves that unhealthy gums cause serious ailments. People suffering from Pyorrhea (a disease of the gums) often suffer from other ills, such as rheumatism, anaemia, nervous disorders or weakened vital organs. These ills have been traced in many cases to the Pyorrhea germs which breed in pockets about the teeth.

Four out of five people over forty have Pyorrhea. It begins with tender and bleeding gums. Then the gums recede, the teeth decay, loosen and fall out, or must be extracted to rid the system of the infecting Pyorrhea germs.

Guard your health and your teeth. Keep Pyorrhea away. Visit your dentist often for teeth and gum inspection, and make daily use of Forhan's For the Gums.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's will keep the gums firm and healthy, the teeth white and clean.

to be true that she should be, too good to be true that she shouldn't!

"No, she's all right. Except that she's got no clothes."

"Won't she let her rich uncle buy her a few?" I managed to ejaculate, instead of "Thank Heaven!"

"She sees that she's got to do that. A girl, no matter how intelligent is no use without clothes—in these days—to herself or anyone else; and she wants to be of use. Even the One Dress is wiped off the slate now. Sea water finished it. She can't get up and go out in the nightgown the housekeeper lent her."

"Had she nothing she could wear, left at the old Homeland? I could fetch—"

"There were only more 'nighties' (that's what they call 'em these days) and a kimono. No dress, and she refused to have anything from there brought to her. Said it would make her sick to see any of 'em again, after all she'd gone through in the hole. I suggested 'phoning for some female from a shop to come over and be told what's needed. Girl won't hear of it. Says she needs everything—even pins; and the female seeing her in such a state as she is (suppose she means the housekeeper's red flannellette dressing-gown which she's now got on, six sizes too large) would suspect something strange, and gossip. In the circe, Miss Kapielha doesn't want to be gossiped about; and I guess she's wise there."

"Can't the housekeeper—" I began, but Horden shook his head.

"Girl says she'd have appalling taste. Invited me to choose a wardrobe for her. Me? Gosh! I refused. Nothing doing! Not for mine! That's why I sent for you in a hurry. Bud, you've got to run right out, and choose a trousseau (he pronounced it 'troose') for Miss Patricia Kapielha; Patricia after her mother; nicknamed Patchinka by her father."

"Good lord!" I gulped. "Nothing doing for mine, either."

"What? You save a girl from suicide and let her live in a nightgown—that doesn't even fit? You're brutal."

"Does she know you sent for me?" I faltered.

"She does not, and she won't know. I'll get the credit, or the blame for this job when it's done."

"But you refused—"

"She'll think I changed my mind."

"I haven't a dashed idea what a girl wants to wear."

"She wants everything there is, and all of the best."

"That doesn't help me. Look here, Mr. Horden, you're a married man, aren't you?"

"Yes, but my wife's what they used in old times to call a suffragette. If I bought this girl things like hers, Miss Patchinka would set Petro on me. Have a heart, and run round the shops. Bring what you can home in a taxi, and sharp's the word, quick's the action. Mademoiselle can't leave her room till you come back, see?"

I thought for a minute, and thought hard. I wasn't Horden's chattel. He hadn't won me yet. But Miss Kapielha—Patchinka!—had. I was hers as Petro was hers. If she couldn't have clothes except of my choosing, I would choose them, even if she found out what I had done, and never forgave the liberty.

"Hang it, I'll do my damndest," I groaned.

Horden thrust money into my hand—must have had it ready, counting upon my surrender. I stuffed the bundle of five-pound notes—a fat bundle—into my pocket.

"Spend all you can" were the millionaire's last words, as I charged out of the room.

Never, so long as I live, shall I forget that next hour. "Hour" do I say? Add an "S" for the plural, and leave the number vague. Not again shall I wonder why women pass half their time in shops. It isn't because they want to do it, but because once in they can't get out!

I knew the right place to go, the biggest and best that Bournemouth possessed. I'd had buns and chocolates there on Saturday with Aunt Sarah. Now, in the tea room I fortified my nerves with strong black coffee and embarked upon the writing of a list.

Let me see. Begin at the feet. Boots; Shoes; Slippers. Don't know her size. Should think number two. If not, can change. Next—socks. No, that isn't what girls call 'em. Black; grey; bronze; white; must match the necktie—no, I mean the shoes. Garters. Do girls wear 'em? And what kind? How do I find out? I know! Buy a fashion magazine. The pictures tell everything! Almost too much.

In the circulating library, adjoining the tea-room, were Ladies' papers. I annexed one; began studying the advertisements; felt shamefaced; glanced up; met the contemptuous eyes of a Bishop's widow. She could have been nothing less; and her look said "Base," "Abandoned young man. You ought to be in a Reformatory!"

I waited until she had removed herself from my polluting presence, then quickly, guiltily, tore out several designs, in different stages of—as you might say—toilette. These I palmed, and not venturing to ask impertinent questions, wandered from department to department till I found one which matched the most thrilling of the illustrations.

So far, so good. But those fair English maidens engaged at so much per week to serve their own sex; how make overtures to them without fear of cries for the police?

I hesitated. My bones began to liquify. I had the pictures, yes! But the names of some garments common to man and woman sounded so—er—brusque!

"Is there anything you wish in this department, sir?" enquired a gentle voice.

I turned. Dear thing, she was forty if a day! Providence had sent her to me, as for Abraham it tangled a ram in a bush.

Wordless, I thrust into her hand my illustrated selections. She unfolded and gazed at them. At first, she frowned, gave me a suspicious upward peep, and was disarmed by an expression of frank agony.

"You wish to buy some of these things?" she encouraged me.

"All," I said. "Lots—lots of each."

"And you are to choose them?" (A faint cough). "Couldn't—she—possibly come herself?"

"Not possibly."

Miss Forty grew curious, I saw, and couldn't quite resist embodying her thoughts in speech.

"If it's your sister, wouldn't she—"

"She isn't my sister. And she isn't my mother."

"Oh, naturally not your mother! Such things as you suggest would be most unsuitable to a mother. I do beg your pardon, sir, but you seem so young to have a wife—"

"I haven't one."

Miss Forty looked distressed. "Would you forgive me a great liberty?" she asked. You see, I'm much your senior and perhaps I may be a better judge than you of what sort of presents a fiancée would care to accept from a young gentleman. Lingerie, I may say, is never given. Not in the best circles, where you no doubt move. It might be misunderstood. Hats; Gloves; or lovely slippers with paste buckles—"

"What earthly use would a hat, gloves and slippers be to a girl with no clothes?" I broke out. "No clothes at all! She won't misunderstand about the things I promise you. She's not my fiancée, but she's counting the moments till I come, so do hurry."

NEVER BEFORE has there been shown such a collection of crochet designs. The world-famed crochet workers of France, Ireland, Great Britain, Hungary, Austria—in fact, throughout Europe—have contributed the best of their crochet lore, that Canadian women may have a glorious collection of the most exquisite patterns in Crochet Art.

You'll be delighted with the newness and the simplicity of these designs—and all are so clearly illustrated that your fingers will fairly itch to start working them.

Designs That Are Suitable For Beginners and Experts

Years of experience are unnecessary when you follow CROCHETCRAFT. It gives you the most minute details—shows you exactly how to crochet anything, from the simplest to the most elaborate, in fact, offers you a complete education in crocheting. Anyone can start right off, yes, without a bit of previous experience, and soon be doing expert work.

The experienced crochet worker will find amongst this grand array the rarest of original patterns—designs that have arrested the attention of European connoisseurs—designs that, when finished, will readily sell at from $100 to $200 apiece.

Patterns of Uncommon Beauty-- Interesting To All

The woman who crochets will thoroughly enjoy CROCHETCRAFT, for it discloses a new world of crochet designs, the like of which have never been seen on this side of the Atlantic. These 414 designs present such a diversity that they give crocheting a new interest—they lead you on and on to more intricate work and spur you to do your best.

And it's this desire to do your best, to crochet really a masterpiece, that makes this art so fascinating, so entertaining. The little girl in school, the grown daughter filling her "hope chest," the mother furnishing and decorating her home, the grandmother making useful gifts—all these find CROCHETCRAFT helpful and the most entertaining book they ever had.

As a gift, CROCHETCRAFT is appreciated by every woman who likes to crochet. In your own home, CROCHETCRAFT will fill the long winter evenings with productive amusement. The materials are so inexpensive, the results so amazingly wonderful, that every woman or child who finishes a single, simple pattern is continually tempted to accomplish a more intricate one.

A Brief Description Of This Wonder Book

CROCHETCRAFT contains 112 pages and 414 complete, original designs. Each page measures 9x10 in. and the book is substantially bound.

Printed in blue, on white paper, all eye strain has been eliminated and each design stands out clear and distinct, every minute detail showing to the best advantage.

Whether you want suggestions for gifts, a dainty bit of picot insertion or a baby's bonnet—CROCHETCRAFT'S hoard of information will supply the solution to your troubles.

It is brand new, just off the press, and never before offered in Canada. Its 112 pages of attractive designs enable anyone to crochet the most intricate pieces—every illustration is clear and distinct—and every pattern is original and artistic.

The demand for this book has already proved tremendous—it's the one book that millions of crochet lovers have been anticipating for years—a complete collection of patterns. To insure getting your copy, we urge you to take advantage of our liberal offer and fill in the coupon below at once.

A Great Benefactor

far in advance of his day and generation in his plans for rural schools and for university extension work in agriculture. There are many problems in the world of to-day—industrial, political and social; but there is no problem more pressing than that of keeping the youth of the land on the farm. There was too much of the policy of "all work and no play" in the old days, with the consequence that "Jack" either became a dull lad or forsook farm life altogether. Science has come to the aid of the farmer and the threshing season is not the burden that it used to be. Science has been more slowly brought to the help of the farmer's wife; but electricity and machinery are doing something to-day to reduce the drudgery which made many a girl choose the city, preferring the typewriter or the ledger to the dairy and the farm kitchen.

Sir William had always cherished an ideal of bettering and brightening rural education thereby doing good to the most valuable element in the community. It is useless to cry "back to the land" unless the life on the land can be made something more than the round of common toil. There must be intellectual advancement and social cheer, as well as daily toil, if the best work is going to be done. As one who knew Sir William's aims remarked: "He desired to shake the average farmer out of his satisfaction with a school system that either left his children meagrely qualified to take their part in the struggle for existence or else tended to fit them for the soft-handed vocations only, a tendency whose results are seen in the persistent migration from the land to the overcrowded urban centres. Out of this purpose of Sir William Macdonald's grew his most interesting and valuable contribution to primary education—the Consolidated School, designed to substitute for half-a-dozen small, neglected, uninviting buildings, set amid bare and cheerless surroundings, and staffed by underpaid and sometimes underqualified teachers, a modern, soundly-constructed, well-equipped large school, with able instructors and full facilities for the special branches of teaching upon which Sir William laid such stress. These were manual training, school gardens, household science and nature study in the primary schools.

as it now operates. After describing Sir William Dawson's early but unavailing struggle in the fifties to maintain a school of civil engineering its revival in 1871 and the constitution of the Faculty of Applied Science in 1878, Dr. Adams continued:

"A few years later the great benefactor appeared, and through Sir William Macdonald's princely generosity the Macdonald Engineering Building was erected, followed in rapid succession by the Macdonald Physics Building and the Macdonald Chemistry and Mining Building. These buildings were not only erected but were adequately endowed. New professorships were established, provision being also made for the appointment of the necessary teachers of subordinate rank, and the Faculty of Applied Science, thus equipped and endowed, became not only the foremost school of its kind in the Dominion, but one unsurpassed anywhere."

The idea behind Macdonald College, at St. Anne de Bellevue, was stated by its first Principal, Dr. James Robertson, in these terms:

"For the whole country, as a matter of protection, safety, and insurance, it behooves us to look well to the training of the young people toward rural life, and to look well to the training of leaders for them. The Macdonald movement, as helped by Sir William Macdonald, has nothing destructive in it. It does not desire to destroy anything that now exists in rural districts, except weeds, but it hopes to help in building up something better than is now known and done, and thereby displace what is poor. It aims at helping the rural population to understand better what education is and what it aims at for them and their children. It plans to help in providing more competent leaders for the horticultural and agricultural population. Somebody's watchfulness, somebody's thoughtfulness, and somebody's thoroughness are always required; and the progress of the people in all worthy ways can be increased in what might be called geometric ratio through intelligent leaders who possess and use such qualities with unselfish public spirit.

"In our research work, because we have the means and the men, we want to make the benefactions of Macdonald College for rural communities extend as widely as possible. We carry on the work of the college in three departments or schools. In connection with the school of agriculture we have research and illustration departments. Then we have household science with research, and instruction for the homes of the people. That branch treats of the three prime necessities of life—food, raiment, and housing. It is just as important that the woman should be educated for her sphere of management as the man for his. In the school for teachers the instruction and training are for teachers preparing for city and rural schools. It is important that the rural school and its teacher should stand in with these two other activities—the occupations and the homes of the parents—and that the children should be thoroughly trained toward ability for, as well as an understanding of, what will be required of them in the fields and in the homes. The threefold character of the college fits it to train leaders for rural communities."

In the days to come, the visitor to McGill University, to Macdonald College and to the Macdonald Institute at Guelph may well pay tribute to the generosity which manifested itself in a form which means increasing usefulness and influence as the students of each class pass on to their wider world of experiment and trial. In the truest sense of construction Sir William Macdonald proved himself a nation builder—a citizen for whose practical patriotism Canada may well be grateful.

NOT content with the twelve millions he had lavished on McGill University (including the expenditure on Macdonald College), Sir William turned his attention to the neighboring province of Ontario and its Agricultural College at Guelph and proceeded to bestow upon it the Macdonald Institute and Macdonald Hall, the former a college, the latter a residence for the women students at the O. A. C. It is well, in an article for a journal which goes to thousands of Canadian homes, to emphasize the fact that Sir William Macdonald was more advanced than most benefactors of his time in his recognition of woman as a citizen whose education is of high importance to home and country. Hundreds of graduates of "Macdonald" at St. Anne and its sister institution at Guelph can bear testimony to the excellent equipment and wide opportunities which their experience at college afforded them, and thousands of homes throughout the Dominion will be more practically managed, more prosperously conducted because of the liberality of this princely giver.

There was a Royal Commission on Industrial Training and Technical Education which for nearly four years made an exhaustive investigation into every branch of these subjects in Europe and North America at the instance of the Canadian Government. Dean Frank D. Adams of McGill University, testifying before this Commission, paid Sir William Macdonald his due as the virtual creator of the Faculty of Applied Science

A Serious Question to Mothers and Fathers

Are you bringing up your Children properly?

NO OFFENSE intended in this personal question to mothers and fathers. On the contrary this message, prepared by an expert in matters of diet, endeavors to throw light on a subject of much confusion to many parents.

It is possible to give children all the food they can possibly eat—and still their little bodies can be under-nourished in certain respects.

For many foods are lacking in the vital mineral salts that science tells us we all need—if we are to build strong teeth and bones, and sound nerves and brain cells.

The food for your children

One of the most complete and best balanced foods you could possibly give your growing children is Grape-Nuts—the rich cereal food made from whole wheat flour and malted barley.

Grape-Nuts contains iron, calcium, phosphorus, and other mineral elements that are taken right up as vital food by the millions of cells in the body.

These terms may sound very technical to some people, but if you will ask your doctor you will learn that you could not live long without giving your system the benefit of these vital mineral elements.

With milk or cream, to supply fat, Grape-Nuts is a remarkably balanced food for every possible purpose.

What you may not know about a “perfectly balanced food,” however, your PALATE does know about FLAVOR. The international popularity of Grape-Nuts is due equally to its tempting, nut-like, sweet crispness and to its value as a satisfying, wholesome food.

You’ll find Grape-Nuts in the best homes, and in every first-class hotel and restaurant in Canada, just as you will find it sold by leading grocers everywhere.

PRICE TWENTY CENTS

A Beauty Secret 3,000 Years Old

The use of palm and olive oils to keep the skin fresh and smooth is nothing new, but a secret known to pretty girls since Cleopatra's time. Her Palmolive came in vessels and jars, and she had to do her own mixing. But the beautifying cleanser she achieved was the inspiration of the mild, soothing blend science produces today.

Take a lesson from Cleopatra, who kept her youthful beauty long after girlhood's days had passed. She used cosmetics to embellish and enhance her charm, just as women do today. But the foundation was a skin thoroughly and healthfully cleansed from all clogging and dangerous accumulations.

Perfect for washing faces

Palmolive is blended from the same palm and olive oils Cleopatra used—they are the mildest, most soothing ingredients science has been able to discover.

The scientific combination of these rare oils produces a smooth, creamy, lotion-like lather. Palmolive soothes and beautifies while it cleanses. It keeps the skin of the face and body beautifully soft and smooth.

Copyright 1923—The Palmolive Company of Canada, Limited. 14250.

The importance of thorough cleansing

It is absolutely essential to complexion beauty to wash your face thoroughly once a day. Palmolive makes this cleansing doubly beneficial by its mildness.

The profuse, creamy lather penetrates each tiny pore, removing the deposits of dirt, oil and perspiration which cause clogging and enlargement. Such cleansing is the secret of fresh, smooth skins, as results prove.

Don't neglect the body

Care of the complexion only begins with the face. Neck, arms and shoulders should be kept white and smooth.

Use Palmolive for bathing and these results are accomplished. It does for your body what it does for the face. If this seems an extravagance, remember the modest price. The firm, long-wearing cake of generous size costs but ten cents.

Our price secret

If Palmolive were made in small quantities it would be a very expensive soap. Palm and olive oils are costly soap ingredients, and come from overseas.

But the popularity which requires enormous production has reduced the price to that of ordinary soaps. 25-cent quality is offered for 10 cents.

ARTICLES on the preparation of food are always of interest to the feminine world; while the results of food study are of the highest importance to the men of the household. At the Convocation of the University of Toronto, the favorite song of the students, as the graduates in Household Science receive their degrees, is "We want pie!" This is the cry of the masculine heart in all ages, and devotion to culinary studies is a form of feminine learning about which man is always prepared to be enthusiastic. The modern department of culinary science is well equipped to meet all demands and the magazine of to-day must be in a position to discuss the latest development of vitamins and calories. As our readers are aware, this journal has been very fortunate in the authority on culinary topics who has written our articles from month to month. Miss Marion Harris Neil, who wrote these articles for years, was a widely-recognized authority in all matters relating to the culinary world, and, on her death, her sister, Miss Mary M. Neil, undertook the work, which was most satisfactorily accomplished. Miss Neil has returned to Scotland, and the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL in seeking a successor for the position naturally preferred a Canadian writer.

We have been highly favored in securing the services of one of our own authorities who will give our readers every month the best and latest advice on subjects of culinary interest. The writer of these articles, Miss Frances McNally, was fortunate enough to have Fredericton, the capital of New Brunswick, as her birthplace. Every well-informed Canadian knows that the Roberts family and Bliss Carman came from Fredericton. Does not the latter refer to it affectionately as "that leafy Northern city," in the dedication of one of his books? So we may expect literary grace, as well as culinary accuracy from this writer on salads and stews and all the accompaniments of our daily bread.

EDITORIAL CHAT

Miss Frances McNally, a member of the staff at Macdonald Institute, Guelph, who is our new writer on culinary topics.

Miss McNally is a graduate of our own Macdonald Institute and also holds the degree of "B. S." from Columbia University, New York. Her work as instructor in Lethbridge, Alberta, and in Stratford and Brantford, Ontario, has given her a wide experience in Canada, itself. In this month's issue, Miss McNally has written about salads and also concerning picnic lunches:—and we are sure that you will find both articles highly instructive. We admit a fondness,—or, rather, preference, for the mayonnaise dressing, but if you are set on something Russian or French or Mexican, why, "you reads your recipes and you takes your choice." Miss McNally is to write some special articles for us on food values, and you will be interested in them, whether you are a housewife of long standing or a bride who is determined to have as good bread "as mother used to bake." We were told by certain pessimists that Canada did not produce good cookery articles—to say nothing of the photographs—but we hope to prove in our own pages that these traducers of our country's resources are grossly mistaken.

We know that if you read the opening chapters of "The Idol of Youth" in our April issue you simply cannot help looking for the May chapters the very first thing. The story is one of absorbing interest with a mysterious and beautiful heroine from Poland, an English officer for hero, and an American millionaire to add dignity and dollars to every adventure. As to the bull-dog, Petro, he is just the kind of friend who, (we refuse to call Petro "which"), is appreciated in an emergency.

Our fiction this month is of unusual interest. Miss Pickthall's "The Blossoming," Miss Delahaye's "New Gifts for Old," Mrs. Campbell's "The Oil of Joy" and Miss Langworthy's "Taking the Scissors from Baby" form a quartette of stories which are worth reading more than once. From British Columbia, Ontario, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have come these May stories which should be as welcome as the blossoms themselves.

The work of the Women's Institutes covers so many and such varied activities that it is difficult to keep pace with what the many branches are doing. We have found it impossible to give reports of individual branches, much as we should like to do so. If the secretary will only reflect, she will see that, if we published all the branch reports which we could get, this magazine would have nothing but such material within its covers. We have always felt that "what the girls are doing" is of especial importance. Wherefore, we are very glad to publish, in this spring issue, an article on the girls' activities in Ontario. We also have a photograph of some of the members of the Bolton girls who took the longer Short Course. We admit that "longer short" makes a curious and rather Irish combination; but the course is one of the best, the girls are among our brightest Canadians, and everything in Home and Country is going to be better and happier when girls' activities are helping the Institutes. The older women may be able to help the girls—while the latter will certainly provide a store of sunshine and will improve the old ways by adding new wrinkles. The story is told of how well our girls are proving the value of "young material" and we are sure that every girl who reads this May number will wish to be an Institute member.

Coaxing him to "speak"

A shovelful of fun

The difference between white-wh clothes and grey-white clothes often the difference between Fels-Naptha Soap and "just laund soap." The Fels-Naptha blend splendid soap and real naptha clea clothes cleaner—that's the story.

The story the clothes-line tells Real Naptha!

You can tell by the smell

Two women. Two washes. Two soaps. Two results! The woman at your left tried to get her clothes clean. She did the best she could with the soap she had. But the clothes-line is impartial. It must tell the truth. And the truth is—grey-white clothes for this woman's labors!

Her neighbor used Fels-Naptha Soap, in this way: She wet the clothes; then rubbed Fels-Naptha on them; rolled them; let them soak for a half-hour in lukewarm water; rubbed such extra-soiled places as wristbands; rinsed them. The clothes-line shows white-white clothes for this woman! And with less labor.

The difference in the clothes is the difference in the soaps. One is "just laundry soap." Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naptha in a way that brings out the best in these two great cleaners—a way that has never been successfully imitated!

The real naptha in Fels-Naptha wades clean through each thread, breaking dirt's grip so the soapy water can flush it away. Having done its work, the naptha vanishes, leaving the clothes sweet and clean. Clothes are whiter because cleaner, and more sanitary for the same reason. Say "Fels-Naptha" to your store-man—and mean it! Directions for using are printed inside every wrapper.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS

CAPTAIN MALET, a young officer returned from the war, is at Bournemouth with his Aunt Sarah when the beauty and distress of a young foreign guest at the hotel win his interest. In the guise of a waiter he makes her acquaintance, persuades an American millionaire, Henry S. Horden, to give him some caviare for the starving girl, and, before the evening is over, saves her from suicide and makes a friend of her dog, Petro. The girl is Patchinka Kapieha, a sister of the heroic aviator, Sacha Kapieha, who had lost his life in the war and whose plane is even then being offered as second prize in the lottery at Monte Carlo. Patchinka is taken to Mr. Horden, who had known her brother and who had wished to buy the aviator's secrets of invention. He adopts Patchinka as his niece and suggests that they should all go to Monte Carlo to buy the plane. In the meantime, Captain Malet is sent out to buy a wardrobe for Miss Kapieha (known as Miss P. Smith) and is having difficulty explaining his needs to the saleswoman, "Miss Forty."

CHAPTER X—(continued)

"My goodness!" murmured Miss Forty.

"Mine too! And for the sake of yours, please help me to choose."

"Oh, certainly," said the lady. "No clothes at all! Why—er—but really, one hardly knows where to begin, does one?"

"Where would you begin, if you lost yours?"

"Lost them?—How odd!—Well! I will do my best." Miss Forty glanced at the pictures. "You've decided on—this sort?"

"Absolutely."

"They are expensive. Being the latest thing—"

"And the shortest," I might have added; but was silent.

"As to quality—"

"The best."

"And quantity?"

"Don't ladies always have a dozen of everything? I've an Aunt who—"

"An Aunt? You wouldn't like her judgment instead of mine to help you sir?"

"Good heavens, no! She's not that kind of aunt!"

Miss Forty smiled. "I see," she said again. "I suppose you have the young lady's height?"

"In my eye."

"And her bust—I mean her waist-measure?"

"No, not in my eye. But look here!" I brightened from despondency. "Haven't you got some of those jolly wax figures you see in shop windows with silk stockings on—and other things, of course? I could pick out on what's about the right height and shape, and then we could fit it."

Miss Forty doubted. "We have the wax figures. But they're supposed to be of ideal measurements. Few ladies, even very young ones, have such perfect—"

"She has. Jove! Show me one of those wax beauties and I believe I can judge to an inch!"

My guide led the way, and I followed. I was beginning to warm to the task. After all, it wasn't exactly dull!

CHAPTER XI.

The Telegram.

I DON'T know at precisely what stage in the proceedings it occurred to me that Miss Forty might do at a (figurative) pinch, as chaperone for Miss Kapieha from Bournemouth to the Riviera.

Perhaps it was when we discussed the suitability of certain costumes for the South, and the neat little woman shut her eyes in an instant's ecstasy. "It's always been the dream of my life," she breathed, "to see the Riviera." But of course it can never be gratified.

"Why not?" I encouraged her.

"Oh, at my age and in my situation one learns that dreams don't come true," she said, cocking an adorable hat over one glass eye of Patchinka's waxen understudy. "And I could never save enough for such a holiday."

"Not if you got paid for taking it?" (By this time the idea was simmering.)

The poor lady (she had the ultra-air of being a lady!) sighed in resignation. "Such a thing would be a fairy story!"

The subject dropped; but when she had piloted me to many departments, and practically brought others en masse to me, I expressed gratitude. "I think," said I, "that Miss—er—the young lady who'll wear these pretty things will like to thank you for your trouble. So please tell me your name."

"We usually give a number," Miss Forty modestly replied. "But—since you've been so kind, you may remember me by thinking of the Iron Duke."

The Iron Duke seemed the last person (or was it the battle-ship—or perhaps a public house?) to think of in connection with this mouse-like creature. Seeing my blank look, however, she explained that her name was Wellington; she was proud of it: Victoria Wellington—Miss. Would I write it down? No, thanks: a name impossible to forget! And so, half buried under boxes, I taxied away to the Bathcombe.

"I suppose Mademoiselle Patchinka will go in person and change half these glad rags for something different," I grumbled to myself; and saw that I'd been an ass not to impress discretion on the Duke's namesake. My number would be up, if the girl found out who had been guilty of this intimate shopping!

I sent the boxes with a scribbled line to Horden, saying I had done my best, and enclosing a very few bank notes from the fat pile he had provided. "Come to my sitting-room," was the message which returned, scrawled on the same envelope; and I shot up, trembling with the suspense which I had shed while wrestling with Patchinka's wardrobe. Had the answer from Monte Carlo arrived?

I would not ask; and Horden's first words blew the thought of Monte Carlo out of my head again.

"Say, son, I've got a confession to make," he said. "She knows."

"Knows what? I stuttered. "Not—"

"Yes. About the clothes and things. I didn't mean to let the cat out of the bag. But there was a par in 'The Times' about Kapieha; and innocent as a dicky bird I hopped to her door with the paper. 'What, you here?' she rapped through the crack. 'I thought you were buying me something to wear'. 'Don't you worry, the costumes will come along', I cheered her up. And then, would you believe it, the girl guessed? 'Have you sent Mr. Malet?' she asked. I was ready to lie my head off, honest Injun I was, to save ructions. But she didn't give me time. 'I hope you have,' she said. 'He'll know the kind of dress to suit me better than you would, because he's young!'. Just like that! I tell you this skirt is different from some. No darn nonsense about her."

You could have knocked me down with the smallest feather in one of Patchinka's hats. Thank goodness she was different. If it had been Aunt Sarah now, at Miss Kapieha's age!...Help!

"You look like a boiled beetroot's twin brother!" said Horden. "But I've been handing you out the straight truth. She doesn't care a red cent who chooses her things, so long as they're right; and I guess they are, or the band would have begun to play before this. She'll pop in here soon, I bet, to show herself off, and—"

"Good lord, let me escape!" I gasped, and loped for the door; but Horden grabbed me.

"Face it out, instead of leaving it to hang over your head," he advised. "Besides, she may be different, but she's a girl, and a girl would always rather have an audience of two men than one when she's got a new frock—especially if she's had only one dress since the flood. If you're a soldier, you'll stay."

I stayed; but because neither of us would talk of Monte Carlo, there seemed to be no other subject we could dwell on except the weather—and few Englishmen care to dwell long on their own climate, with an American. It grew late; nothing happened; and I'd begun to think of trekking to the Haven for cold ham and rice pudding, when there came a light knock, and the door opened.

"Horden's lunch," I thought.

But it wasn't Horden's lunch. It was Patchinka. Not the Patchinka of last night—a little desperate thing in a kimono at bay against the world, or little drowned waif in a soaked dress—the dress. No, a new Patchinka, slim and chic and incredible as a Paris fashion-plate, yet ever mysterious, illusive, even in gold-embroidered blue serge and a smart, winged hat half hiding those green-grey eyes.

"I'm glad you're both here," she said, "so I can thank you together, and you can see if I repay all your kind trouble. I hope I'm not—too bad?"

"Gee! You're such a peacherine!" burred Horden.

"Is it a fruit, that?" she asked.

"Yes," explained Horden, "sort of cross between a peach and the forbidden apple of Eden. It's been quite a favourite fruit up to now ever since Adam."

I said nothing, unless my eyes spoke; but she was looking deep into the mirror, oblivious of me.

"I do not know myself," she smiled. "I don't think anyone from the past would know me—except Petro. Oh, but I shall enjoy throwing away my aged dress!"

"Give it to me to dispose of for you," I proposed. "You can't burn a gown in a fireplace."

"I might send it out to sea—where it nearly went last night, with me in it."

"I can do that for you." I generously persisted. "Save you carrying a bundle!" She thanked me carelessly. I was really too good!

Yes. Horden had hit it. If she hadn't been "different from some," she would have guessed that the One Dress would never go out to sea unless it took a voyage with Christopher Malet. I felt I had a right to that frock, as a mascot. And I may mention in passing that later that same day I got it, though nothing was said or done at the moment because just then the telegram came.

I can't explain how I knew it was the telegram. A man like Horden must get dozens of telegrams daily. But I did know, the instant I set eyes on the brown envelope. The one thing I didn't know was the thing most important; what was in it.

There was I, with my fat wobbling on the knees of the gods, which are proverbially slippery and sharp; and there was Horden, slowly opening the envelope as if he had vowed to count a hundred before he finished.

Even when he opened it, he stopped and blew his nose thoroughly before he drew forth the paper inside. Then he tucked his handkerchief neatly up his sleeve. Next, he put on his eyeglasses. After that he drew the handkerchief from his sleeve again and polished the glasses. At last he unfolded the telegram. But this was not the end. He read and re-read the few written lines which I could tantalizingly glimpse from a distance.

In another six seconds I should have yelled or thrown Horden out of the window, if Patchinka had not given voice to my thought. "Is it from Monte Carlo?" she asked, as quietly as if everything hadn't depended on the answer for her as for me.

"Yes, it's from Monte Carlo," assented Horden. But not a word more did he say. Risking death at my exasperated hands he strolled to a desk, sat down and occupied himself with something which I couldn't see from where I stood.

Irritated beyond control, I made for the door. "Well, I must be toddling home to lunch," I barked.

"Hold on a minute," directed Horden. "This concerns you. Here you are, Bud!" So speaking, he rose in leisurely fashion and held out a slip of paper.

I took it from him gingerly. It was a cheque for five thousand dollars.

"You win," he drawled. "The Administration at Monaco regrets, but has widely advertised Kapieha's historic mascot as a lottery prize, and feels it would not be right to disappoint the public. So there you are, and I guess you deserve to win—if for nothing else because you don't say 'I told you so.' Now, you'd better phone your aunt and feed with us. Because there's stacks of things to talk over and settle."

CHAPTER XII.

Sacha's Secret and Others.

THERE is a French proverb which says "Millionaires are always right."

In any case, Henry S. Horden was right in warning us that there were "stacks of things to see about and settle."

For one; should Miss Kapielha go to Monte Carlo, or should she wait comfortably in England until she knew that we (it was "we" now!) had secured her brother's machine?

But Patchinka answered that question without hesitation. "I will go," she said, "there are reasons why I should be there. Last night I thought I had no right to tell Sacha's secrets. Now, I've changed my mind. I know you both better. I trust you both. You are both good to me. Mr. Horden is ready to give much money, Captain Malet is ready to give much time—perhaps even to risk danger. Yes, there may be danger! It's not just a silly fancy of mine. You will see when I tell you the story of Sacha's aeroplane. It's not fair to let men like you go into this with your eyes shut. It's most likely, Mr. Horden, that the pearls are in the aeroplane."

"Gee Whizz!" gasped Horden. "In the aeroplane? After all these years? My dear Miss Kapielha—I mean, my dear niece—you're mighty optimistic."

"You don't understand," she said. "If the pearls are where I think they are, nobody who wasn't in the secret could find them. Sacha was an inventor—always an inventor, even in little things. If his shoe came untied, he would invent something to keep it from doing that again. If a button fell off, the same! The aeroplane he built was his mascot, you know. He had faith in her, as if she were a woman he loved and trusted. Oh, if the pearls are in the hiding hole he told me of, they're not the only things there! Sacha was thinking out a great invention when I saw him last—the greatest of his life. The plans were almost finished. I, and a French woman—a beautiful lady he worshipped but could not marry—were the only ones in the secret, though there were three men who, perhaps, suspected something of it. It is through them—or one of them—the danger might come."

"Are you talking of the Syndicate men?" Horden suddenly cut her short. "Yes, you knew of the Syndicate; you said so last night. But did you know the men?"

"I met them. They let Kapielha down, but they tried to spell-bound him to believe that everything would be O.K. in the end, if he'd let them in on the ground floor with his newest stunt—something he was brain-chasing, and hadn't put on paper yet—or if he had, he was keeping dark. Of course the fellows had no right to exact more than they'd bargained for at first. But these inventor chaps are artists, not business men. Kapielha had a document of sorts signed by this Syndicate of three, and took it for granted the thing was all right; but when the skunks planked down only half what the agreement called for, Sacha took his precious paper to a Paris lawyer. Darned if there wasn't a clause that let the swine out! He couldn't use the law against 'em. He was firm not to give in, though about his newest idea—new as tomorrow's bread! And that's when he turned his attention to me. One of the Syndicate was Algerian French, another Italian, from Turin I think, and the third was a Spanish Jew from Barcelona. He had interests in Holland and had met my wife there long ago. He had the darned cheek to try and make up to me on that score. You see my wife's Dutch, and hails from the Hague that the Dutch are proud of. She's Dutchier than ever now, because she's left me and gone back home to live. She's kept my daughter with her too—mostly on account of those pearls."

"Your wife—left you on account of my—our pearls?" the girl dazedly echoed. "Yeh. On top of some other things. To begin with, she didn't understand business; used to get peeved because I had to shoot away all of a sudden, pretty often, when she'd invited her smart society friends for week-ends. Or sometimes I'd pop over to Europe without givin' her time to pack her glad rags and go with me. Well, when I came to this side in 1914, I tried to make up for several spats we'd had by promising to bring her a better rope of pearls than any woman she knew possessed. I'd have kept my word if Kapielha's pearls were as good as he said; and I bet they were, for he was a white man. But I told you how I'd had to scoot for home before they turned up in Paris, and you know what travel was, those first days of the war. I lit out at an hour's notice, and lucky to have that! But there was not time to think of pearls. It seems my wife had chatted a lot about what I'd promised to bring her, and she never forgave me for turning up with empty hands. She thought I'd invented the whole tale about Kapielha and his pearls; and it wasn't like me to pay out money before I got the goods. And she was right, in a general way. But this business was the exception. I liked Kapielha. I didn't want to see him done in by a bunch like that so-called Syndicate; and it was my fault, not his, that I went off without the pearls. If I could have waited, I'd have got 'em all right. But my wife didn't see that. She said, if I'd sooner let her down than some guy I hardly knew, she'd go home to her mother."

"And was your wife's mother at the Hague?" asked Patchinka, interesting of like being my own boss. It's a nice change from what it used to be. As for Wendela, she's her mother over again, judging from a photo she sent me, after my last birthday cheque to her. I feel real kindly to the girl, but I'm not too blinded by sentiment to see that distance may lend enchantment. She's well over age, and according to the letters I get, having a real good time, going about pretty well as she pleases. By the by, last time I heard, seems to me there was a P.S. about French Riviera, a little trip on her own, without mamma. You might come across her there. If you do, give her my love."

"Perhaps if she's at Monte Carlo, you'll come over yourself," Patchinka said.

"Not to see Miss Wendela, if I wouldn't go to see Kapielha's machine." Horden's jaw set grimly. "I've got my work cut out in England, these next few weeks, and when I run across to France on the same business that brought me here, the Riviera will still be a long way off my pitch. I'll keep in constant touch with you two, though; and by the time the pearls turn up, if they do, I shall have the paper which will show you I'm entitled to them for cash down, the cash that built Kapielha's aeroplane. I'll cable to New York to-day. As for the pearls

He wouldn't trust entirely to the mascot of course, for his valuables, because, if he died he knew that I would have next to nothing. The plans when he finished them would be worth a fortune; and they were to be mine. He made his will, and gave me a copy. Everything he left was for me, except a ring he always wore. That, if it were saved, was to go to—the lovely lady I told you about."

"Ah, the French lady he couldn't marry because she had a husband," Horden recalled the girl's words.

"Yes, I think it is not wrong to tell you her name, because Sacha's love for her was not a wicked love. There was nothing to be ashamed of. He swore it to me—not that he need have sworn! But he wanted me to know. And Sacha never lied. Have either of you heard of the Marquessa di Fiumine?"

"I guess so," said Horden. "Name seems sort of familiar."

"Nearly everyone heard of her in the war," said I. "But you call her French. Her husband's Italian. Don't you remember, Horden, the things that used to be in the papers. His estates were close to the Austrian frontier, and he was in Meran taking a cure or something when the war broke out—, was interned for the duration—and there was so much gossip about his

"See, we've managed to keep a chair for you" herself in Horden's family history, as she wished him to be interested in her.

"No. Her mother's in heaven—so far as I know to the contrary. That was a figure of speech. But our daughter was at the Hague. It was a whim of Jo's (Johanna is my wife's name) to have her there at school for a year. These folks from the Hague think there's no town to touch it, not even New York, so Jo nipped across before the submarines got bad, and instead of bringing Wendela back, anyhow at the end of the war, there the two of 'em have stopped ever since, except a trip or two to Switzerland and France. Wendela was eighteen when I saw her last. She's nearer twenty-five than twenty-four now, and from what I hear of her doings, beginning to peck her cats."

"Oh, and all this because I couldn't get the pearls from Wilna to Paris in time!" moaned Patchinka. "It's terrible. If we can find them, is it too late? Will your wife come back to you and bring your daughter, do you think, if you give her the pearls?"

Horden chuckled grimly, "I don't think! I mean, it takes two to make a bargain, and six years, getting on seven, is a big slice out of a man's life. I'm getting used not to have a woman nagging round and bossing the show. I sort of like being my own boss. It's a nice change from what it used to be. As for Wendela, she's her mother over again, judging from a photo she sent me, after my last birthday cheque to her. I feel real kindly to the girl, but I'm not too blinded by sentiment to see that distance may lend enchantment. She's well over age, and according to the letters I get, having a real good time, going about pretty well as she pleases. By the by, last time I heard, seems to me there was a P.S. about French Riviera, a little trip on her own, without mamma. You might come across her there. If you do, give her my love."

"Oh I don't—I can't believe it," cried Patchinka. "Sacha was too clever for them. Besides, it would be too bad to be true!"

"Bud! You said the Syndicate men suspected something."

"I said they may have suspected. Sacha told me they urged him to use their bank, and wanted to introduce him to the manager, who was a friend of one of them. Then, when he told them he was satisfied with his own bank, they wished to be introduced to his manager. Sacha had been keeping his valuable papers in the bank, when he was making his flights, but that frightened him. He had already thought out the secret place in his mascot, and he decided to keep his plans there. He had a presentiment that—even if he were killed flying—the machine would be saved; and you know, that presentiment came true. But there were duplicates of the plans.

being Austrian at heart that his French wife was almost persecuted—though she'd given up her big Paris house as a hospital? She was nursing there herself, but there was so much fuss she put the place in other hands, and went down to live in her villa at Cap Martin?"

"Yeh! 'Twas one of the early 'stunts' of the war, that excitement. I've seen pictures of the lady in the Sunday Supplements of New York papers," Horden remembered.

"That must have been while I was in Milna, or anyhow before I'd escaped back into Europe again," Patchinka said. "It took me months and months to do that. Peasants helped me. I had a few jewels of my mother's left—nothing grand. But I paid my way. All I knew about things that had happened far away was from old newspapers I picked up here and there. It was that way I heard of Sacha's death—and the aeroplane being saved. I had the aeroplane to live for and Petro. I told you last night, didn't I, Captain Malet? How he was wounded, flying with Sacha; and Sacha sent him by a friend to Corfe Castle, to be kept by the breeder there who sold him. But when I got to England at last the breeder had moved to Bournemouth. That's why I'm here—and why I had no money, and only one dress when you saved us both.

Oh, it was an awful time—terrible months struggling through Russia—working my way, and not knowing what I should find when I got out—if I ever could get out! It seems ages since I arrived here and re-deemed Petro. I was ill—malaria—I hardly know how I travelled from the London docks—I came by ship from Sweden you see, the last stage of my journey—to Corfe Castle; then on here. Perhaps it's strange that the horrid hotel let me stay as long as it did. It was the breeder who sent me to the Homeland. He said it was 'so respectable!' Part of my hope was in the Marchesa di Fiumine. I was so late, that the time limit for the aeroplane was past; and I was very weak, and had no money or influence. I thought she might help me for Sacha's sake. I mean, I thought she might plead my cause with the Government. I wrote her to Paris—and then, when I didn't hear, to Cap Martin. But no answer came. And yesterday a waiter brought me that Sunday illustrated paper to look at, with the picture of Sacha's plane at Monte Carlo—a prize for the lottery!

"Now you tell me that Madame de Fiumine was suspected—was driven from Paris. Perhaps she has left France? Perhaps she never got either of my letters?" "Very likely not," Horden soothed the girl with his comforting drawl, when she had stammered out the disjointed story of her adventures and disappointments. "The lady looked mighty handsome in her picture, I recollect, and I for one am always ready to give the handsome woman the benefit of the doubt. She may have had to join that husband of hers somewhere, now the war's over and folks are trying to forget it. Anyhow, you're liable to find out all about her when you get down to Monte Carlo, only two or three miles from Cap Martin. And whether she turned a deaf ear to you on purpose or not, you don't need to care now. You've got an uncle and a brother to look after you and your interests."

"A brother?" Patchinka repeated. And looked from Horden to me. "You mean—Captain Malet?"

"Why, of course,—unless you've got some more you haven't told me about."

"I shall never call any man brother, except my Sacha," said the girl. "To Captain Malet, I give another name. What it is I do not tell—yet. You might laugh—both. But I hope he won't mind not being my brother?"

"I do not mind in the least," I assured her, warmly. And I meant that if I ever meant anything in my life!

I didn't ask what was the name she had given me. I didn't wish her to tell—even if she would—before Horden. And to change the subject I brought up that of Miss Wellington.

"As I'm not your brother, you'll have to have a chaperon, you know," I said.

Patchinka's fancy was caught by my description of the Iron Duke's namesake.

"She's come to the age when she knows that dreams won't come true!" echoed the girl compassionately. "Oh, what a dreadful thing to happen to a woman! Do go directly, Captain Malet, and invite the poor creature. I don't need to see her first. She is sure to be all right, is she not, Mr. Horden? Captain Malet chose me the right clothes. He will choose the right chaperon. I must have one."

So that was that; if Miss Wellington cared to live her own fairy story. I said I would go and interview her before lunch. And then we went back to talking of Sacha.

Instead of leaving the duplicate plans in his bank Sacha had told Patchinka that he would confide them to Madame de Fiumine. Whether he had given her charge of the pearls also, who could say? But the girl had a "feeling" that they were hidden in that secret place of his "mascot."

Then, at last, we came to the question which hadn't been put yet. Where was the secret place! Had Sacha told her that?

For a moment Patchinka did not speak. She looked at Horden and at me; almost as if she were ashamed.

"I was afraid you'd ask me that," she said.

"Why afraid?" I wanted to know. "You needn't tell, of course, if you don't wish to—if you don't trust us."

"I do wish to, and I do trust you," she answered. "But Sacha made me promise I would never tell anyone. If he were here I think he would let me tell now. And maybe he is here—who knows? Yet he can't speak, and so—I have to be silent. At least, unless a time comes when I have to tell. And that's one reason why I must go where his aeroplane is—why I must be there myself, don't you see?"

With our different points of view, we saw.

CHAPTER XIII

The Start

WE had a clear fortnight before the sale of tickets for the War Orphans' Lottery at Monte Carlo would begin; but it wasn't exactly a fortnight to spare.

That big biplane of Sacha Kapieha's might have been held down to earth with his sister's heartstrings and mine. The girl and I felt an urge, a pull, which seemed to draw us from a far distance, and it was going to draw us together as carry us to that height, we were not quite without hope.

Horden's original idea of obtaining the machine still held good—with a few amendments.

The Casino couldn't sell it to him, as that would not be fair to the public. The lottery must take place; but if one of us didn't win he was willing to offer any fair price to the person who did, and we told ourselves that nine people out of ten would prefer a round sum of money to a second-hand aeroplane.

There was hope number two for us. If it failed also, there was left just one desperate chance, it seemed. We argued that it wouldn't be stealing to rescue the hidden treasures if that could be done; and if worst came to worst, we wouldn't give up without a last struggle. Not that we put this wild plan (if you could call it a plan) into definite words. It was expressed by a mere hint: "Well, if one thing won't work, maybe another hit" with Horden when I sketched it briefly. And what is more, I had Aunt Sarah's blessing on my "mission."

Not, I must confess, that she clearly understood what the "mission" was, or that she knew of the girl's connection with it. But, —I explained vaguely through the phone between Bathcombe and Homeland—Mr. Henry S. Horden wanted me to go at once to the South of France for him (no mention of Monte Carlo) and get hold of an aeroplane he needed. Hearing there was "money in it," present and future, she sighed through the telephone that she'd not stand between me and a career, though she preferred the bank. And she would give me a chest protector to wear on the journey.

The worst remaining worry was—I couldn't fly! And I must learn to do so before I could make use of the machine in the way I wished to do—if I obtained it.

A book I bought at Miss Wellington's shop, however, informed me in a few heartless sentences that to become a "worth while peace pilot" would mean an apprenticeship of three years.

First, a course in Engineering.

Second, a course in the Theory of Flight.

Third, a year in an Aeroplane Factory.

Fourth, another year in an Aircraft Engine Factory.

Fifth, several months practical work in an Aerodrome.

If this were true, why stop in England one miserable, useless fortnight? Such intensive fagging as I could manage might be done in Nice. There was a Flying Instructors' School there, or had been in 1914, Patchinka said. Sacha had taken her south that spring for her Easter holidays. Perhaps the trip was designed as an excuse to be near the Marchesa di Fiumine, Cap Martin; but that was a detail. Quite a fuss had been made over Sacha in Nice, and an aeroplane had been lent him to show off his little sister's skill as the youngest living girl pilot. Patchinka was fifteen then—a year older than Andree Farman (famous later as a pilot for her father at the mature age of fourteen)—and that week in Nice had been the most wonderful of the child's life.

"You can have lessons there, Captain Malet," she said, "and every day we will go to Monte Carlo to look at Sacha's machine. You know a lot about mechanics already,—you, who have been in the Tank Corps, and decorated. Besides, a pilot you need not be. I will be the pilot. And Petro will be our mascot. We shall fly,—all three of us—to Mr. Horden, wherever he may be when we are ready to start."

One would have thought, to hear the girl talk, that I was her brother, after all! I didn't feel in the least like it, as I've strongly said, and I was longing to know the secret name she had for me, which couldn't be told yet. But anything to be near her, to serve her, to win one of those rare, cryptic, dimpled smiles now and again! For that reward, I'd even have let her look upon me (pro. tem) as a kind uncle, like Henry S. Horden, aged fifty-four instead of twenty-six and a half.

Evidently Miss Kapieha's idea of conducting our adventure was conceived entirely without reference to Mrs. Grundy. If she had heard of that formidable personage when a school-girl in Paris, she had forgotten the lady while in Wilna, and as a wanderer among Bolsheviks.

She drew her delicate brows together when I suggested Cap Martin as a residence for her if the Marchesa di Fiumine should welcome Sacha's sister to the villa there.

"But—you will be at Monte Carlo or Nice!" she objected.

(Horden grinned. Luckily, however, his niece was glaring reproachfully at me, not regarding him.)

"Yes, I hope so—I suppose so working hard. Still we'd meet—"

"To me that seems inconvenient," pronounced Miss Kapieha coldly. "Still, if you prefer to separate—" She shrugged her shoulders in the navy blue serge which I had almost prayerfully selected as one selects a hymn to sing in church. Her eyes clouded, and I felt as if I had boxed the ears of an angel. But Horden came to my rescue with a comprehending

"I'll take you to the Casino later. Is that an engagement?"

well. If she didn't realise that, I did. It was a glorious thrill, that realization.

I wanted to be on the spot where the aeroplane was, in the Place du Casino at Monte Carlo. And when I found out in a word, a look, that it was the same with Patchinka, I asked myself and her, "Why not? Why shouldn't we be there?"

The way things stood with us—with her and me, after luncheon and a few "alarums and excursions"—was this. Patchinka was a proud little person, proud for Sacha's sake and for her own because she was a hero's sister. She had proved that pride; and I don't believe that any temptation would have induced her to accept help from Horden if she hadn't felt dazzlingly confident that she could more than pay him back by and by. If we could win the aeroplane as a prize, that would be best of all, for he would then buy it from her, for his great Combine. But if our luck didn't will" from me; an understanding flash from a girl's grey-green eyes; and a chuckle from Horden.

He, by the way, had to be off about his business in a hurry. Only the deep-down love of romance and adventure under the hard crust of his practicality detained him in Bournemouth past the time limit of his original schedule. Having taken up her cause, he felt bound to see Miss Kapieha through, even if his blessed Combine shook to its foundations. But Miss Wellington having tearfully accepted our offer, and arranged with her employers for an immediate release—a holiday of indefinite length—the girl was provided with a respectable dragon. I stood ready and eager to act as courier, or in any other useful capacity. I had Horden's cheque for five thousand dollars, a vast sum in francs. I had a plan for adding to that pile, in the event of a French railway strike—a plan which "made a

THE BLOSSOMING

BY M. L. C. PICKTHALL

Illustrated by F. N. Mann

THE telegram to Cavan was in Anna's pocket. Her cousin Mrs. Aymery knew it was there; knew, too, that it consisted of the single word "Yes." In Mrs. Aymery's mind it could have consisted of nothing else; yet she was relieved.

Perhaps it was in contradiction to this flord relief that Anna had not dispatched her telegram from the little station where the train was to stop for an unaccountable half-hour. She left it to do so; but instead walked down the platform, crossed a road and followed a path into the woods.

Just a few minutes more; just a few minutes of silence and coolness, and—yes—a thrush singing; just a few moments yet in which to feel herself her own....

In ten minutes she turned to go back. And found herself hopelessly lost.

She was not disturbed. There was plenty of time. She must have turned in the wrong direction by the stream. She returned to the stream, chose her line anew, and followed it, expecting each moment to step out on the road.

Instead, far away, she heard the whistle of a locomotive.

They were whistling for her.

Then she was dismayed; drawn through the trees, the whistle sounded very distant; all the time she had thought she was walking towards the line, she must have been walking away from it.

She began to run.

The path down which she ran seemed familiar; yet presently it ended abruptly, died out in a grassy clearing.

In the midst of the clearing she stood motionless. Her coming had scared the thrush she had heard. He flew with a cry. Then once more she heard the engine; and again. Followed silence.

"That's the last," said Anna aloud. She was left behind.

She hoped Aymery had not stopped to look for her; she thought it more likely he had paid the agent to do so. Anyway, she must find her way back to the station, get some sort of accommodation for the night, and follow next day on the through train. There was nothing to worry about.

But in an hour she knew something had gone wrong with the safe routine of her life.

She looked at the woods. They were implacable as stone walls. Panic shook her. On all sides, she was enclosed by silence and the budding trees, and felt herself so enclosed for miles. Each tree, in the first fugitive stirring of spring, looked soft and delicate as her own flesh. Yet.....

Her expensive conventional travelling gear was stained and slashed as if in mockery. Her shoes were cut, her hands bleeding. The trees would not let her go.

Not even a mistaken sense of direction was now hers. She went blindly on, driven by that ancient forest-fear which would drive her until she fell.

A fence barred her advance. On the fence a young man was sitting with his back to her, watching the moon.

The relief was a convulsion. The distorted world swung back into shape. Anna Aymery said like a child, "I'm lost!" stumbled forward, rested her arms on the fence and her head on her arms, and broke into wild tears.

Even as she wept, the thought stirred in her that this was the quietest man she had ever met; he was quiet as the woods.... For he did not speak nor move. Only when she raised her head he said gently, "Got through with it?"

"Yes. O yes....."

"That's right. There's nothing in the world worth while being so scared about, you know."

"I'm lost....."

"Not now."

Anna looked at him. In a moment she repeated like a child, "No. Not now."

Her trained conventional sense was at work unconsciously all the time; probing him, trying to "place" him. Her life led her to ask, not "Who is he?" but "What is he?" She could see no more than a shabby flannel shirt and a dark thin face, of which the eyes were luminous and the features ugly. With the simplicity that had fallen on her after her terror, she said, "What are you doing here?"

"Waiting for my trees to blossom."

He spoke quite gravely. In a moment he added, "I'm afraid I'll have to wait another year or two yet."

Then she saw that on the other side of the fence an orchard of young fruit trees swept gently upwards to a shadow of woods and a more solid darkness that might be a small house. On the edge of the woods over the house, something took the moonlight like a cloud, or an anchored shower of snow.

Anna said, "They're just baby trees."

"Yes," agreed the man gravely. "I had to buy them baby, you see, because I couldn't afford to stock my place with big ones. Besides, it's much more fun to watch them grow. I almost thought some of the apples might flower this year. I've been waiting now for three. But there isn't a bud."

"There's a tree in blossom in the shadow there."

"That's a wild apple tree."

Anna moved with a sigh. He had been watching her for all his quietness. Now he said quickly, "My name's Woodin. What can I do for you?"

"If you could get me out of this—back to the station! I left the train for a few minutes at Milbrook, foolishly walked into the woods, and was lost. I heard the train go on without me."

"Milbrook? You've come eight miles through the woods. I don't think you could go back that way to-night."

"I'm sure I couldn't. But isn't there a road—a wagon?"

He shook his head. "My road's the river. It's the road by which I shall take my fruit to market at Milbrook when I have any.....But it's a long way against the stream, and there's no place for you to stop when you get there." He swung off the fence and stood beside her, and she saw that he was tall. "Hadn't you better stop here till the morning?" he said.

"Here?"

His eyes were on hers; she thought they held a curious look of expectancy. "Why not? I'm all alone here, but my sister used to stay with me a good deal at first. Her room's as she left it, and her things.....You can have the whole house to yourself, if you like."

* * *

ANNA was silent. Then again fear rose in her; not of him, but of something intangible, inevitable, that seemed to be closing in on her as a little while ago the trees had done. She felt she must escape, get away, or she would lose herself. That shaken self she huddled into an armor of reserve, of habit.....She heard herself say, in a conventional voice, "That's very good of you, but I couldn't think of—of disturbing you so much. If you could put me on my way....." Her voice shook a little and broke. He came quite close to her, looked down at her with eyes that held nothing now but a strange pity.

"Poor little girl," he said under his breath, "poor little girl,—afraid of all the wrong things!"

Anna was dumb, though that appeal cried in her; it was years since anyone had called her a little girl.

He did not attempt to alter her decision. He said, "Well, if you would prefer not to stay here, there is only one thing to be done. I must take you, not up the river to Milbrook, but down the river to Fort Cedar. There is a summer hotel there. They'd take you in until to-morrow, and the train stops at the junction, two miles on." He looked at her almost with mockery. "You're not afraid?"

"Of what?" Anna's voice was cold. "Of the river. There are rapids below here. It is a hazardous journey at night."

"I am not afraid." Then her pride broke before that queer terror, not of the woods only: of something greater than the woods "Mr. Woodin," she said desperately, "I think I'll die if you don't get me out....."

"I'll get you out if I can." The compassion was in his tone again. "But at least you'll stay long enough to let me make you some coffee?"

"I'd rather not stop for anything."

"As you please. You need not stop. My canoe is right here."

He led her to a little landing-stage at the foot of the orchard where a canoe was moored. While he was bringing paddle and cushions from a shed, Anna stood watching the young moon trembling in the quick current; it seemed for ever passing away, yet was always there. The large evening was clear and chill, a few stars showing. She could smell the aromatic leaf-buds of the little orchard-trees.

Without a word he made the canoe ready and held it for her; without a word she stepped in. He thrust off. The current took them. In a clear hollow of the woods she saw the new orchard, the dark house, and the moonlit snow of the wild-apple tree swing aside, recede, and vanish.

She glanced back at him once. He was gazing above and beyond her. Now and then he dipped the paddle lightly. The current bore them on silently; she was amazed at the power of the quiet stream to which she had surrendered herself.

The woods went past in a stream of shadow. Once he worked the canoe close inshore. She saw rocks in mid-stream. A wild vine stretched its tendrils across the bows; Anna leaned forward and thrust the green stuff away; it was warm to the touch; it was as if the forest tried to hold her back.

Then again they were out in full water, stars winking alongside, the forest passing like a shadow. Woodin did not speak. He seemed to have forgotten Anna. The slender moon was nearly set.

It sank at last behind the concealing forest. Then the man suddenly backed the canoe, held it against the current; she saw the paddle quiver with the strain. He said quickly, "There's still time to go back. Are you sure you want to go on?"

"Quite sure, thank you."

"The bad water's just ahead. Are you sure you don't mind? You're not afraid?"

"I'm not afraid," said Anna again, proudly.

He held the canoe a moment yet, looking at her. "You'll trust me for this," he said softly, "not for the other.....Poor little girl."

The paddle flashed. A stroke or two, and Anna felt the canoe caught in a grip like that of a great hand. Round a sudden bend of the channel, a great music came to her. She saw something glimmering in the young night like the wild apple tree, white as snow.

She had never been in danger in her life, any more than she had ever been in solitude, or great fear, or love..... Only her pride now kept her motionless.

The rapids were yet some distance off; but all the waters in the world seemed pressing behind them, thrusting the canoe towards that thunderous blossoming of the foam.

"Sit still."

Instinctively, at the tone of command, she glanced back at Woodin. And at the instant, she saw it happen.

The paddle snapped in his hands.

It seemed to her to snap soundlessly. The canoe swung broadside to the current. At the same moment, Woodin rose in his place and held out his arms. His face was white; his eyes shone on her.

"Trust me," he said clearly "Trust me....."

She rose also. As he caught her to him, she yielded. They leapt from the canoe together.

Yielding to him and to the river, Anna knew a sensation of extraordinary peace, a cessation of all fear. She knew then that, though she died, she would not be afraid.

Then the water took them.

She had time for one thought,—that the weight upon her was not of water, but of iron, crushing her; then no thought at all. But she was conscious that Woodin held her fast.

When life and thought returned to her, she was lying on something hard which vibrated in a continuous thunder of sound. She raised her head dizzily, and something white as flower-petals floated in her face. She was lying on a rock at the head of the rapids; Woodin was kneeling over her, sheltering her from the spray.

For a minute neither spoke. Then the man said slowly, "I thought you were—lost. I thought I'd lost you as soon as I'd found you."

"No. No, I'm—not lost."

In a minute he said, "You're safe here. I managed to swim a little across the current and reach this rock. It's one of many. When you're ready, I can carry you ashore."

With that strange and lovely simplicity which was like the opening of a flower, Anna raised her hands and said, "I'm ready. Take me."

Through the drift and glimmer and thunder of the rapids, stepping from rock to rock, he carried her to the shore.

"Now I can walk," said Anna. He set her down. They began to walk up

THE OIL OF JOY

BY GRACE M. CAMPBELL

MOLLY, my darling, the election men are below. Primp your raven locks, and don your charming smile, and come to be beamed on for your vote."

Norma Graham smoothed her own sleek, bobbed head, and shook her friend urgently by the shoulder.

"Not a primp from me, nor a smile either," was the rejoinder. "Oh, I'll vote on Saturday for your curly-headed Don, don't fear; but as for to-night—well, ever since I came to college, I've gone down to meet the Alma Mater candidates. They've talked politely to me—very obviously from a sense of duty—then they've snubbed me on the Monday after elections. They weren't rude. They just couldn't remember so insignificant a person as I. So, to-night I'm going to go into the little matter of Chaucer's versification undisturbed by the revelry below." And Molly Adair turned resolutely to the "Canterbury Tales" and began to scan vigorously.

Norma sat down on the bed.

"Don't let me keep you," Molly went on. "I've got a grouch I suppose, but trot along, and don't worry because I'm not a social success, my dear."

Her room-mate swung her feet thoughtfully.

"Don't think me a brute, Molly, but—tell me honestly—do you care enough to make a real effort? Could you transfer some of your interest from the Knight, or the Priest, or the Clerk, in those old fourteenth Century tales, to real, live men of this year of our Lord? They have characters to study too, and they're frightfully interesting, but if you haven't got the natural Come-hither of the born flirt or of the raving beauty, you've got to go after their interest."

"Did you go after your Don?"

"I did not. But I went after being decently interesting to his sex. There! Scuse me, Molly, if I was a bit snappy."

"My fault really, wasn't it? But as they say in the funny papers, 'Talk on. You interest me strangely!'"

"The fact is I interest myself. I think it's this way. We have men here in this University who will be real leaders of the country in the near future. Well—they're worth knowing. But to know them you must be decently approachable. They really have something to give us towards our education, contact with the masculine point of view in a high form."

"That's all very well, but for me—"

"You! You'd make the best kind of pal for a worth-while man, and it's a shame for you to miss him."

"But college offers more than just good times with boys."

"Oh, I don't mean you to neglect your work. The opportunity one gets here is too precious to neglect. But one can't work all the time. And in your leisure why not cultivate the genus homo a bit?"

"You'd make a fine match-making mother, wouldn't you?" laughed Molly.

"Yes. Can't you see me?" agreed Norma. "And don't be surprised if I turn you into the belle of the house."

With a hasty kiss, aimed promiscuously in the direction of Molly's ear, Norma fled downstairs.

LEFT to herself, Molly smiled a bit ruefully. "She's a dear, generous soul," she reflected, "and deserves her Don. Think what it would be like to have a man look at you the way he does at Norma when he thinks no one can see! Or even to have a good man friend to take you snow-shoeing, or walking, or anything! Chaucer, you old octosyllabic wretch—I!" and the volume landed plump among the pillows.

Bye and bye she stole out into the hall. All the other girls were down in the big drawing-rooms. It was a time-honoured custom that, before the University elections, the candidates and a committee of their supporters should visit the girls' residence to solicit votes and, incidentally, to spend a jolly evening.

Molly curled up on the radiator coils, conveniently luke-warm and listened. Laughter floated up to her, and the deep tones of men's voices. Presently the chandeliers rattled with an uproarious rendering of "On The Old Ontario Strand," and with song and laughter the evening passed below. Up-stairs, Chaucer was being sadly neglected, while a tousled-headed maiden choked back her tears, and ached with longing for a share in the good-fellowship of it all. She came back to her room finally, switched on the light over the mirror, and stared indignantly at her reflection.

"And I'm not so darned bad-looking either," she remarked.

Then she smoothed her hair, powdered her nose, rescued Chaucer from his ignominious position, and when Norma returned, was serenely putting the finishing touches to an exercise on Chaucer's treatment of the Octosyllabic.

Next afternoon Molly brought up the subject again. Norma, settled luxuriously in the one arm chair the room boasted, and which had been affectionately personified Morris, tucked one foot under her and prepared for serious discussion.

"Just land right into me," began Molly. "Don't spare my feelings a bit. Diagnose and prescribe as impersonally as you please. I'm not going to mind."

"Well," rejoined the other judiciously, "in magazine advertisements all they do is join a sewing club or something like that, and then simply revel in swanky little fire-light party, all beautiful and astounding, and just carry everybody off their feet."

Molly laughed incredulously and Norma hugged her knees in joyous anticipation.

* * *

SUNDAY evening came. Neither Molly nor Norma went to church, but when all the house was quiet they began their mysterious preparations. "Remember that I'm in command to-night," announced Norma, "and that what I say goes."

Molly did not reply. Already the excitement had brought a flush to her cheeks and a glow to her thoughtful eyes. She took down her hair, and Norma brushed it till it was soft and fluffy—it was too dusky and cloudy to shine. Then her face and neck were creamed and powdered with a nice attention to detail, her eyebrows shaped, and her cheeks vigorously massaged.

"Man," mumbled Molly during the process, "may be fearfully and wonderfully made, but woman is fearfully and clothes and proposals. But there's more to it than that in real life. However, far be it from me to minimize the value of smart duds. Can you spare any cash?"

"I can—some. But I'm no gold-mine," was the answer.

"Of course not. Few of us are at this blessed old school. If you could manage about four yards of heavy, deep-blue crepe, Molly, we could make the loveliest lark-spur dress you ever dreamed of."

"There's so much in the power of suggestion," continued Norma. "That's psychology for you. If you know that your gown is lovely and makes your eyes a deeper blue and your hair a cloudy black, you immediately become desirable in your own opinion, and then it's a mere matter of contagion for the rest of the world to agree. Do you see the point, and are you game?"

"To the last ditch I'm with you. Lead on Macduff!" And Molly raised her hand as if to take an oath.

"We'll work in deep secrecy. Then on Sunday night, you'll come down to our wonderfully made up, if they all go through this."

Her hair was twisted low and soft at the back of her head, and last of all, the lark-spur gown was slipped over her shoulders. As Norma had anticipated, it deepened the blue in her eyes, and its soft folds revealed the slim, boyish lines of her figure. She was a very delectable young person as she finally stood before the long mirror, while Norma hovered in the back-ground, anxious and admiring.

"You're as fussy as an old mother hen whose stupid little chick has turned into a bird of paradise," accused Molly.

"Molly, on my honour, you're just beautiful. If you love me play up to that dress. Realize that you are beautiful. Sit down beside that drawing-room fire to-night and love your dress, and know that you're looking gorgeous and that any man in his right senses would be tickled to death to talk to you by the hour."

On Sunday evenings the girls of the Belvidere entertained informally in the big drawing-rooms. Many college men were in the habit of dropping in for a pleasant hour or two before the open fire. Anyone might come with the comfortable feeling that he would not be called upon to devote himself to any particular girl.

Before the church-goers were due home, Molly and Norma, studiously casual, were reading before the fire, but suppressed excitement hung in the air. Then came the sound of feet on the frosty door-step.

"Norma," faltered Molly, "I'm scared. I know I'll be a stick. I'm—"

"Sh-h!" hissed the other frantically. "Don't you dare. I'd never forgive you. What's a man? Pooh! Simple creatures! Easy to put it over! Play up—you've got to."

Molly rallied. Her colour came back, as in the hall without topcoats were being removed and hats dispensed with.

"If you're up against it," was Norma's final injunction, whispered but emphatic, "faint dead away—limp, remember. Be carried out, if necessary, but be into things whatever happens."

Then the door opened. First came the girls, then several men, most of them old acquaintances, and last of all, Donald Brandon, Norma's special property, with a tall boy whose close-cropped, brown head seemed almost to touch the lintel of the door. A pregnant glance from Norma to Molly announced as they entered, "Here's your chance!"

Introductions over, everyone settled comfortably around the fire.

"So you two didn't go to Church," came Madge's bright tones, leading off in the conversation as usual.

"No," the rejoinder came unexpectedly from Molly, "but we've really been having quite an interesting time."

"Sounds like a mystery," remarked someone.

Hugh Blair, Donald Brandon's friend, turned to Molly.

"I suppose you wouldn't tell a fellow?"

"Why no," she dimpled, "but you might find out in time."

Inwardly she gasped at herself. Here was she, talking small talk, an accomplishment she had never hoped to attain. She drew a long breath and—kept on.

Norma passed close by her, on the pretext of getting a cushion, and managed to whisper,

"That's the trick, Molly, You've hit it."

Said Don, "What's on your mind, Norma? You've been watching Molly Adair as if she might take wing. She is rather brilliant to-night, but—"

Norma giggled. "If you only knew!" she murmured ecstatically. "But Don, tell me about your Mr. Blair. Is he nice?"

"He's first rate. We met in France, and we're rooming together now."

Molly still glowed in her little blue gown, and though none could have called her spectacular yet others than Donald Brandon recognized an undeniable charm. Hugh Blair was watching her, and every sudden flash of brilliance brought his quick response.

Later she found herself beside Don, whom she knew and liked as a brother. She talked naturally and happily to him, and more than once her laughter rang out. Looking across the circle, her eyes met Hugh Blair's and from sheer gratitude for his appreciation of her, she smiled such a friendly and happy little smile straight across to him, and his response came so quick and flashing, that Molly quite thrilled with a sense of power.

After the lights were out upstairs, Molly confided with awe in her voice,

"Norma, he asked me if I snow-shoed. Thanks be! That's one thing I can do. And he said just before he left that he hoped to see me again soon. Norma, dear, are you satisfied with me?"

"Molly, my love," came Norma's hearty tones from the other cot, "you were lovely. I couldn't keep my eyes off you. And how, HOW, did you learn so quickly?"

"Learn what?" demanded Molly.

"Oh, just to hold the interest once aroused, as they say in the short-story class."

"Honest, Norma, I don't know. A gift from the gods I guess."

"Or from old mother Eve more likely. But we must go to sleep, honey. Monday morning comes soon, and no last minute rushes for us if that hair of yours is to be up at the proper angle. Bet you a box of walnut centres that he takes you out on theatre night."

"Wouldn't it be wonderful? And to think that you did it all!"

"Bless you, honey, all I did was to give you a boost," came Norma's sleepy reply.

THE event of the autumn semester was theatre-night. As Norma had predicted, Molly received her invitation from Hugh Blair. It was a very new and delicious feeling for her, that of being sought after, and she was a bit incoherent and breathless as she told Norma of it.

"I'll wear my pink taffeta. It has been lying for months in that long white box, like my dead hopes in their coffin. But now for the resurrection!" and she went down on her knees to rescue the box from its retreat under the bed, and to reassure herself that the taffeta was still crisply lovely.

On theatre-night she shone with a soft radiance of utter happiness, a kind of surprised and grateful happiness at the unexpected kindness of the gods. Her joy must have communicated itself to her companion, for surely of all the happy throng that crowded the Opera House that night Hugh fairly radiated pride and delight. What matter if, according to custom immemorial, his boon companions from the galleries roared their witticisms at him, telling him when to smile and what to say to her. He hardly heard them.

That night Molly confided to Norma, "I'm not going to sleep for hours. What's that Scripture verse about the 'Oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness'? I've been anointed with the oil of joy, and as for the spirit of heaviness—well, as said our friend, the raven, 'Nevermore.'"

She drew a long breath of happiness, and went on;

"What bliss it is to have a man admire one! I could star in Philosophy all my life, and Jean and Madge would look pityingly at me every time I went to a show with just a girl. But now I count, glory be, I count!"

"And you will count more," added Norma. "There is a streak of Scottish persistence in you that insists that you make a good job of anything you undertake. Go to it, honey, with all my blessing. But now, pretty creature, sleep. It's one of the clock, and I have French at nine, to say nothing of your Philosophy."

"Oh, Philosophy!" scoffed Molly with large recklessness. "But go to sleep, Norma darling. You have had beaux ever since your pinafore days, and you haven't the remotest idea of what it feels like to wake up from being a wall-flower and have a man send you roses. I'm going to lie here and luxuriate."

NORMA'S prediction that Molly would count still more was verified by events. To the "Conversat," one of the more informal of the dances, she went with a medical student. More sure of herself now, she danced and glowed and sparkled, and spread round her, like a contagion, her own joy in it all. And—so easily it comes to the daughters of Eve—she coquetted delicately with the men who crowded for a place on her programme smiling so regretfully on the disappointed ones, and so delightfully on those with whom she danced, that she was quite irresistible. She had a glorious and wonderful evening. All the glamour and romance of the world seemed aglow within the stately rose pillars of Grant Hall. The music enfolded her; the soft lights and the perfume of countless roses beat about her, and her heart opened to it all like a flower turned to the sun.

Home from the dance, and perched on the sturdy arm of "Morris," Molly discussed the evening with her roommate.

"I did have such a good time. I was so happy that it wasn't the least bit of trouble being lovely to everybody, and I never thought of being shy. Still being a success at a dance is not really difficult. You merely need to talk to each man as if you found him absolutely fascinating and were so sorry to have him leave at the end of the dance. The big, strong, masculine ones like you meek and adoring. The young ones like to be reassured that you consider them men of the world and frightfully experienced, probably with a dark past. Those who really are blase seem to prefer the simple and natural. And one and all they like you to be tremendously interested in them. The dear things do love to be flattered!"

Norma shouted with laughter.

"Molly, you heartless thing, you've reduced it to a science. You'll soon be writing a thesis on the psychology of the eligible male. But don't be too ruthless with Hugh Blair. Don says he was a marvel in France and went through terrible things. I think Don would slay anybody who would hurt him now."

"Well," laughed Molly, "I don't intend to do anything to excite Don to homicide."

MOLLY soon found herself in a social whirl. Her natural conscientiousness forced her to give her work due attention, and her keen brain enabled her to keep quite abreast of her classes. But she was much sought after and dances, snow-shoe parties, and theatres figured rather largely in her life. Men who formerly failed to remember her over night, and who quite resigned themselves if they were forced to spend a half hour with her, were now enthusiastic over her vivacity and charm.

Hugh Blair did not dance, but at every skating-party and snow-shoe tramp he was invariably eager for her company. And he had become a regular attendant at the Sunday night parties at the residence.

And—so easily it comes to the daughters of Eve—she coquetted delicately with the men who crowded for a place on her programme.

So winter passed into Spring, and social affairs practically ceased as, with the approach of examinations, life became very serious.

April came with slanting, sun-shot rains, and green in the parks and on the campus slopes. The twenty-ninth of the month was Molly's birthday, luckily free from examinations and warm with the spring sun. She awakened lazily from a late sleep, to see Norma bringing in a long green florist's box. More sophisticated now, Molly had not yet outgrown her thrill over flowers. She opened the box with reverent fingers, and there lay, damply fragrant, long-stemmed red roses. On the back of Hugh Blair's card was, "May I come at three?"

Molly handed the card to Norma, exclaiming, "I've no idea how he knew this was my birth-day, unless—"

She searched Norma's face. Norma laughed guiltily and defended herself, "Well, why shouldn't I? He's Don's best friend, and he's so obviously fond of you."

"Do you think he is?" inquired Molly thoughtfully. "I can't imagine why. I certainly never feel brilliant when I am with him, or at all master of the situation. Let's put the roses in water."

In the afternoon Hugh suggested a walk. They resolved at the outset not to spoil the day with any discussion of examinations.

"But," begged Molly, "Tell me what you are going to do when Convocation is over, and you have got your B. Sc."

"Oh, it's the West for me. I've the promise of a place out there after mid-summer. Till then I'll be at home. You, I suppose, will be home for the summer, having a gay time."

"Yes, I'll be at home. But I'll miss college so. Isn't it a wrench when it comes to leaving? But how lovely the lake is!"

They had followed the lake-shore road past gray Rockwood, and had entered the park. On the sunny slopes the grass was green and soft, and the old wooden benches basked in the sunshine. Before them Lake Ontario rolled in sun-lit splendour, and tossed its foam against the gray stones on the shore.

The two crept down the rough hewn rocks to the water's edge. There, in a little cove with rocky sides and smooth weathered seat, they sat and felt delightfully shut off from the every-day world. So close was the shining wonder of the water, and so wide and high the sky, that Molly was awed and silent.

"Isn't it wonderful?" she broke silence. "And it seems to call one so. Sometimes it's cruel—I've seen it from the Martello tower in a storm. But now it's so exultant that it thrills even while it frightens."

"It makes one feel like asking for more worlds to conquer, like that old Macedonian chap."

"You want to sail the seas like a conqueror, I observe," she laughed up at him, "or like a Viking from a saga."

"Well," confessed Hugh, "my first ambition was to be a pirate on a large scale. Chemical engineering seems a bit tame in comparison. However the first plunge into real work will be the worst, and as you say, leaving college is a real wrench. One just realizes his lost opportunities then."

"But you have worked hard," Molly objected.

"Oh, yes! I've worked," he admitted, "but why didn't I meet you two years ago? That is my idea of a lost opportunity."

Molly made an effort to pass this lightly by, but to her consternation, she failed to find any rejoinder.

"And now," continued Hugh, "now that I'm getting to know you, I'm leaving. Are you going to forget me?"

She was tongue-tied. What was one to do when a solemn young giant asked such disturbing questions? She was trembling with nervousness, but beneath her dismay was a queer, little, illogical thrill of joy.

Hugh continued impetuously:

"I'm not going to let you forget me. I love you. I love you madly, tenderly, little Molly Adair." And he bent and kissed her tightly clasped fingers.

All Molly's old shyness descended with a cold numbness upon her. She was faint with it, and felt with an awful certainty that in another minute she would be in tears. She rose suddenly and stiffly and remarked in a tone shades colder than she knew,

"Hadden't we better go up? The wind from the lake is cool."

After one hurt and bewildered look, Hugh rose quietly and followed her up the steep slope. She seemed even to shrink from his proffered aid as they scrambled to the top of the bank. There he faced her.

"You won't even answer me, Molly?" he questioned.

Molly was searching futilely for her handkerchief. She mustn't, MUSTN'T cry, she kept telling herself.

"I guess I've got my answer now, Molly," said Hugh. "Don't distress yourself about it any more. Is that your handkerchief down on the rock?" he added, and pointed to a white flutter near the water's edge.

She watched him scramble over the ledges and down to the little cove. Suddenly a little breeze lifted the handkerchief and dropped it into the water. It floated lightly out. With only a moment's hesitation, Hugh sprang for a large, smooth boulder that rose out of the lake a few feet from shore. From this vantage point he caught the handkerchief as it rode the ripples. He wrung it dry, balanced himself for the return leap, and sprang. The stones at the water's edge were wet and waterworn, and his foot slipped as he landed.

Molly saw his sudden fall, and watched him anxiously. When he did not rise, she hurried down the rocky path. As she climbed over boulders and let herself down over ledges, one refrain beat itself out in her brain: "He's dead, he's dead, and I love him. Why didn't I tell him?"

When she reached him, he was lying quite still, and horribly limp and helpless. She straightened his long body, and eased his posture as well as she could. She dipped the handkerchief which he held clutched in his hand, into the lake, so conveniently near, and bathed his forehead.

She felt for a possible bruise, and found where his head had struck a projecting bit of rock.

"Concussion," she groaned. "And maybe he's dead."

She dropped on her knees beside him suddenly, slipped one arm around his neck, and kissed him full on the lips.

"Oh, Hugh," she murmured brokenly, "forgive me and open your eyes. I do love you, Hugh!"

New Gifts For Old

BY OLIVE DELAHAYE

Illustrated by Maude MacLaren

NOTHING could have been more convenient for everybody. While Mr. and Mrs. Gibson went to the seaside for the rest and change which the doctor had recommended for them both, their married daughter, Helena Lawson, whose large house in Montreal was undergoing repairs, arranged to come to Clifton with her family of children, there to recuperate from the cares and trials of a busy society winter. In this way not only would the Gibson home be taken care of, but Mr. Gibson would receive a monthly cheque for rent that would be a great assistance in meeting the heavy hotel bills at St. Andrew's-by-the-Sea.

In the eyes of everyone but themselves the Gibsons were growing old. Mr. Gibson had passed the seventy mark a few days before, while his wife was in the early sixties, a time when the desire to work is usually in excess of the strength required for any arduous duties. The bookstore from which Mr. Gibson derived his income had long been practically under the direction of his elder son, so that it was a comparatively easy matter for the father to arrange an indefinite absence from business. As for Mrs. Gibson, her children had always been the absorbing care of her life; and, when they had grown up, before she could turn her attention to other interests, grandchildren had slipped in to fill the void which her children had left in the old house. Mrs. Gibson was everlastingly being asked to take care of a Nancy, or a Jack or a Fred. She was always knitting little sweaters or making embroidered dresses, or helping her daughters nurse one of their children through the tedious illnesses incidental to childhood; but she did all this so cheerfully that no one ever dreamed that she would like to do anything else until the sudden breakdown came, and a few incautious words spoken on her sick-bed revealed Mrs. Gibson's longing for a change from housekeeping and nursing.

It was then that Mr. Gibson suggested going to the seaside. For more years than he cared to remember he had never taken a holiday with his wife, but once long ago they had spent a few days at St. Andrew's and Mr. Gibson never forgot the delightful sensation of the salt wind blowing on his cheeks, or the exhilaration of the air which made him feel like a boy again.

"Let's go to St. Andrew's, Marcia," he begged so eagerly that his wife smiled back at him lovingly, and fell asleep with the sound of ocean waves echoing in her ears.

As soon as she heard of her parents' decision, Helena wrote offering to take the house. She said Clifton would be the very place in which to spend the Summer, and she promised that her children should not be allowed to injure the furniture or the garden which was her father's most cherished possession. When she read this paragraph of her daughter's letter, Mrs. Gibson could not help smiling as she glanced around the shabby dining room at the shabby furniture and worn rugs that were a characteristic of the Gibson home. Still it was kind of Helena to want to come, while her plan certainly would simplify the old troublesome question of expense. For this reason, after she had talked it over with her husband, Mrs. Gibson gratefully accepted her daughter's suggestion, and a few days after the Gibsons had set out on their journey to the sea, the Lawsons came from Montreal to take up their abode in the simple town house so filled with memories of the Gibson children's childhood.

Several years had passed since Helena had visited the old home in Clifton so that her recollection of what it looked like had grown dim. She knew that it was shabby, but she had no idea that it was quite so shabby as it appeared when she went from room to room on a tour of investigation. None of the furniture had been changed since Helena was a girl. The ugly walnut dining-room suite with its high sideboard and narrow table, the square piano with its fluted legs and the wooden bedsteads carved by machinery still held the places which had been theirs long ago. Only in the living room there had been some slight attempts at modernizing, and here a few reed chairs and some baskets of ferns gave the room a cosy appearance which the others lacked.

Laughingly Mrs. Lawson commented to her husband on this one alteration. "I don't see how Mother brought herself to do it," she observed. "She is so conservative, and she never seemed to have much taste about furniture. Perhaps it was because all the furniture was ugly in the years when Father and Mother set up housekeeping, and then Father bought everything we have, but Mother never worried about whether it was pretty or not. She was more interested in giving us good meals."

"And a good thing too," commented Mr. Lawson approvingly. "Anyway the house looks good enough for me. It was a fine idea our coming here instead of taking a cottage. A man has room to stretch his legs, and one isn't worried to death for fear the children will drown themselves in the lake, or get run over by an automobile. As for furniture I suppose your mother didn't care about it. Lots of women don't."

THIS opinion coincided so nearly with her own that Helena never dreamed of entertaining any other until one day she discovered the little red notebook in a drawer of an old desk in the attic. At first Helena could not imagine what it was because the pages were closely covered with writing and figures under such curious titles as, "grand piano, davenport or electric stove." It was only when she had studied the different entries for some time that Mrs. Lawson was able to grasp their significance. Then her eyes filled with smarting tears and it was some minutes before she could take the little book downstairs, to consult her sister who was visiting her, about its contents.

For in the page after page of her Mother's fine writing Helena discovered something she had never dreamed of before. Mrs. Gibson loved beauty with an intensity of emotion scarcely to be understood. All her life long she had craved for it in her surroundings, her home and her clothes. All her life she had been vividly conscious of its absence from the Gibson house; but it had been necessary to sacrifice beauty in material things for beauty of infinitely more value. This book was the record of these sacrifices, a tender, little concession to Mrs. Gibson's unfulfilled desires, the imaginative expression of her wishes. In it, Helena's mother balanced her wants against realities. Instead of a grand piano, there were music lessons for Helena and Rosamonde and Hugh. Instead of new bedroom furniture which would turn the sunny rooms into replicas of some of those in "The Home Beautiful," money had been spent to send Hugh to college. Instead of velvet suits and handsome furs for Mrs. Gibson there were parties and concerts for all of the children. All her life Mrs. Gibson had been playing a game of which this little red book was the record. As if she were working in Permutations and Combinations, as Hugh had done in his Algebra, the loving mother bought one thing and pretended that she had purchased something else, Helena's new ulster took the place of a piano lamp, and Rosamonde's party dress was converted into a satin comforter. There were so many ulsters and party dresses. For the first time in her life Helena realized what buying them had involved; and for the first time with a bitter intensity of longing she wished that she and Rosamonde had been more moderate in their demands for luxuries.

Once, twice, three times, Helena read the little book tabulating its contents in her mind. Then with scarcely a word she handed it over to Rosamonde while she herself went to the telephone to ask Hugh to come over to see them that evening. "Don't bring Cicely," she urged, speaking of Hugh's wife. "This is something for us to settle among ourselves."

"But what can we do?" demanded Hugh in masculine exasperation when Helena had shown him the book several hours later, and he had at last grasped the significance of its contents. "I'm sure it is out of the question for us to refurnish the whole house and I doubt if Mother would like it if we did."

Helena smiled. "I've got a plan," she said. "It's a splendid plan and it can't help but succeed. Still I am not going to tell it to you yet. You have to have a day or two for this to sink into your mind. Then when I make my suggestion I am sure that you will be willing to accept it. As for Rose I can count on her. One always counts on Rose."

Hugh left his parents' house with an uncomfortable feeling tugging at his heart. He was able to remember as Helena could not, the intense disappointment experienced by his mother on several occasions when Mr. Gibson had bought new furniture for the home, furniture of which the only recommendation was that it was cheap and strong, guaranteed to last as it had lasted until its owner was weary of its very sight. Moreover Hugh could not help thinking uncomfortably of the beautiful walnut desk which he had lately added to the contents of his own bedroom. It furnished such a marked contrast to the golden oak table which did service for his father.

During the rest of the week Hugh's brain mulled over the situation which his sister had outlined, without his being able to come to any solution of the difficulty of providing for some of his mother's wishes out of the means at his disposal. For this reason he was heartily glad when Helena relented and called him into consultation about the proposal she had to make.

"It's all as simple as it can be," Helena assured them when once again the little red book had been exhibited and Rosamonde had wiped the tears from her eyes. "If Mother could put up with furniture she hated for thirty years I guess it is our turn to put up with it now. Between us all we have nearly everything Mother has wanted all this time. I have the piano and the white enamel bedroom suite. Rose has the dining-room furniture, and Hugh has just what Father needs to make a handsome bedroom."

"But what about us?" demanded Hugh and Rosamonde in unison. "What are we to do? We can't buy more."

Helena laughed. "Why we will take Mother's old stuff," she answered blithely. "I'll admit it will be a bit of a blow to our pride but what is pride where love is concerned? It is the least we can do when we think what Mother and Father have done for us. Where would you be Rose without your music or Hugh without his college education?"

"And where would you be if you had not gone to school in Montreal?" retorted Rosamonde gaily. "It is a case of the pot calling the kettle black. Well I am game now Helena. I understand what you mean. When is the exchange to take place?"

"As soon as possible," returned Helena. "This house is going to be a bower of beauty before I leave it or my name is not Helena Lawson."

"Hurrah for you," cried her husband from the doorway. "But I want to have a finger in this pie too. Why could we not have the whole house done over? It needs paper and paint far more than ours did down in Montreal."

Helena hesitated. "Could we afford to do both houses?" she asked doubtfully, but her husband was quick to take her up.

Taking the Scissors From Baby

BY MABEL V. LANGWORTHY

Illustrated by E. J. Dinsmore

AN impassioned robin was pouring forth his even-song and Aunt Jool softly raised the sitting-room window to give him better audience. Across the street a group of children played hopscotch, their shrill young voices forming a running accompaniment to the robin's warble. Suddenly a little doll with a red tam o'shanter on her dark curls spied the face at the window and, still poised on one foot, waved a merry greeting. The woman smiled brightly and blew a kiss in exchange.

"Auntie,"—it was Patsy's voice from the stair—"where did you put my candy-apron,—the little Dutch one I embroidered?"

Aunt Jool turned from the window. "It's still in the clothes-basket, dear," she confessed, as she emerged into the hall. "Is Will coming to-night?"

The girl leaned over the banister and affectionately patted the grey head below. "Yes," she said, "he's coming at eight,—the old candy-fiend. And I'll iron that apron, Auntie, you look tired." She tripped lightly up the stairs again and Aunt Jool went back to the window.

The children were gone now, and the robin, his vespers ended, seized a luckless earthworm and disappeared among the eaves.

In the hush that followed, Aunt Jool folded the little red sweater she had been knitting and yielded herself to the mood of the hour. She was conscious of the unfinished ironing awaiting her, but the robin's carol, the children's laughter and the scent of "green things growing" were luring her down the valley of memory to scenes and incidents that other and happier Springs had crowned.

The sharp ring of the telephone broke the spell. Aunt Jool started to answer it, then hearing Patsy run down the stairs she passed on to the kitchen.

A moment later Patsy appeared at the door, her pretty face flushed and an indignant sparkle in the big grey eyes.

"What's the matter, honey?" asked Aunt Jool, looking up from the clothes basket.

"It's Will," flamed Patsy, "he's not coming."

"That's too bad. Business again?"

"I didn't wait to find out. I just rang off."

"My dear! Another quarrel?"

"Well, I'm tired of this sort of thing, Aunt Jool, and I'm going to give Will a piece of my mind—you see if I don't." To bar a possible plea for the defence she flounced away and the little French heels registered keen displeasure as they tapped their way up to her room.

Aunt Jool sighed. "I'm afraid we've spoiled Patsy, Gunga Din," she said, as for the third time she picked that riotous young feline out of the clothes-basket. He promptly climbed in again, and this time got the slap that was coming to him. In surprise he sought the protecting rungs of a chair, from which point of vantage he viewed his mistress with a new respect.

"You had to learn your lesson, you little black imp," laughed Aunt Jool. "You're just like Patsy,—you don't know when to quit."

The girl did not appear again that evening, and with none but the rollicking kitchen company Aunt Jool finished her ironing and worked on the little red sweater till bedtime.

In her own room, as she stepped over to pull the shade, she was startled to see a tiny, white-clad figure leaning out of the window of the house opposite.

"Madeline," she called sharply. "Do you want to catch your death of cold? Get into bed at once."

"Oh, Aunt Jool," floated back a protesting little voice. "It's not a bit cold, and it's so sweet and Springy—just smell—"

The tiny figure disappeared abruptly and the window went down with a bang.

Aunt Jool drew the shade. "Poor kiddie," she murmured, as she turned away. "Springtime appeals to youth and age alike. I feel foolishly sentimental myself, to-night."

PATSY'S tilted chin at breakfast next morning told that her pout still existed. Pouts being frequent occurrences with Patsy, Aunt Jool was not greatly disturbed until she noticed a letter protruding from beneath the girl's plate. Quarrelling by telephone is bad enough, but quarrelling by letter is serious. Aunt Jool began to experience alarm.

"I see you made good use of your evening," she remarked casually, with a glance at Patsy's plate.

The girl reddened, but made no reply. "I should have written a few, myself," continued Aunt Jool, hopefully, "but I worked on little Madeline's sweater instead."

Beneath the gaze of the sweet, anxious face opposite, Patsy unbent.

"If you must know, Auntie," she said, at length, "I wrote to Will. I told him he needn't bother coming any more—that I was tired of this unflattering habit he has of breaking engagements at the last moment."

really value him. They have a big scheme on just now and Will's right in the middle of it."

Patsy maintained a sulky silence, and the gentle voice continued: "I want to see you happy, little girl. You won't always have your old aunt to look after you, and there's no one I'd rather trust your future to than Will—"

"Any letters to mail?" It was small Madeline at the back door.

Patsy rose. "Yes, Madeline, one for me, please. I'm sorry, Aunt Jool," evading the pleading eyes, "but I've thought this out very carefully and I must really use my own judgment."

With all the dignity of twenty-one she handed the letter to the child, who put it safely in the pocket of her light Spring overcoat.

Some grim little lines came into Aunt Jool's face and settled about her mouth.

"Trot along into the kitchen with me, honey," she whispered to the smiling child, for the time being relations were just a little strained.

Left to herself, Aunt Jool produced the mooted letter and regarded it dubiously. What to do with it was the next question. It didn't seem right to burn it, yet she disliked having it in her possession. On one point she was decided,—Will must not get that letter. In the school of experience, whose fees run high in heartaches and many a vain regret, Aunt Jool had learned that it is possible to kill the most ardent love if only the right weapons are used. That Patsy, in the arrogance of her youth, might wield these weapons to her own heart's undoing was a source of apprehension to the elder woman.

"It's just like taking the scissors from a baby," she argued, as she finally slipped out the back door and "cached" the offending missive by tucking it under the stoop.

Patsy telephoned later that she would not be home for lunch; she and Molly were going to take in a matinee. Aunt Jool was immensely relieved. She still felt justified in regard to the confiscation of a foolhardy letter, but she wasn't quite ready to face its author.

Shortly after the twelve o'clock whistles had blown Madeline appeared at the back door. She was on the verge of tears and Aunt Jool took the forlorn little mite to her heart.

"Aunt Jool—the letter—" sobbed the child. "I went to mail it and it wasn't there."

Aunt Jool's conscience smote hard. "Never mind, honey," she comforted, "it wasn't your fault,—I'm sure of that. Look—see what I baked for you this morning."

No risk of spoiling her dinner marred the little one's enjoyment of the freshly-baked ginger-bread. She ate a cow and two elephants without stopping. Then, with a sigh of content, she settled back in her chair. "Nobody can hold a candle to you for baking, Aunt Jool," she said.

Aunt Jool looked at the little thing in astonishment. "Wherever did you hear that?" she asked.

"I heard Daddy say it," admitted the child. "He often talks to me about the time when you were both young and he used to go to your place for tea."

Great waves of color were flooding the woman's face. "I guess you had better run along to your dinner, now," she observed, as she bent over the cake she was icing. "And I don't think you had better say anything to Patsy about losing that letter,—she might be angry. I'll make it right with her later."

Impulsively the child threw her arms about the woman's waist. "I love you, Aunt Jool," she said, with worshipping eyes. "I wish I was your little girl." Then she disappeared.

Aunt Jool left the layer cake and went to the open window. The child's artless speech had come as a crowning touch to the pensive longings and bitter-sweet memories that had been stirred to life by the subtle influences of the Springtime. For several moments she stood looking out upon the little garden where the gay young daffies were just opening into bloom. They nodded and smiled, companionably, but to Aunt Jool their sunshiny faces seemed indistinct and far away, for her eyes were blurred with tears.

Patsy came home full of the day's doings. The shopping had been a great success; they had found a new tea-room; the matinee had been thrilling, the music superb. Aunt Jool let her rattle on.

After supper Molly, Jack Perdue and a friend of the latter's, a Mr. Sibley, came over to play five hundred. There was considerable hilarity and although to Aunt Jool, sitting in the kitchen, such terms as "Six in hearts," "She renege," "You trumped my ace," were meaningless phrases, she knew from the pitch of Patsy's voice that she was at high tension.

Next day found her still gay and talkative, and Aunt Jool felt sure that she hourly expected Will to call up and ask for a reconciliation. Aunt Jool also knew the routine well; apologies and pleading from Will, pouting and hesitation from

"Well, I'm tired of this sort of thing, Aunt Jool, and I'm going to give Will a piece of my mind, you see if I don't."

"But, dearie, you know Will always has a good reason—"

"I don't care for his reasons. Jack Perdue never disappoints Molly. He's always on hand, rain or shine."

"Jack Perdue! A fellow with no more ambition than a stuffed Thomas-cat. Why, child, he's a mere drifter compared to Will."

"It doesn't make any difference, Auntie. I'm through with Will, and when he gets my letter he'll be through with me. For one thing I told him I couldn't respect a man who breaks his engagements."

"Patsy!"

"That's what I said."

Aunt Jool looked her distress. She laid down the piece of toast she had buttered and came over to Patsy's chair. "Listen to me, girlie," she said, persuasively, as she patted the shining hair. "You're in a pique just now, but you take my advice and stick to Will,—he's pure gold. He's going to get somewhere in the world, too, and I know for a fact that his employers and the two left the dining-room together, while Patsy slipped upstairs.

In the kitchen, Aunt Jool perched the little girl on the table. "Now, shut your eyes and open your mouth and see what God will send you." This was a favorite game between them and the child screwed her eyes up tight, while her mouth flew open like a young robin's. Instantly something white and flat was transferred from her pocket to the bosom of Aunt Jool's housedress. Then a generous lump of toffee was dropped into the waiting mouth, and the eyes—two big, brown pansies—came open. Aunt Jool gazed into their velvet depths for a moment, then kissed a suddenly swollen cheek. In the distance a school-bell rang and the child wriggled to the floor and scampered away.

Patsy came downstairs, presently, dressed for the street. "I'm going shopping, Aunt Julia," she announced stiffly.

"Very well, Patricia," answered her aunt, in kind. Each understood that

The Outdoor Living Room

By COLLIER STEVENSON

The pergola-sheltered porch is both practical and artistic. It admits of the free circulation of air, yet does not darken the house of which it forms a part. It is, too, an incentive to the cultivation of the vines that are always desirable as a means of softening the contours of a house. As the floor of such a porch is more or less exposed to the weather, it should be of masonry construction. Brick, as shown in the illustration, is colorful and attractive—and its ruddy hue is especially effective in contrast with the stone walls of the house and the white-painted pergola and wood-trim. Furniture of both wood and wicker is used: the wicker pieces being stained a warm brown and cushioned with linen striped in brown, tan and salmon-pink, and the wooden pieces painted white—the soft ivory tint of the woodwork.

Green and white predominate in this attractive porch of conventional roofed-over type. Against the cool gray stonework of the house-walls the white-painted woodwork and ceiling of the porch are especially effective and the dark gray of the floor is entirely harmonious. The great stone fireplace is both decorative and practical. In addition, if the porch is to be glazed in for winter enjoyment, the fireplace is an asset of real worth. The large awning which screens this porch is of dark green, lined with white and edged with a fringe of green. The unpatterned grass rug is also of green. Several very interesting pieces of antique furniture, finished in white to match the woodwork, are used with good effect: but most of the furniture is of green-stained wicker. For the cushions, a large-patterned chintz is employed—its design being developed in green and turquoise blue on an ivory-white background. For that element of contrast that is always essential in a decorative scheme, several flower-holders of burnished copper are introduced.

As the Spring days lengthen, the call of the outdoor world rings out loud and clear to all of us. To some it may paint the joys of far-off country lanes, mountain trails or sea-lapped shores: to others the nearer pleasures of garden work or a round of golf. Again, it may bespeak the lure of a sheltered porch—that modern embodiment of outdoor comfort. And, when properly planned and appropriately equipped, the porch can unfold a magic package of Summer-long enjoyment and daily-diversified charm. Term it what we may—porch, piazza, loggia or veranda—the ideal porch of to-day is truly the outdoor living room of the home: and, as such, it both demands and rewards the discerning attention of its fortunate owners.

Let us, then, first of all delve into some of the factors that bear upon the planning of any porch that is to be successfully used as an outdoor living room. Do you remember the old-fashioned porch—a narrow affair, stretching across the entire front of the house and frequently extending around both sides as well? 'Twas utterly impossible to furnish that early porch attractively or logically: for there was not sufficient width for anything except an uncompromisingly stiff row of chairs—and certainly no room for the tables, hammocks and other appurtenances which we now deem indispensable. Furthermore, this long, narrow porch almost invariably darkened the rooms within and made them gloomy on even the brightest days. Crude as it was both practically and artistically, the early porch nevertheless served a useful purpose in furthering that love of the open air which is reflected in the outdoor living room of to-day.

That the porch be adapted in contour to a pleasant and rational disposal of furniture is really of prime importance. Of course, the matter of floor-area cannot be ignored—and the space allotted to a porch should be as large as is compatible alike with the size and the style of the house. The relative bearing of area and contour can, perhaps, best be gauged by a concrete illustration. A porch five feet wide by twenty feet long is equal in actual floor area to one ten feet long by ten feet wide: but the narrow oblong shape does not begin to compare with the square contour in possibilities from the standpoint of furniture placement. Indeed, the more nearly a porch conforms with the form and size of an average room, the easier it is to adorn and use.

But, in planning a porch of generous width, location must also be considered. Both on the score of proper privacy and relation to the rooms within-doors, the placing of the porch altogether apart from the main entrance of the house is desirable—and, when the porch is located at the side of a house, there is gained a breadth that is usually satisfying architecturally. Naturally, however the situation of the outdoor living room should never be determined without regard to the points of the compass—for any room intended for Summer use should have an exposure that, as far as possible, avoids the direct rays of the sun but catches the prevailing breezes. Nor should the matter of outlook be overlooked in selecting a site for the porch. Indeed, a pleasant outlook is so important, that it might properly receive first consideration.

There are several distinct types of porch that are well adapted to use as outdoor living rooms. Of these, of course, the conventional covered type is familiar everywhere. It has at length achieved distinction in design and excellence in equipment, though its earlier phases were weighted down with the barbarities of wooden and wrought-iron gingerbread. A porch such as this—especially if fairly wide—should not be placed against a room that has windows upon only one side, except as a last resort, because of its darkening effect during the Winter months when abundant sunlight is so desirable throughout a house. There are, however, other porch forms available. A simple wooden platform or a paved terrace can be converted into a satisfactory porch by an awning extending from the house-walls over a metal frame supported by slender iron uprights. This is an advantageous arrangement: for the awning can be removed to leave the windows of the lower floor unobscured in the Winter.

In place of an awning, a pergola is effective as a shelter in any weather except the very inclement: and, when gracefully trailed with vines, it is exceedingly attractive. Without vines, a pergola is, of course, meaningless and its usefulness as a porch-cover negligible. Vines, however, almost deserve a separate chapter: for they are simply invaluable in promoting the privacy of a porch and as a means of softening the effect of the structural lines.

When the location of the porch has been decided upon and the type of porch best adapted to that particular position determined, the question of flooring naturally arises. If the porch floor is to be very close to the ground level—and that is desirable, in order to create a low, homelike effect—it should be of masonry construction: for a wooden floor at grade level, no matter how dry the site is, lasts as a rule but a short time. Contact with the soil, especially as the timbers get little ventilation, is almost certain to cause rot. For an open terrace or any other form of uncovered porch, wood is also scarcely suitable, as it has not the durability to withstand the piled-up snows of successive Winters and the beating rains of many Summers. A flooring of wood, laid in slats with ample spaces between for water to escape, is, however, entirely satisfactory for a porch arranged on an upper story over the sloping roof of a lower porch or other "lean-to" of the house proper.

BRICK, tile, stone and cement are all suited to the requirements of a porch floor, and each is adapted to a variety of treatments. Cement, for instance, which we think of usually as a cold-looking substance, takes on real beauty when its dull gray-white surface is enlivened with inlays of tile or warm-hued brick. Flat stones of random size and shape are always effective for a porch floor: and brick, which can be laid in an endless variety of patterns, is both durable and attractive.

Although porch furnishings should, above all else, be simple, in order to express the freedom of the open air, the outdoor living room can nevertheless, with entire propriety be a place of gay color and daring pattern, keyed to the bright arabesque of Nature in the immediate surroundings. Colors pure and vivid, to echo the hundred hues of flower and foliage, do not offend the eye in the open air as they often do when used within four walls: and what is true of color applies to pattern with equal force. It is, then, to the quantity and to the type of furniture and furnishing that the rule of simplicity is applicable.

Primarily, the furniture chosen for an outdoor living room should be light in weight and strong in construction. The reason for this is obvious. A porch is so essentially informal in character, that its furniture must be light enough for moving about as occasion arises, yet strong enough to withstand harder usage than the furniture used within-doors ever receives. Even on a covered porch, there is likely to be some exposure to sun, rain and dampness: which but makes sturdy construction the more desirable.

Wickerware and willow furniture is in many ways ideal for porch use. It is light and strong: graceful, too—and, best of all, it is comfortable. In its newer development, the earlier "natural finish" has been superseded by paint, stain or enamel in colorings that range from shining black to glistening white, from royal blue to apple green: not infrequently varied by interesting combinations of two, or even three, harmonious colors. Picture, for instance, great roomy wicker chairs enameled in the softest French gray, adorned with bands of wistaria and delicate green and cushioned with a black cretonne, patterned in wistaria, rose and green. Against a plain dull green rug, the effect of this combination is especially delightful—although, to complete the decorative scheme, several cushions of plain rose linen, piped with green, are really essential.

For owners of more conservative taste, both willow and wickerware are available in quiet shades of brown and green, and with a stained finish in place of the painted or enameled surface. With this type of furniture, either patterned or unpainted cushions are appropriate—although the present vogue seemingly is solely for much-patterned fabrics of pronounced color.

Horticulturists may not have achieved a satisfactory blue rose—but interior decorators have! Blue roses—the blue of perennial larkspurs—riot with tiny yellow rosebuds and yellow-green leaves over the alluring rose-colored background of one ultra-smart chintz shown this season for porch use. Blue roses, conventionalized to a small square design, interspersed with gray foliage and diminutive black-and-white birds, lend novelty to still another chintz that has a very faint rose background—a rose that almost verges on light mauve. Blue, indeed, appears in many of the newest fabrics: not only in its lighter phases, but in shades as dark as navy.

One especially attractive cretonne has a background of broad stripes in black and navy, carrying a large foliage pattern in gray-and-white, with little parrots in their natural coloring at wide intervals. Another cretonne—and one which would be effective on either black or navy blue wickerware—is adorned with cubist flowers in sulphur-color, touched with lavender and cerise, on a solid background of navy blue.

LESS extreme and more generally available, gingham has a recognized place in the decoration of the modern porch. It is durable and washable: and its variety is almost infinite in both design and coloring. Some of the very large checks shown this year are almost perfect for porch requirements. Jade green and white, periwinkle blue and white, red and white, yellow and white—every old favorite and most of the newer hues are to be found in gingham. In buying gingham for the porch, however, there is no real economy in being governed by low prices: it is better far to give a fair price and thereby secure a fabric of guaranteed fast color—for partially faded cushions and accessories never add to the general attractiveness of an outdoor living room.

In choosing either furniture or fabrics for porch use, it is always imperative to consider the coloring of the house-walls. Vermilion, as the predominate hue, would be bright and sparkling against walls of cool white or light gray stucco: its effect against red brick walls would be distracting and discordant. A decided yellow would also be inharmonious with those red brick walls—but visualize its effect against walls of pale yellow! The house is of yellow stucco, its woodwork painted white: and on the porch the furniture is all of white, the chairs cushioned in a simple gingham of wide yellow-and-white checks. The inexpensive woven-grass rug carries a hint of blue in its border and several cushions of blue denim, piped with yellow, furnish just the requisite touch of contrast. A simple little scheme—yet one that emphasizes the importance of going slowly in choosing porch furnishings.

Not only should an effort be put forth to maintain harmony between the porch furnishings and the house, however: there is just as great need to see that the various units entering into the furnishing harmonize. The coloring of the structural woodwork of the porch must be considered, the color of the floor, of the furniture, of the fabrics used for the chair-coverings and cushions—and, what is often ignored, the color of the awnings that may be necessary to adequately screen the porch. Then, and then only, will success attend amateur effort in porch decoration.

Grass, straw and rush rugs can be found in a diversity of weave and coloring: and they are unequaled for the constant wear and tear to which a porch rug is subject. In the design and coloring of Navajo blankets, some of the woven-grass rugs are especially interesting. Attractive, too, are the grass rugs of round and oval contour: for they are reminiscent of the Colonial braided rag rugs that we value so much indoors. Occasionally, of course, the rag rugs are used on the porch: but, while they are pleasing in appearance, they are not strong enough for long-continued service out-of-doors. Navajo blankets and Scotch reversible art rugs are also often employed—but neither they nor any other type of rug is likely to supplant in popular favor the woven rug of rush, straw or grass.

And now to revert to the quantity of furniture that should be employed upon a porch: our axiom might be furniture sufficient for the uses to which the porch is to be put—and that, of course, allows a fair leeway. Even on a very small porch,

An open terrace, or uncovered porch, if placed upon the shady side of a house can be converted into a delightful outdoor living room by the addition of suitable furniture and appropriate planting. Wood is seldom satisfactory for a terrace, as the contact with the soil is almost certain to cause rot: but brick, tile, stone and cement are all well adapted to terrace construction. For the terrace depicted, a dark brick was chosen—and it harmonizes perfectly with the little English cottage of red brick and white stucco. A low hedge defines the edge of the terrace and the giant trees about the house insure ample shade at all hours of the day. As it adds very materially to the charm of the terrace, the planting is worthy of note. Vines, supported upon white-painted trellises, adorn the lower walls of the house: and they are met by a wealth of greenery that hangs from the flower-massed boxes of brown-stained wood at the second-floor windows. Furniture of quaint form is used upon the terrace: wooden chairs of Windsor design and a drop-leaf settle-table that are painted white to match the trellises and sturdy benches which are stained brown to correspond with the flowerboxes.

The attainment of a porch, such as this, is simplicity itself. The slatted floor can be laid over a sloping roof, the balustrade and an awning added—and presto! the porch has been achieved. And therein lies a good suggestion for the beautifying and utilization of the roof of a one-story kitchen or other lean-to structure. In this instance, the slatted floor is painted sand-color and an awning of tan, fringed with dark brown, is used. The cane furniture is painted white to match the balustrade and the chairs are cushioned in a chintz that carries burnt orange, blue and brown in a floral pattern upon a white background.

THE IDOL OF YOUTH

twinkle. Automobiles and aeroplanes weren't the only problems he could tackle!

"You'll have to consult your chaperon about some things, I guess, or she'll quit," he said. "If you don't, she'll think she's ignored because she's been only a saleslady, and you must remember, at a few hours' notice a saleslady in hand is worth two county dames in a bush. I bet this Miss Wellington, with fifteen years' reference from a Bournemouth store will be more of a stickler for proprieties than a Duchess—yes, even an Iron Duchess! I bet she's holding a book of etiquette in one hand now, and packing her grip with the other."

That tactful argument let me out; and I was as grateful to Henry S. as if he'd given me another thousand dollars.

Well, we started that evening at six o'clock, the five of us (including Petro) squashed into Horden's hospitable limousine.

Oh yes, Petro was really going! As Patchinka had said, he was destined to be our mascot. He had flown with Sacha in the war. He should fly with us, in Peace. What did it matter that dogs were not allowed to return to England from abroad? English laws were not made for a Polish Girl, no, not though she was half American. Miss Kapieha had come to England solely to collect the dog, without him she would not budge. Besides, neither she nor Petro was bound to come back to England ever, ever again if England did not want them. England was not their home!

These words struck cold upon my heart—that small, yet warm spot that I wished might be Patchinka's dwelling-place for ever, and in which I could find standing room for Petro as well. But the best I could do at the time was not to argue the point. Instead, I took Petro on my knees (which he over-lapped like a thick fur rug) and scratched that tit-bit of velvet softness that lies behind the fiercest-bull-dog's ear.

Miss Wellington, anxious to earn her salary and privileges, threatened to be chatty about nothing at first, the most maddening trait a woman can have. But an absent-mindedness in Patchinka's eyes, and agitation of Horden's rather conspicuous Adam's apple somehow repressed her. When we all ate sandwiches and drank coffee out of a Thermos to save stopping en route, she developed another dreadful idiosyncrasy; holding her littlest finger at right angles from the rest, while she ate, as if the digit had been a remote and dreaded contingency. But that trick also she dropped on observing Patchinka's fingers group together in a simple and natural way as she held cup or bread; and I began to hope that my choice of chaperon would work out as well as had the silk stockings and bronze hairpins.

At 10.30 we arrived at the Savoy Hotel, where Horden had phoned for a larger suite with more bath rooms; and next morning Patchinka, Miss Wellington and I were out after pass-ports.

Patchinka was already in possession of one, given her by a British consul in Sweden, when she had arrived there from Bolshevik Russia with a few jewels, one dress, and a name that would carry her anywhere. Officially, she had to be Patricia Kapieha still; but she meant to be known in Monte Carlo as she had been at Bournemouth. She didn't want everyone to know that Sacha Kapieha's half-sister had come after his aeroplane; therefore she proposed, with Horden's approval, to remain for those whom it didn't concern. "Miss P. Smith."

Passport trouble not being what it was, all went well (as reporters say in working up a par. about an accident) until the time came to buy our tickets. I had had visions—as I'd told Horden—of sending Patchinka by train de luxe, and travelling "any old way" myself. But people who wished to visit the Riviera had evidently not been scared by those rumours of a French railway strike which had excited me that night on the West Cliff. Everybody in England seemed to be going to Monte Carlo (doubtless because of Sacha's biplane, Patchinka thought) and the selfish brutes had engaged their sleeping berths weeks ahead.

We wouldn't and shouldn't wait weeks. We must go as best we could. We must stuff ourselves in anywhere, with Petro under a seat. Most women would have flunked the prospect; but not so the Iron Duke or Sacha Kapieha's sister. For Spartan travellers commend me to a girl who has escaped with her life and not much else from Bolsheviks, and a woman who has served in a shop from nine to six every day for fifteen years. Mind? Why, bless them, they found everything glorious!

To them it was thrilling to be hurled, pushed out of a stuffy train by a fighting crowd before dawn in shivering cold at Lyon railway station, for the bare hope of hot coffee and a roll. A bare hope it would have been, too, if I hadn't used trench tactics for Huns on some fat, greedy brutes, pretended I was a Tank, rushed the defences, and returned with the goods!

After endless hours of discomfort crowding, and a close compartment, most women, too, would have been dead to the charms of scenery. Most women, in fact were very much so, in that train of ours; but Patchinka and the Iron Duke were fatigue-proof. Clean, fresh, unrumpled in the midst of fug and squalor, they leaned forward to stare brightly from the windows while others snored.

"Ah, I remember!" the girl breathed as we came in sight of the rose-red rocks that jut from grim pines into sapphire blue sea. "We shall be coming to Cannes before long. Six years ago last spring! I was a child then. Now I shall soon be twenty-two—almost middle-aged. And Sacha is dead—But—the world is still beautiful."

It was divine to me. I had never been down to the south of France. Until now, for all the years that mattered France had meant fighting and trenches and bleak ruins to me. Here it was a blue and gold heaven, starred with flaming oranges and their white blossoms. I felt that nothing could go wrong with us in a place where everything was right!

We arrived at Cannes, and shed many passengers. We went on, and lost the red rocks, but had other rock of grey; soft-looking rocks like dove-coloured velvet. Red-roofed villas were draped with roses. The air (when our companions allowed us to get any) was warm and sweet with flower-perfumes. There were numerous little stations, and then big, important Nice with its background of pale mountains. But we were not getting out at Nice. We were going on to Monte Carlo. It seemed as if I (and I knew Patchinka felt the same in her tense, suppressed way) couldn't live another hour without entering that Place du Casino where reigned the aeroplane.

More stations, with musical names bawled by southern voices. Small white buildings bowered in bougainvillees, magenta crimson; distant, towering hotels, girls sauntering with their tennis racquets, under palm trees; men in flannels and Panama hats; ahead, a pinkish-grey and rather majestic rock crowned with a castle as old as time. "Monaco!" sang a voice, and Miss Wellington jumped to her feet, but Patchinka gently pushed her down.

"Ours is the next station," she said. "I remember well how I could hardly wait."

The train ran close along the shore. The water was clear green like beryl, and in the distance sapphire blue. I took down from the racks Patchinka's brand new, beautiful hand-bag; Miss Wellington's equally new but less beautiful one; and my old war-souvenir. Monte Carlo! was the golden cry. My heart thumped, but I tried to look as stolid and British as Petro did without effort, despite his many adventures.

In another minute I had the dusty bull-dog beside me on the platform, and was ready to give a hand to—no, not Patchinka, who spurned it, but to the Iron Duke.

What a strange place for a railway station! It might almost have been a flower garden, and more than half the crowd of women looked en fete in white dresses and ermine furs.

"As—cen—seur!" bellowed a boy's voice. My eyes turned to find the bellow. But Patchinka touched my arm. "You see that man in front of us—the one in a slouchy black hat and thick brown overcoat, with an astrakhan collar turned up as if he were cold?" she whispered. "Yes," I pitched my answer to the same tone. Tall man, middle-aged; thick hair as curly and black as his astrakhan. "That's the one I mean. He must have been somewhere in the train with us. Captain Malet, that's one of the Syndicate we talked about—the Spaniard."

CHAPTER XIV.

The Brown Overcoat.

I knew at once what was in Patchinka's mind. It would have been a waste of breath for me to ask the question. "What do you suppose he's here for?" and for her to answer it.

Whether she were right or wrong, I knew what the girl believed; that the Spaniard (described by Horden as a "Spanish Jew") had come to Monte Carlo because of Sacha Kapieha's aeroplane.

As for getting the machine, he might cherish the same desire and the same designs that we cherished. I could see no possible short cut to obtaining it for him, or for us. He would have to win the prize, or buy it from the winner. But, if the man suspected the existence of a valuable secret concealed somewhere in the aeroplane, there might, of course, be some tricky short cut towards obtaining that. Personally, I couldn't see how he could manage to steal that secret treasure, provided the machine were guarded day and night, as it doubtless was. But I wondered if 'the Spaniard's' mental eye-sight were sharper than mine, and I felt a stir of uneasiness.

"Do you think he can recognise you?" I asked Patchinka.

She was positive on that point. "No, he and the other two saw me only once, and I was a little girl with my hair down. They took no notice of me. I was much fatter too—oh, quite plump! If you saw my photograph the way I was then you would say it was somebody else."

"Good!" said I. "Then, if we want to watch the fellow a bit, for one reason or other, we can do it without his guessing who is on his track. Lucky thing they're not so particular here now as they had to be in the war, about your 'piece d'indentite' founded on your passport, and all that red-tape rot. At least, the tourists' agent people told me they weren't. You are Miss P. Smith, so far as anybody here is concerned—even if the whole Syndicate turns up."

"They will!" prophesied the girl. "I am sure. Only, will they be working together, or each man for himself?"

"That remains to be seen," I replied judicially. "What do you think of my trying to get into the hotel or boarding house where this type is going to put up?"

"Oh, would you do that?" exclaimed Patchinka. "It would be splendid of you—and self-sacrificing, for I think he is not the kind who lives at the best hotels. Oh, there is one thing I had not thought of. He may have seen Petro."

"If he has, it won't matter," I assured her. "One bull-dog camouflaged all over with brindles looks much like another bull-dog decorated the same way."

"I don't agree with you!" the girl said hotly. "Petro is different from every other bull-dog in the world. But I do hope most people are as stupid—I mean as—unobserving as you. It would give us away if this Ramiro Mendez knew Petro by sight."

"He won't know Petro," I said. "So his name is Ramiro Mendez? Sounds more romantic than he looks. Smart of you to remember, all these years. But it is rather a striking name."

"That is not why I remember! It is because the man wronged Sacha—cheated him. So the name and the face were printed on my brain. It is the same with the other two. I can see them both—though I told you I met them only once and they hardly looked at me. The French Algerian was a rich wine merchant. Sacha thought he had Arab blood. His name was Amedeo Dupont. And the Italian was Edouardo Moroni. He was fat and almost blonde, with bulgy grey eyes—like a German. I knew very little about Germans then, but Wilna taught me too much."

By this time we had walked the length of the platform, and were close behind the man with the soft black hat as he stopped to give up his ticket. It gave me a caterpillar creepiness inside my spine to think that this tall, somewhat stooped figure so near us, had come from a distant place—a very distant perhaps—on an errand like our own, an errand whose success would spell our failure. I watched the line of crinkly black hair between hat and turned-up, high collar, in an odd sort of fascination. And I told myself that, if Patchinka were an ordinary girl I should think she was mistaken; I should think that she was nervous, hysterical, about her brother's wrongs and his wonderful machine which we were soon to see, and that she was deceived by a resemblance.

But Patchinka was not an ordinary girl; far from it. Asshegazed from under lowered lids and curled lashes at the man's back she had the air of a young Fate. Her very modern dress and hat, her shoes of the dernier cri, were the only modern things about her. No English girl could ever have looked like that.

We had planned to leave our luggage in the station and go straight up to the Place du Casino, which Patchinka said was near—just up the hill—no walk at all. Then we were to gaze our fill at the aeroplane. And when we could tear ourselves away it would be time to think what ought to become of us next.

Now, this man had changed everything—for me, at all events. Whatever Patchinka and Miss Wellington and Petro might do, I had pledged myself to follow the alleged Ramiro Mendez.

It was the height of the season, and we did not know where we were going to stay—had been warned by a tourist agency that we should have difficulty in staying anywhere at all. Yet, I believe, if we had had the best rooms on the Riviera offered for nothing on condition of rushing to them at once, we should have let them go to someone else, rather than put off seeing the aeroplane. Now I was cold with fear lest this Mendez business should knock the gilt off my gingerbread. What if he didn't go up to the Place? What if I had to let Patchinka walk on alone and get her first sight of the aeroplane without me?

But my worry was vain, as most worry is.

A few words with an intelligent porter solved the luggage question temporarily, and we were free—free for watch-dogging in all its branches!

We had talked a good deal during the long journey, Patchinka and I. What she hadn't told me about Monte Carlo wasn't worth knowing and (to be brutal) part of what she did tell possibly wasn't, she having spent just two days at Monte more than six years ago. She had, however, a remarkable memory for other things besides the faces of her brother's enemies. I believe she could have looked at the outline of a mountainous horizon, and have sketched it afterwards with precise accuracy, a rare feat, especially for a girl. Unlike Aunt Sarah and other women who never take the right way anywhere if they can find the wrong one, Patchinka had shown me already that she possessed an amazing "bump of locality," so I did trust her description of geography if not of gamblers.

She had mentioned three ways up from the railway station at Monte: in the ascenseur, advertised by loud bawls; up the steps and steep paths leading through the gardens; or along the road which motors, cabs, and hotel buses take. We knew that Mendez had not been lured to the lift, but there was a minute of anxious doubt when we feared he might nip into a taxi and disappear before we could follow. He did not do this, however, and he was not one of those comfortable, well settled ones for whom the buses were waiting. He made for the gardens, thus showing former knowledge of the place, and we three with the dog, trailed after him in silence up the asphalt steps where the old woman sells matches, along the brown paths, up more steps past the bandstand, under palms and flowering trees, avoiding the terrace high above railway and sea, round the big ornate white building of the Casino, and—into the Place.

It was to me like a dream come true. There, in a blaze of afternoon sunlight towered and stretched a great biplane, beautiful, graceful as a trapped giant bird. There were little flags waving, palms blowing, people promenading or

THOSE who study human habits agree that most of our good habits are formed before we are ten years old.

That is why the mother's watchful care and early teaching are so important.

Millions of mothers believe that Ivory Soap cleanliness is a basic part of their children's education. They use Ivory Soap from the very first—for the baby's bath, clothes, bottles, nipples and utensils.

Then the child begins to do things. And so, Ivory Soap washes doll clothes and doll faces. Of course, she takes her own bath with it, too.

Right now, while she is still young and eager to learn, teach her the seven important things about fine soap. They are: Purity, mildness, whiteness, fragrance, abundant lather, easy rinsing and "It Floats".

Having learned these, she will probably use Ivory Soap always, because Ivory combines all seven.

For these same seven reasons you are probably now using Ivory today for your face and hands, for your bath, for your hair, and for laundering your silks, laces, woollens and other delicate garments.

SUMMER CAMPS FOR GIRLS

BY MARY S. EDGAR

EDITOR'S Note—The writer of the article which follows is a camp leader of wide experience and is known to many young Canadians as the author of "Every Girl" and other plays. It will be interesting to our readers to know that Miss Edgar is opening a camp of her own this summer (Glen Bernard) near Sundridge, Ontario, in the Parry Sound District. Quebec Province, also, has a girls' camp:—

"O the great days in the distance enchanted! Days of fresh air in the rain and the sun."

IN the Long-Ago-Days the magic music of the Pied Piper of Hamelin lured troops of eager children out through the cobbled streets, beyond the sight of home and the city gates, and on and on through the meadows and over the hills until the town of Hamelin was only a memory and the enchanting music held them captive. It has never seemed like a very happy ending to a pilgrimage which began so merrily but perhaps the grown-ups who passed the story down knew nothing whatever of all that happened beyond the walls of the city. It's as like as not that the children tripped along hippidy-hop with a song on their lips and it may be that after all there was an Enchanted Garden for them, — or better still a Camp at the end of the trail. Now-a-days when the year comes round to holiday-time there are troops of eager boys and girls who stream out of all the cities and towns in answer to "the call to go camping," and for them there is just as much of the magic and thrill to that call as to any music of any ancient piper. They know that the end of the trail means the freedom of the great Out-of-Doors, the joy of swimming—boating and scouting, the beauty of dawn and shadows, sunset and stars and above all that good comradeship of campers and leaders which makes up that wonderful thing called "Camp-Spirit."

If one could watch "the long trail a-winding" to the Girls' Camps of Canada one would be amazed at the proportions to which it has grown during the last few years. The very first Canadian Camp for schoolgirls was held in 1920 at Lake Couchiching near Orillia. Last summer there were girls camps in the shadow of the Rockies, by the popular-skirted lakes of the prairie-provinces, in the Highlands of Ontario, among the Thousand Islands, up in the Laurentian Mountains of Quebec and down in the Maritimes where the Atlantic breaks in spray against the rocks or rolls up over stretches of white sand. There were no less than thirty-two Camps conducted last summer for "Canadian Girls in Training" and these were attended by over two thousand girls. Girl Guide Camps were held in all the provinces and beside these there were all the local Camps of the Y.W.C.A. Social Settlements, churches and child welfare organizations. If one could total up the vast number of girls who responded to the magical Camp-Call last summer we would probably discover that it went away up into the tens of thousands, and next summer there is no doubt that "the long long trail" will grow longer still.

What is the spell of Camping-out-Days? What is it that makes them live so long in one's memory? If you ask a group of Campers what it is they love best about it all, you will get a great variety of answers. One girl says "Oh! the glorious swims!" Another says: "Discovering trails and flowers, and everything out of doors!" and another says: "The bonfires at night and the stories!" There are so many sides to Camp-life that every girl finds something equipment and plain fare to keep the fees within the reach of junior employed girls in stores and factories and some organizations have a Holiday-Camp Fund to assist in special cases where it is known that financial assistance is needed. It is a great joy to be a Camp leader among a group of employed girls to whom Camp-life is an absolutely new experience.

Launching out into the lake

there that appeals to her tremendously. For the athletic girl there is the joy of swimming, boating, hiking, games etc. for the girl who loves to "discover things" there is the whole world of nature for exploration and for the girl to whom comradeship means most there are all

Many times I have had girls tell me, "This is the very first time in my life I have ever been out of the city." There is a picture that will always stand out clearly in my memory of a little fourteen-year-old factory girl kneeling beside a wild pink rose, not daring to touch it kinds of adventures in friendship and the ruddy glow of the bonfire draws the Camp-family close together at the end of every day.

Fortunately Camp-life is enjoyed by the under-privileged girl almost as much as it is by the girl of means, for it is possible with volunteer leadership, simple or pick it, but "just loving it" because as she expressed it, "I never seen one jist growin' natural before." It means something to see a crowd of these girls troop back to the city at the end of their week's holiday with a rosy glow in their cheeks and a whole-hearted merriness in their laughter.

Tenting on the old Camp Ground

I have seen town-weary mortals lose their languor in a day, As they wandered back to childhood through the happy lanes of play.

And play there is!—always, from rising bell till the stars peep out,—and ever after the last "lights out" bell goes at night one hears subdued giggles from the white-canvas tents among the trees. It is all play! Even tent-tidying and orderly duties, building rafts and blazing trails and dragging logs for the bonfire. Of course it's play! That is the magic thing about a Camp, that you work like a Trojan at all kinds of things and yet you never think of it as anything but sheer fun.

The programme of an up-to-date, all round Camp is a very inclusive one. The Swimming Instructor sets her hear on having every last Camper pass the boating and swimming tests and even aspires to have most of them qualify for at least the elementary test of the Royal Life Saving Society. The Nature Study Leader would blush with shame if any girl left Camp without being able to attach the common names to the common wild flowers, birds and trees, but besides that she shares with them her knowledge of moths and mushrooms and stars. The Camp-Scout insists that every one must know something about tracking, hiking and Camp-craft, and woe betide us, if we cannot build and light a fire on a wet day with one solitary match. The Camp nurse expects us to know something about the rules of health and commonsense and besides that she gives talks on "First Aid." There are frequent amateur dramatics and out-of-door pageants where latest talent is drawn forth, and a daily or weekly Camp Chronicle in which budding genius expresses itself in prose or verse. An always there is the Story Hour or Sing Song around the bonfire at night when the leaders share the very best of their stories and experiences.

"Have you gathered round the fire
In the Council ring at night
And watched the eager flames leap up
And the tree tops catch the light?
Have you joined in song and story
Or drawn closer to a friend?
Then you know the day's best moment
Is discovered at the end."

The appeal of Camp-life is a natural universal appeal and it is not only responded to by the Youth of the American continent but by an ever increasing number of girls and boys all around the world. Can you imagine anything more lovely than to Camp at the foot of peerless Mt. Fuji in Japan. That was my privilege in September 1920 with a group of Japanese girl-leaders of the Y.W.C.A. I shall never forget the morning when Mt. Fuji threw off his grey draperies of mist for the first time after three cloudy days and we saw him in all her marvellous beauty. It was an early morning that a Japanese girl waked me saying: "Do come and see Fu Yama!" And now I know that no artist can ever exaggerate its loveliness. It was so much closer than I had ever dreamed and rising sheer before us to a height of 12,365 feet. The long sweeping lines from sea-level to its white cone shaped peak were wonderfully beautiful. Behind it the sky was lemon yellow with a crescent moon hanging low over some pine trees. At this crest there were vivid streaks of cerise and flame-color where the snow had melted. The lower slopes shaded from lavender to deep purple and it was all reflected in the little lake in front of us. It was a long line of Japanese girls who stood at the edge of the verandah with their hands behind their backs, their heads up at their eyes shining, silently drinking in the beauty of it all. When I think of Japanese Girls' Camps now I think of that long, long row of girls and all the beauty of the out-of-doors means them. My very first night in Burma I was at the Girls' annual meeting of the Y.W.C.A. in Rangoon and heard most interesting reports given by Eurasian Campers of their Girl Guide Camp. In India I was invited to spend a month

Something About Salads

BY FRANCES McNALLY

It is true, that the time has passed, when we had to wait until Spring came around in order to get green vegetables, especially salads; but it is also true that a keen relish for the cold crisp salad comes with the warm days of Spring and Summer. There is no dish prettier or more popular to serve in hot weather than a fancy salad. Not only is it decorative and edible; but it is nourishing, refreshing and wholesome. Indeed, salads cannot be over estimated in food value, especially in warm weather, when they seem to fill a peculiar need. Any combination salad, for a noon repast, may be sufficiently hearty for hot weather. It may be added too, that few dishes are more economical. The ingenious housewife makes a salad of almost anything that is left over, and in the summer time,

Then there are also the accessories, such as olives, cheese, pimento, nuts and even flowers, all to be used in tasteful combination.

(1) The two important points in the preparation of the material for salad are; first, everything should be thoroughly dry, second, everything should be thoroughly chilled. The importance of these two points cannot be over emphasized and they are of equal value.

(2) Salad plants should be tender, cold, crisp. Gather green vegetables in the early morning, or after sunset, keep in a cool place, closely wrapped in paper or in a closed vessel. A lettuce bag in which to put the lettuce, after it has been carefully cleansed in several waters, and the leaves cut apart from the centre, is a necessity. If placed near the ice, the leaves will grow holds it in high esteem. The salad is the conservator of the perishables, since all the "bits" in the refrigerator may thus be appetizingly utilized.

Someone has said, "To assemble the harmonious ingredients in a salad, is like selecting the right persons for a party, folk who are not congenial and foods that do not mix, prove how essential it is, to be wise in directing either." It is certainly true, that one must have a working knowledge of food values and flavors, to make a success of this branch of the culinary art. With such a knowledge, one may make combinations of marked originality crisper as they stand and keep good for two or three days. If used at once, after cleaning, every piece should be carefully wiped until quite dry. Many a salad is unpalatable because it is watery and wilted.

(3) Salad materials should be neat and symmetrical in shape—vegetables and fruits cut in cubes or small slices; meat, poultry and fish cut in small pieces, chopped or flaked.

(4) Cooked salad materials should be mixed with some of the oil and acid, and allowed to stand in an ice-box for some time before it is dressed and arranged for and gain a reputation for salads, which is distinction indeed.

The materials used in the modern salad are so varied that a complete list would include nearly all of our fruits and vegetables and many of our meat foods. There are six distinct classes:

- (1) The salad of greens, such as lettuce, romaine, water cress.
- (2) Vegetable salads, using uncooked vegetables such as tomato, cucumber, radishes, onions, cabbage, celery, peppers; and cooked vegetables such as potatoes, beans, asparagus, beets, peas, carrots, spinach.
- (3) Fish salads.
- (4) Meat salads.
- (5) Poultry salads.
- (6) Fruit Salads.]

serving. This process is called marinating and gives a flavor to the salad, that it cannot have, if a dressing is poured over the ingredients just before serving. Meat, fish, and most cooked vegetables, used in salads, should be well marinated, cold, and the marinade carefully drained off before mixing with the crisp salad plants and the thicker dressing.

(5) Salads dressed at the table should first be sprinkled with salt and pepper, then oil added and lastly vinegar or lemon juice. A salad is perfectly dressed, when each individual leaf or bit of vegetable is lightly coated with oil or appropriate dressing.

(6) The principle to remember in garnishing is that the dish should be made

A Clog in The Carbureter— A Lonely Road— And a Dark Night

A very little thing can paralyze the mechanics of an engine, and bring annoyance and hardship.

Everyone realizes the necessity of taking care of a machine, and of taking warning when it "knocks."

Yet some people expect the body to take care of itself, though its mechanism is far more delicate and complicated than that of any mechanical device.

Carelessness in selecting food, and neglect of warnings has stalled many a human machine when the trip was far from finished.

Grape-Nuts feeds the body scientifically, and it has a wonderful charm for the appetite. The full richness of wheat and malted barley, together with the vital mineral salts which the blood corpuscles and bone structure must have are in this food; and Grape-Nuts is so processed in the making, that it digests quickly and completely.

Try Grape-Nuts with cream or good milk for breakfast, or in place of a heavy, starchy meal for lunch. You'll greatly relish the delicious crispness and flavor of this splendid food, and you will be helping yourself to better health—away from the danger of accidents along the road.

The Girls' Institutes of Ontario

THEY hold the Future in their keeping, those little soft-handed rosy-lipped girls in their teens and early twenties. A girl's intrinsic value to her country to-day is very great, greater than it ever has been probably, because in addition to her trained ability to do practically every sort of work as efficiently as her brother, she still carries the life of the race secure and secluded beneath her heart, and is a more tremendous force than she often realises in shaping the social ideals which will govern the next quarter century in both home and state.

It is cause for rejoicing therefore, that the daughters of rural Ontario are taking a well-balanced view of their individual self-development as well as their place in society, and are organising in study groups which take a four-square outlook upon life.

The Girls' Institutes continue to be one of the interesting features of the general Institute organization, the girl membership carrying on their activities in various ways.

Where the numbers are small, they usually carry on as an active part of the Women's Branch, receiving special consideration when the programme is being planned and carried out. In this case it is usual to elect a girl to the Board of Directors of the Branch to represent the girls and their views.

Again, they form a Girls' Circle within the Branch which is in such cases responsible for all of some meetings or some of each; also having its own chairman who is a member of the Executive. The officers and committee may be the same as for a regular Women's Institute.

When there are a considerable number of girls brought together by such interests as one of the Short Courses, they frequently decide to organize a Junior Institute, still co-operating closely with the Women's Institute, if there is one, but planning and carrying on their own work and meetings, and receiving help from the Department.

Besides the regular study of better and more scientific homemaking, community matters are given consideration, the Hospitals, Schools, Libraries and Recreation.

For the Hospitals, the Branch undertakes plain sewing of such a kind that the youngest girl can take her share in it. In some cases, at least one complete infant's layette, cradle included, is made during the year. An interesting feature of this is often a demonstration by a trained nurse in the bathing and dressing of a baby.

The Girls' Institutes are also showing an active friendly interest in the schools, visiting them and the teacher, giving prizes to the School Fairs, encouraging the literary societies, and doing what they can generally to aid in getting better, cleaner, and more beautiful schools and grounds.

Play has, of course, had its legitimate place. Co-operation with the Seniors has resulted in the provision for tennis, basket ball, and volley ball, in connection with the Community Hall grounds. In some cases the Juniors have helped in the decoration of those halls. At the indoor gatherings, essays, discussions, debates, music, contests and games are features. One young president sums up the ideal actuating the girls as follows: "No dancing or card playing is allowed at these meetings because we want everybody to come and everybody to feel satisfied and happy. Everybody is given a chance to display her talent not only in practical home-making but in writing, editorials, poems, or humour. One evening a month we study Shakespeare. Our meetings are always properly chaperoned and we close not later than 10.30 P.M."

HOME ECONOMICS SHORT COURSE BOLTON

This was one of the four longer Short Courses lasting three months. The Department of Agriculture has felt for some time that the January Short Courses were too short and the Honourable Manning Doherty was responsible for establishing these three months' courses in Agriculture and Home Economics, covering the period from November 28th, 1921, to March 3rd, 1922.

At Bolton, Ontario, we had a total registration of seventy-five girls, with an average attendance for each day of the course of forty-eight. Some four hundred and eighty-three visitors came in for a day or a few days.

Major subjects for each month were—sewing and millinery; home nursing and first aid, and food values and cooking. Other lectures, covering from two to ten periods, were given on child study and mothercraft; millinery; household administration; Equipment and management; house planning; laundry; civics; public speaking; poultry; farm dairying; cuts and curing of meats; apiculture; botany, entomology; farm water supply and sewage disposal; bacteriology; animal husbandry; birds of Ontario and miscellaneous subjects as books, etc. Each day alternate periods were devoted to English and mathematics.

Several times during February, the class was divided into working groups of two, three or four girls each, and assigned practical work in Cooking. Practice in public speaking was taken advantage of by all the class and teams from our class met representatives of the agricultural class in debate on three occasions—two of them successful from our point of view.

Examinations were written on ten subjects. Prizes were offered for best kept notebooks, week's menu and home nursing and first aid. For general proficiency a scholarship of summer school for rural leaders and a reserve medal were offered by Miss H. L. Beardmore. The first was won by Miss Laura Johnston and the second by Miss Lillian Rutherford. Other prizes were provided for by the County Council.

Early in the term, the class was organized and as much responsibility as possible thrown on the students themselves.

Friday afternoons were for the most part used for debates, Public Speaking contests, demonstrations or organized games, etc., Community singing and readings formed a part of these interesting days when Home Economics and Agricultural classes were together.

Play was not forgotten. Two days each week, the rink was open to the girls from 12 to 1.30 for skating. A broom ball team was organized and played in finals at the tournament, losing by only one goal. Physical Culture claimed some time almost every day and sing songs or class yells were used occasionally to divide lectures. The girls gave one afternoon tea and each class entertained the other when iced desserts were made.

A circulating library of books, largely text with some fiction, was well-patronized. At the close of the term a Junior Institute was organized.

The last day was spent in Toronto. The girls visited the Household Science Building first. At the Royal Museum, Dr. Currelly took charge of the party and an interesting two hours was spent. After lunch, at the Diet Kitchen, we joined the Agricultural class for a tour of other University buildings and to attend a session of the Legislature. A banquet at the Carls-Rite Hotel closed the day.

FEATURES OF INTEREST FROM THE GIRLS' PROGRAMMES.

Programme planning with the Junior Institutes as with the Seniors, is an important phase of the work.

One branch arranged their two hour meeting so as to devote the first to serious things,—papers, debates, discussions, demonstrations pertaining to better home-making, and the second to recreation,—instrumental music, choral and community singing, tableaux, physical culture, and athletic games.

THE springtime seems to bring an unusual number of inquiries concerning the hair, its persistent falling and its obstinate way of turning grey before its time. There are women who insist that they admire grey or white hair, but there are few women who do not mourn over the appearance of the first grey hair, while the early coming of these ghostly intruders is little short the hair, this sudden fading of gold or brown or auburn into monotonous grey. Of course, if a woman is fifty years of age—and upwards—she may be reconciled to grey or silvery locks; but most women who have not reached the half-century mark resent the coming of the dull locks. In fact, few women will admit that they are fifty or forty or any particular age. In spite of the vote and of tragedy. When a woman under thirty discovers that her hair is becoming grey, we admit that she has reason for displeasure, even disgust. The causes for this early greyness are not easy to determine. Climate may have something to do with it. Certainly, many of our young correspondents—women of twenty-five or twenty-six years of age—complain bitterly of the unkindness of Alberta and Saskatchewan to the crown of glory.

Illness or worry also may have something to say about this lack of color in our professional and industrial careers, we women are still highly unwilling to admit that Time is flying away with much that we held desirable.

What is to be done with the premature greyness? I believe that the old proverb about an ounce of prevention and a pound of cure is more true in this case than it is in others—and that is saying a great deal, for prevention is always the best policy.

The woman who is anxious to retain the gold, brown or auburn in her hair should begin to have treatments when the grey threads first make their appearance, if she is anxious to keep the drab tint from spreading. The attainment of "hair health" frequently means that the greying process is arrested. One thing must be understood distinctly, that a preparation which changes the color of the hair is a dye, and its use will require repetition.

As to "naturalness," the dye is usually a vain deceiver. The brown has a dull or reddish tinge which does not "go" with the complexion. Hear the words of Dr. Harvey Wiley on the subject. Dr. Wiley, as most of you know, is the greatest authority on the Continent in the matter of pure food and drugs:

"Black hair dyes frequently contain nitrate of silver, which, while less poisonous than lead, is still dangerous when used by the inexperienced. Serious consequences frequently follow the constant use of such products. No hair dyes can be recommended. As one eminent dermatologist has said: 'The only sensible thing to do with grey hair is to admire it.' Dyeing is unaesthetic, as well as unhygienic. Nearly all of the tonics claiming to restore the color of the hair without dyeing it depend upon the interaction of lead acetate and sulphur to brown the hair. The hair, under the use of dye, soon becomes dead and dingy in color and repeated applications of the dye must be made, so that the results are undesirable, from the standpoint of beauty, as well as from that of cleanliness and health."

And wherever a true wife comes, this home is always round her.

—Ruskin

SORRY to be obliged to say it, Mrs. Sidney, but the owners of this building have made a new rule, declaring they will have no babies in these flats, and I am commissioned to give all families with children one month's notice to move out."

This was the sentence that greeted her when Mrs. Sidney opened the door of her two roomed flat to the janitor this May morning.

"I suppose there is nothing for it then but to move."

"Afraid not, Mrs. Sidney," and he moved off to the next flat.

Evidently things were beginning to happen for the Sidneys after many weary months with poverty staring them in the face. After getting his discharge Frank Sidney and Mary, his bride of a year, reached Vancouver to find practically no place to lay their heads, and were obliged to take this flat at forty dollars a month. Shortly after this little Frankie arrived, adding new expenses. Frank was unable to get work. Each day he set out bravely to hunt for a job, only to return weary and discouraged. But never did he allow his weariness to go with him into his little flat. He mastered it before he walked up the long staircase. If he could not do so he walked around the block, or went down to the sea until he did master it. His little wife must not be worried just now, or at any time; but she, being no fool, understood.

To-day Frank had heard of a job at Hollyburn in a saw-mill, and had gone to see about it. As she went about her work of bathing Frankie and tidying the little flat Mary almost prayed that the job at Hollyburn would prove a success. She would know the minute Frank entered. Brave and cheerful he always was, but she understood what it cost him to be cheerful.

The Homemakers of Hollyburn

BY LAURA B. GRAY

"Mary, Mary, I've got it! I've got it!" The door burst open and Frank caught hold of her hands and danced her around until a table and chair were knocked over.

"I'm to begin to-morrow, checking the lumber at five dollars a day. I am going to live there in the bunk-house, and spend the week ends here with you."

"Oh, Frank, aren't we the luckiest pair in the world! But, oh, I don't like the idea of my living here and your living there." Then she told him about the janitor's message.

"But, dear, there is no place for you to live near the mill."

"Is there no little shack where baby and I could live?"

"I do remember seeing two very small, dilapidated-looking shacks about three quarters of a mile from the mill, but quite unfit for habitation."

"Perhaps they could be made fit. Let us go and look at them this afternoon."

"All right, let's," and a thrill of joy shot through Frank's heart, only to be followed by a second thought.

"No, Mary, it wouldn't do. Think of your home in Toronto—all the beauty and comfort that has surrounded you all your life, and then there is our son to be thought of. No, I could not let you live in a shack."

"Now, Frank, stop! Think of your father's home in Montreal! We are both Canadians and, to a certain extent, pioneers in this new part of our own country. What is good enough for you is good enough for me, and as for the son he has a beautiful new pram and a little white crib fit for a prince. There will be room for these in the shack, won't there? That will do for the present. Let us be together."

It was a glorious afternoon when the Hollyburn ferry pulled out into the green waters of the inlet. A few gulls circled around the little boat. The mountains on the north shore lay peaceful and beautiful in the sunshine with the little settlement nestled at their feet.

"What a glorious country and our very own to make or mar. What a sacred privilege to have a hand in the making," thought Mary as she felt the fresh breeze in her face.

At last the little boat drew up at the Hollyburn pier. Close by was the motor stage that was to take them within walking distance of the mill. It rattled along for some time, stopping here and there to let people off. At last it stopped at a sign post with Fifth Avenue on it. With the exception of the road the stage was on, nothing was to be seen except a luxuriant growth of young alders, salmon berries, devil's club, skunk cabbages, and here and there a giant cedar or fir. But on closer inspection they saw a trail that burrowed its way into the depths of this growth, like the entrance to a giant's cave. This then was Fifth Avenue. What a veritable fairy-land! Frank, carrying the baby, led the way.

"Watch your steps carefully just here, Mary," said Frank as they came to a swamp with a series of planks laid across side by side. "This is an old skid road and these planks were laid by the loggers a few years ago to make a road to get the logs down to the sea."

"Oh, I must stop to admire these beautiful, wonderful, yellow lilies," cried Mary, as she reached out and broke off a large succulent bloom. "Ugh! I know now why they are called skunk cabbages." Then she risked another sniff, and then another. "I do believe I am beginning to like the smell."

"This will never do, Mary; we must make haste or we shall never catch the five o'clock ferry home."

They walked on for some time and at last they came to a cleared spot, but already dotted with young alders that would in a few years be a new forest. Here in this cleared spot were the two little shacks. Frank had spoken truly; they were dilapidated. The larger of the two consisted of three rooms and a small veranda. There was one door and three small windows from which the sashes had been stolen. The door also was gone. The steps probably had never existed. A lard pail poking through the roof did for a chimney. The roof had leaked badly, and stained and torn building paper hung in ribbons from the ceiling. Neighbouring goats had made it a shelter. Mary's heart sank. Frank watched her face keenly, trying to guess her feelings.

"No, dear, I knew it would not do," he said at last.

Mary went out and sat on a stone, holding Frankie in her arms, and a black cloud seemed to settle upon her. What was to be done? Frank watched her face, a pang at his heart; but suddenly the expression changed—a smile, a great hopefulness spread over Mary's features. Imagination, her childhood's friend, had come to her aid.

"What is it, Mary?" cried Frank, reflecting her smile.

"We can do it, Frank, we can! You are good at carpentry—the mill is near. We can make the cosiest, loveliest little home out of it."

Frank having less imagination could not see how, but was willing to be led by his wife.

"All right, Mary, I have been looking at the posts and find they are quite sound, and there is a tap behind that bush. Tell me what to do."

Another gave a meeting to each of the following in rotation:

1. Horticulture, Agriculture, and out-of-door matters. 2. Literary and educational topics. 3. Practical and ideal home-making. 4. Social. Most, however, plan a more or less balanced arrangement of all for each month.

Some of the special studies have been Parliamentary Law and Procedure; the laws of Ontario affecting the home; how we are governed; public speaking; English and Canadian literature; laws of health and beauty.

As the majority of the girls are looking forward to having homes of their own, one of the primary ends of the club is to prepare them better to fulfil this mission. Some of the subjects dealt with are:

Planning our week's housework.

Understanding and caring for the human body.

What a human being should weigh, measure, and be fed at the different stages of development between birth and the age of eighteen.

Most of the girls are actively interested participants in the economic side of country life and are giving considerable attention to the making and marketing of milk products; possibilities of the garden—flowers, bulbs, vegetables, fruit; the canning and preserving of fruit and vegetables; poultry, bees, their care and management and shipping and marketing the products.

"Work, play, love, and worship," said Cabot, "properly balanced, are all needed to make a full and happy life."

The Juniors have a varied programme for the play side of life, both out and indoors. Some of the favorites are:

Out of doors—

Skating, snow-shoeing, sleighing, bird hikes, nutting, corn roasts and story telling, basket, volley, and captain ball, baseball, tennis, motoring, picnics, and excursions.

Indoors plenty of fun is furnished by charades, tableaux, dramatics, debates, one-minute speeches, story-telling, spelling matches, folk games and dances, instrumental and community music.

Rural Ontario has decided in overwhelming numbers that quite one of the most enjoyable things in life is the learning something new. Consequently the Travelling College or Departmental Short Courses have never been so popular. The Junior Women's courses in Domestic Science, Home Nursing and First Aid, Sewing and millinery, Labor Saving and Interior Decoration are very frequently carried on concurrently with the men's Courses in Agriculture, the Junior Farmers and the girls' organisations uniting for a weekly literary afternoon and concluding the month's or three months' course with a joint banquet.

One county followed up a Short Course in Domestic Science by selecting a team of four, captain and three others, from each Branch in the county, to put on a Canning Contest at the Fall Fair. The prizes given were trips to one or other of the cities of Ontario at the time of the great Annual Women's Institute Conventions, or canning outfits for the home. A few centres are inaugurating also University Extension Courses during the winter term.

WHAT THE JUNIORS ARE DOING.

DELTA offered prizes for the best pie, doughnuts, and sewing by the Juniors and had a sale of fancy and useful articles made by the girls at the Fall Fair, gave wedding presents to fifteen graduating members, assisted the Sick Children's and Muskoka Free Hospital, remembered the sick in the neighborhood with flowers, and helped financially with the education of a talented young member of the community besides holding their regular monthly meetings. Blackwell purchased a basketball and baseball for themselves, helped the boys of the school to pay for their footballs, put on a play to purchase swings for the school, raised ten dollars for the Sarnia Y.W.C.A. by a "Hard Times Party" and are now bending their energies to assisting the Seniors in the erection of a Community Hall. Four members have been lost through happy marriages which took them to other parts.

Cheltenham had a winter University Extension Course in English Literature, in addition to the regular programme. Paisley conducted a booth at the School Fair which they assisted with funds, co-operated with the Seniors in the management of a tea-room, had two Sewing Courses, one each in domestic science, labor-saving, and home nursing, and concluded their studies by a joint banquet with the Junior Farmers at which over two hundred were present. West Ops helped towards an organ for the school, with the Lindsay Santa Claus Fund, made a quilt, joined a Sewing class, and had a Christmas Tree, also a concert. They had a weed-naming contest, mean to study Botany this Spring, have debates alone and jointly with the Junior Farmers, and helped the Senior Women's Institute with a garden party. In winter they have skating, with indoor games and community singing afterwards. In summer they play basket ball in a member's orchard, sometimes with their younger brothers of the 'teen age, and one delightful day was spent at a joint picnic in the woods with the Farmers' Club and the Women's Institute. This in addition to the regular monthly Saturday meetings! Bond Head made a special study of the Law of Ontario.

Fordwich had courses in Domestic Science, Home Nursing, Sewing, and Labour Saving, had a doctor give them an illustrated lecture on "The Unsanitary Mouth and Its Relation to Systemic Disease," have given some excellent papers themselves, put on a play, had a Pound Social and sent clothing to the Goderich Shelter, besides purchasing two shares in the new Rink and co-operating with the Women and the Junior Farmers in picnics, garden parties, and an excursion to the lake. Almonte members are co-operating in many ways with the Junior Farmers. They put on joint plays, have taken over and fitted up an old hall for a com-

Anecdotal

Two small boys, proud of their immediate ancestry, were arguing as to the respective merits of their fathers, and, in the course of the argument, each did some pretty good boasting.

"My father's been to India," said one of the boys, "and he's shot hundreds of tigers."

"Don't believe it!" replied the other bluntly.

"It's true!" retorted the son of the tiger-slayer, "He brought back the skins."

"Well, what if he has?" exclaimed the second boy, unable to make any further denial in the face of such positive proof.

"Anyway, my father's done bigger things. He's been to the North Pole!"

"That's not true!" answered the other.

"I knew you'd say that," said the son of the Arctic hero, "but you're wrong. We've got the pole!"

The head of one of the large American railroad companies was making inquiries with regard to acquiring a small branch line which belonged to one old man. "Now, as to the state of your road," he asked, "is it well and safely laid?" "Sir," replied the old man indignantly, "ours is the safest line in the country. I may say we have been running for over twenty years, and have never had a collision." "That's good!" exclaimed the big man. "And what's more, sir," went on the proprietor of the little line, "a collision would be impossible." "How do you make that

A lady who is a district visitor became much interested in a very poor but apparently respectable family named Curran, who lived in a slum district of her parish.

Every time she visited the Currans she was annoyed by the staring and the whisperings of the other women living in the street.

One day she said to Mrs. Curran: "Your neighbors seem very curious to know who and what I am, and the nature of my business with you."

"They do," acquiesced Mrs. Curran.

"Do they ask you about it?"

"Indade they do, ma'am."

"And do you tell them?"

"Faith, thin, an' Oi do not!"

"What do you tell them?"

"Oi just tell them," was the calm reply, "that you are me dressmaker, an' let it go at that."

The Chronicles of Eve's Garden

By EDITH S. RUTHERFORD

MAY in an apple orchard! Could anything be more blissful? Sometimes when I read about gardens with great stretches of green lawn, orderly shrubberies, borders arranged accordingly to color, and—this is a mere detail usually overlooked—an army of gardeners to look after them: I feel rather discontented and wish I could re-arrange my garden to at least approach this ideal, but in May and June I love my garden so that I wouldn't exchange it for the greatest triumph of a real landscape artist.

It is on an evening such as this, when the mountain peaks blush rosy red under the good-night kisses of the sun; and the

Unfortunately Adam's idea was to have a fruit ranch, so the trees were planted all over the three acres, and poor Eve left to realize her ambitions in the garden—ing line as best she could between the rows of apple trees. About the centre of the lot a flat terrace faced with stone, overgrown with grass, formed a sort of lap on which the tiny white cottage perched. And that was the only bit of level ground on the place, the rest sloping steeply from the foot of a high mountain to the lake.

There was no money to hire labor. Adam was away at his business all day; so it was Eve's spade and mattock that broke up the hard ground and in con-

I still grow golden glow, for old times' sake, and as a sort of thank offering for the hosts of yellow blossoms it gave me that first summer when nearly everything else failed. But I must confess I keep it a bit in the background.

Some good angel prompted us to plant cherry trees near the house, forming a sort of uneven boundary to a semi-circular open space that I pre-empted for my own, and every spring since I have blessed said good angel, for that half circle when it is filled with blossoming daffodils, tulips, and hyacinths is like a little bit of Heaven shut in by white walls of odoriferous cherry bloom.

My garden started out with two long narrow beds on either side of the path leading from the terrace steps to the lake. I think they were about twenty feet long and five feet wide and I sowed all sorts of annuals in them but nothing but the poppies amounted to anything. Nothing could dampen my ardor though so long as I could be out doors all day, with the blue lake and the mountains for companions, and the dream garden of the future to allure me. I used to sit on the steps, and look at that dry barren slope and wonder what it would be like when the tiny trees we had planted were bearing, and my semi-circular plot was full of flowers, but in my wildest dreams I never fancied anything half so lovely as the scene my eyes rest on this May evening, nor did I guess what joy and happiness I should gain in making that dream garden come true.

The narrow borders on each side the path have lengthened and widened until they reach the lake and occupy all the space between two rows of apple trees; the little garden in front has escaped from its boundaries on one side and stretches over towards the line fence, and there is another long path leading to the highway behind the house, and having also its wide border of flowers on either side. Adam complains that my garden is spreading over the whole three acres, but that is manifestly impossible as anyone knows who has tried to grow flowers among trees, but I must admit that there is a small rose garden on one side of the path, and a new pergola which I hope to see covered with roses this year. The fruit trees have nothing to grumble about though for the extra care I give the flowers near their feet is reflected in their increased vigor.

Like most amateurs we planted a good many poor varieties of apples, and when, after years of waiting and hoping, Adam finally is convinced of the utter lake like a great opal with changing lights of saffron, blue, and green shot through with crimson fire, nestles in the setting of greeny-gold filigree formed by the birches and willows edging its shores that I look out across the blossoming fruit trees, from my cottage door and feel surer than ever that the Garden of Eden must have been intended to serve as a model, inasmuch as it included fruit trees as well as flowers.

Elizabeth of German garden fame speaking of her longing to do some of the actual work in her garden says: "It is not graceful and it makes one hot, but it is a blessed sort of work and if Eve had had a spade in Paradise and known what to do with it we should not have had all that sad business of the apple." Not being either hampered by convention or blessed with money and servants as Elizabeth was, I've done most of the work in my garden with my own hands. So perhaps that's why the serpent has not entered my Eden, and my beloved garden seems to be almost a part of my very self.

If I were asked my formula for Happiness it would be something like this. "Live in the country, plant an orchard, and make your own garden." Bacon in that quaint essay "Of gardens" says "God Almighty first planted a garden. And indeed it is the purest of human pleasures; it is the greatest refreshment to the spirit of man. Without which buildings and palaces are but gross handiworks, and I believe that one misses the greatest joy of a garden unless it is tended by oneself.

I smile rather ruefully now from the high eminence of the knowledge gained in fifteen years experience, when I think of my first efforts to realize the dream of my life—to have a real garden. From a tiny child I had loved and worshipped flowers, but it was not till we became the proud owners of a little bit of ground on the shore of a beautiful mountain lake, that I had any chance to have a garden of my very own.

sequence there wasn't very much done that first year. The sweet peas I sowed only grew about a foot high and never bloomed at all, and only the Shirley poppies and some golden glow saved me from despair. Do you remember what a wave of enthusiasm for golden glow swept over the country twenty years ago? That wave was about at its height, and gardens everywhere were afflicted with a sort of yellow eruption, when I started my garden and the very first thing I planted was a big clump of golden glow on each side of the path. Now when no up-to-date gardener would own to a taste for anything so plebeian

The Dream Garden

I have written a Baby Book

Since I began this little series of comfort letters a great many mothers have written to me for advice about babies. And the funny thing about these letters is that a doctor would have found it difficult to answer any of them.

After all, bringing up babies is a trade which only mothers ever seem to master.

So some time ago I started to write a Baby Book which would discuss all of these interesting and important details about which only a mother knows or cares.

It seemed like a big job at first but as I got into it I found that most of the material was contained in my "Comfort Letters" and in my correspondence with thousands of mothers who have written me regarding their baby problems. I have consulted most of the big authorities in order to check up on my experience with my own babies and at the hospitals during the war.

Several people who are qualified to judge have told me that my book is the most useful and practical text book for motherhood that has been written.

The Mennen Company, who make Mennen Talcum, is publishing my book. It is beautiful illustrated, contains charts, tables, question blanks and is thoroughly indexed. It's the sort of book you would pay about two dollars for at a book store, but The Mennen Company will send out a limited number of copies for 35c.

That is because I frankly say in the book that only Mennen Talcum should be used on babies because it is pure, safe and endorsed by three generations of doctors, nurses and mothers.

Better fill out the coupon at once.
Lovingly,
Belle.

BURROUGHES
"COR. QUEEN AND BATHURST STS."

Dept. 31, Queen St. W., Toronto

THERE is no country in the world that offers a greater variety of beautiful scenery than Canada, and nowhere can there be found a more delightful climate than our own, from May to September. It is not surprising therefore, that it has become almost a national custom to live most of one's summer in the open air, and the picnic spread has become a regular part of meal planning in summer.

When the picnic is planned days ahead, it is comparatively easy to cook a lunch that will be both inexpensive and appetising. But when a friend, unexpectedly telephones: "It is such a wonderful day we are going to the woods to have our supper. Do bring along anything you have in the pantry and come with us. You must do some quick thinking. The pantry shelves may be well laden and the ice chest well filled but everyone knows, that everyday meals do not seem suitable, usually, for a picnic. To plan and prepare quickly a dainty nourishing lunch, which may be carried without injury to appearance of flavour, is a real accomplishment.

An emergency shelf is a great resource for a hurry up picnic lunch, and it is easy to possess one. In canning time, put up in small jars some of the foods most suitable for salads and sandwich fillings—pineapple, asparagus, peas, string beans, pickles, jellies, marmalades and jams—and place them on the shelf ready for just such occasions.

Add to these a few commercial products such as potted meats, cheese, sardines, baked beans, olives, nuts and pimento and your problem is easily solved.

We probably think of sandwiches first, when a picnic lunch is suggested and an emergency shelf supplemented by the left overs in the refrigerator makes many varieties possible. Here are a few suggestions for sandwich fillings.

1. Hard boiled eggs and olives, chopped and mixed with salad dressing and seasonings.
2. Peanuts chopped very finely and mixed with cream cheese.
3. Baked beans, creamed together with yolks of hard boiled eggs and moistened with salad dressing.
4. Sweet pickles chopped and added to cheese and salad dressing.

5. Chopped olives, pimento, mustard pickles, and parsley added to creamed butter.
 6. Finely chopped ham or tongue and grated cheese mixed with salad dressing.
 7. Chopped olives, pimento, nuts or dates, or a combination of any of these with cheese.
 8. Sardines with lemon juice and a little dressing.
 9. Equal parts of chopped celery, apples and nuts with salad dressing.
- For Sweet Sandwiches—
1. Chopped almonds and seeded raisins moistened with orange juice.
 2. Dates, cooked with enough water to form a paste. Lemon juice and peanuts may be added.
 3. Chopped nuts added to any marmalade, jelly or jam.
 4. Orange marmalade with cheese.
 5. One apple, one banana, one orange, one slice of canned pineapple, chopped and moistened with whipped cream. Chopped nuts may be added.

The bread used for sandwich making, should not be too fresh to cut well. Either brown or white bread may be used but one should choose wisely. Certain fillings require white bread, in order that their distinctive flavour may be pronounced, whereas others are improved by the nutty flavour of brown bread. The crust should not be removed from sandwiches for the picnic lunch. The bread should be cut as thin as it may be, and allow for even spreading. If the butter is well creamed, it will spread easily in a smooth thin layer. Never, under any condition, melt the butter. Melting makes it oily and indigestible. Be careful in spreading the bread that the slices are kept in pairs and that the proper side of each is buttered, so that the sandwiches will fit together when they are done.

If you are fortunate enough to own a garden, the possibilities of the hurry up lunch are greatly increased. Lettuce, radishes, tomatoes, cucumbers, all carry well and, if a small jar of salad dressing is on hand, may be quickly transformed into a dainty salad at serving time. Even without a garden, a salad is not impossible, for many of the left overs in the refrigerator—string beans, peas, carrots, potatoes, salmon—arrive in first class condition if carried in wide-mouthed glass fruit jars, and may be combined with bottled salad dressing at serving time.

Fruit is always a welcome addition at the picnic lunch but it should be washed and cleansed before being taken. If good drinking water is not available fruit is the most valuable thirst quencher. Avoid bananas as they bruise and blacken easily.

Here are some suggestions for picnic menus that can be prepared on short notice.

—1—

Stuffed eggs
Vegetable Salad (from left overs)
Bread and Butter Sandwiches
Pineapple and Orange diced together Cookies.

—2—

Tomato soup carried hot in thermos bottles
Cheese and Ham sandwiches
Gingerbread (baked at home in twenty minutes)
Peaches and Pears.

—3—

Salmon Salad
Cucumber and Tomato Sandwiches
Marmalade and Nut Sandwiches
Fruit

—4—

Hard-boiled Eggs
Potato Salad
Lettuce Sandwiches
Plain Brown Bread Sandwiches
Fancy Crackers
Any Seasonable Fruit

A few general rules should be followed in the packing of any lunch.

1. No food must be carried which is in any way too perishable to arrive in good condition. If it is merely a question of packing, ingenuity may suggest some way of meeting the difficulty. If it is a question of change in the food itself, run no risks.

2. Avoid making the lunch unnecessarily heavy or bulky.

3. Be sure that each person is provided with a napkin and an individual drinking cup.

OUR NATIONAL TREASURER

By Elizabeth B. Price

An office that carries with it a good deal of work—one that is extremely important and yet at the same time has the least honor is that of the treasurer. This office on the Board of the Federated Women's Institute of Canada is no exception to the rule. The position is filled by Miss Eliza Campbell of Fred-cooks. They agreed to cater for the supper of the Nurses' Association which was meeting in Fredericton. Such a fine meal did they provide that the Nurses' association volunteers to pay them twenty-five cents per plate extra than that agreed upon.

As a national officer, Miss Campbell has been of the highest order. She has faithfully attended every board meeting which has meant journeys from New Brunswick to Ontario to Quebec and to Alberta. She has always presented the clearest of reports and as guardian of the national funds has been expert in the accounting to the last cent and balance.

MANITOBA'S CONVENERS.

The following is the list of newly elected conveners of standing committees in Manitoba:

Education—Mrs. R. Johnstone, Deloraine; Institute Technique—Miss A. Playfair, Hartney; National Events—Mrs. Dalton, Gilbert Plains; Household Economics—Miss Hayward, Director; Agriculture—Mrs. Leslie Melita; Health and Child Welfare—Mrs. Speechley, Winnipeg; Legislation—Mrs. A. Rogers, Winnipeg; Immigration—Mrs. C. Robson, Winnipeg.

SHORT COURSES

The second of a series of Domestic Science Short Courses for women and girls from rural districts was recently undertaken in Charlottetown. These classes were held in the Women's Institute Rooms, Kindergarten Hall. Practical work was done in Cookery, Sewing, Millinery, Home Nursing, Laundry and lectures were given along other lines. The following pupils are registered for this Course:—

Hazel Jackson Brackley; Elsie Bryenton, Stanhope; Addie Hamm, Charlottetown, R. R. 5; Lucy Smallwood, Charlottetown, R. R. 5; Margaret Stewart, Dunstaffnage; Georgina Thompson, Dunstaffnage; Charlotte Bernard and Nina Bernard, French River; Minnie Brown, Margate; Lillian Matheon, Bradalbane; Annie McLeod, Clifton; Lillian Currie Fairview; Carrie Prowse, Brackley; Vera Brown, Clifton; Rebecca Stewart, Soonie Shaw, Harrington.

WOMEN'S INSTITUTE METHODS

Conducted by Mrs. Alfred Watt, M.B.E.

CO-OPERATIVE PURCHASES

There are many advantages to be gained by the Institute adopting the co-operative system of purchase. Purchasing wholesale is always cheaper and there is the much abused middleman to be eliminated if so desired. Besides these considerations it is good for members to act together in this way and a rudimentary idea of business is a quired which is especially helpful to the younger members. Co-operative buying promotes good feeling and encourages the corporate idea or team work and if carried out on business lines and good fellowship lines, it is bound to be helpful.

A start can be made at a monthly meeting by a short talk on the value of co-operation by a farmer or a member who has felt its benefits. A local speaker should be secured if possible as it is always more convincing if local figures and facts can be cited. The preliminary talk is a necessity as even the word co-operation is not always understood. One of our English Organizers, Mrs. Clowes, asked for a definition of it at an Institute meeting and one dear old village lady said she knew it was some kind of an operation because "our Peggy had it" but she was not sure which it was. So we are never safe in assuming that everybody knows what we are talking about.

A discussion should follow, and members could state what they would like to buy co-operatively, either at the meetings or through the Suggestion Box

Miss Campbell is representative of the ideal type of institute woman. Her home is on a farm—where she keeps house for her father—situated on the St. John River some six or eight miles from Fredericton. She has been president of her own institute—the Lower Kingsclear branch for seven years and is one of those presidents that the members "Will not let go" simply because they cannot get along without them.

"We have such good times in our institute—" says Miss Campbell, "We always meet at the homes—spend all afternoon in work and then meet with the men members at night."

"Our work has been of all kinds. During the war we knitted hundreds of pairs of socks and did every kind of war work needed. Since then we have taken up community work such as shingling the hall, helping those in distress etc. Our institute is very proud of the fact that we have had exhibits of canned fruits, preserves, bread, cakes at both the Moncton and St. John fairs and succeeded in winning second prizes at both places for two years."

Another fact testifies that the members of the Lower Kingsclear W.I. are good

WHAT is the matter with the youth of to-day?
What is the matter with the parents of to-day?

If you're good at guessing, the answer to the last question will give the answer to the first. It's what is the matter with the parents of to-day that makes it necessary to ask the first question.

I'm a father and a plain everyday Canadian citizen, possessed of a fair education. Own a good home and have plenty for my brood of five; three boys and two girls. The children are all young, the oldest being passed six years. They set me to thinking seriously. Am I a good father? What will become of my boys and girls? These are two of the questions I ask myself and in the asking thereof, up springs the two questions at the head of this article. Maybe you're one who does not see a thing the matter with the twentieth century youth. Then why are so many 'teen-age children before the courts of the land? Whose the fault that so many boys and girls scarcely out of the cradle spend their nights in dancing and "petting parties"? Why does the 'teen-age youth seek pleasure away from home?

In our town, a few over fifteen thousand people, we had a striking case of child depravity recently. One of the privileged few, I sat in a court room, ordered cleared by the police magistrate (we have no juvenile court) and listened to most loathsome evidence given by police officers. In the prisoner's box there stood five youths and three mere slips of girls. None of the boys was over eighteen. The girls gave their ages as sixteen, seventeen and eighteen respectively. They appeared much younger. Their appearance in court was the aftermath of a "petting" party, at which the boys served liquor. The police broke it up at 4.30 a. m., hustled the children into a sleigh and to the police station where they spent the remainder of the night. The next morning, the magistrate, bound by the laws of Society, sent the girls to a reformatory for two years each. The boys went free on payment each of forty-five dollars fine. The question of the double standard of morality was discussed by a women's organization (Local Council of Women) and they talked of sending the magistrate a letter of censure because he sent the girls to prison and let the boys go free. In an interview, the magistrate replied, saying he had to give the boys the opportunity of paying fines. He sent the girls out to become marked with prison pallor because Society had to be protected. The girls were said to be diseased.

I asked several persons working among children, to what they attributed youthful decadence. Two said parents were to blame. Children, they said, were not under parental control. Home was not home to many 'teen-age youths and maidens. Parents failed to make the house which covered them, homes.

"But" I asked "how are parents to control their children? Must they be always brandishing a whip? Must the boy of sixteen be continually dressed down, nagged at and beaten?"

"No," one answered, "the use of the whip or strap should be discarded. Rule the children by comradeship and good guidance." I agree with him. I'm doubtful if all the beatings in the world would make a child good. Whipping, I'm certain, promotes in the child fear and hatred. Sooner or later the child resents it and there comes a time in the life of every father and mother when physical mastery over an offspring brings retaliation.

How then to control a child? Parents' companionship? Yes, for one thing. The understanding of child temperament for another.

How many parents of today are the companions of their children?

How many parents make any attempt to study child temperament?

A few, yes, precious few.

When Frank, six years old, asks father on a Sunday afternoon to take him for a walk into the woods or out along the river bank, what is invariably the answer? Isn't it something like this: "Run away and play with your toys. I'm tired after a week's hard work and besides I've just got nicely interested in this novel. Now you run away and don't disturb daddy again."

What is the child to think? What will he do? Won't he seek companionship elsewhere, away from home? Thus he grows into young manhood finding his comrades and his friendships in questionable quarters. The police constables can generally tell you where.

AND what about most twentieth century mothers. Are they companions to their daughters? Rather are they not strangers to both sons and daughters alike. Daughters are handy creatures to have around when mother serves afternoon tea to a party of women bridge-whist fiends. At other times daughters are not handy; they are handicaps.

How many mothers know what their children are doing day after day? A hurried kiss in the morning and Marjorie and Frank are off to school. Many of the modern mothers never see their Franks and Marjories then until next morning when kissing time comes around again. Society's call has been answered by too many mothers. In my opinion, women who want to mix in Society should never have children. I'll agree many don't; but hundreds do. Child bearing and raising can't be made to mix with pink teas and bridge parties.

A hurried morning meal and the children away to school; the Society mother starts off on her daily round. Six times out of ten the children do not see her again during the day.
